Another of the friends brought me a curiously carved stick, suitable for a cane, and wished me to accept it as a token of his regard and his gratitude for what I had said. His name is James Fernando. On the next morning the following letter was written and signed and mailed to me at Galle:

PANADURE, March 1, 1882.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Permit us to take the present opportunity of expressing to you our warmest thanks for the able lecture you delivered last night at Panadure. The impressive manner in which you expressed yourself, and the fairness with which you treated the two systems of religion, which formed the basis of your lecture, have left a deep impression of you in the minds of the many hundreds who heard you last night. Notwithstanding the bickerings of a handful of Christians, who have always to say something behind the screen, we do assure you that you carry with you a name which will be for a long time remembered by the Ceylon Buddhists.

We regret that your stay in Ceylon is so limited, but hope to see you among us once more.

Wishing you a safe voyage, long life, and success in the laudable work in which you are engaged, we beg to subscribe for ourselves, and in behalf of the mass of Buddhists in Panadure,

Dear sir, your most obedient servants,

GALLE.

On the following morning I took leave of the friends from Colombo, as well as Panadura, who repeatedly expressed the wish I would pay them another visit. I took the train for Kattura, where I took stage for Galle, arriving there at 4 P. M. I should say that before leaving Panadure I had a very pleasant interview with Mr. John J. Couray, who invited me to his house and presented me a work on Buddhism. I found him a very pleasant and intelligent man.

I had been but a short time at the hotel when Mr. Gooneratne sent his carriage for me, and I at once was conveyed to his very pleasant residence at the edge of the town, where I was most cordially received and made very comfortable what time I remained in Galle. He fills an important position under the government and is a man highly respected by both Europeans and natives. I found Mrs. Gooneratne a very pleasant woman, and more in the European and American style than any woman I have met in Asia.

I delivered a lecture in the hall of the Theosophical Society in Galle on the night of my arrival, and another on the following night. The first, a comparison between Buddhism and Christianity, was interpreted; the second was to an audience which understood English, and was an examination of the two main pillars of Christianity—a fable and a dream—the fable in the first book in the Old Testament, and the dream in the first chapter of the New Testament. I think I succeeded in showing that these foundation pillars are extremely rotten and illy calculated for sustaining a great system of religion. I had very good audiences, but would doubtless had doubly as large had not a heavy thunder shower set in about an hour before each lecture. The rain was by far the heaviest I have seen since leaving America. Ceylon cannot be called a dry climate. The sun and winds take up so much vapor from the surrounding ocean that the atmosphere is at all times highly charged with moisture, and it can rain at short notice at almost any time. I think there is three times as much moisture in the atmosphere here as in India and many other countries. The frequent rains keep vegetation exceedingly green and luxuriant, but there is a decided tendency for things to become musty and moldy in a short time.

I feel sure I succeeded in gaining many friends in Galle, and among her best people. Many called upon me and seemed really sorry for me to leave them. I obtained here, as in other places, subscribers for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and many here as well as elsewhere urged me to come again. The high-priest, Bulatgama Terunnanse Meriangoda, called upon me, also another learned priest, Weligama Dhamma Jala. They are highly learned in the precepts of Buddha, but I found I could teach them some very simple lessons in the laws of nature. After my return from my last lecture, I found one of these awaiting my return, when we had a long conversation upon the shape, size, and motions of the earth, as well as other topics. He was loth at first to admit the earth to be a sphere, and supposed the water of the ocean to be perfectly level. I soon convinced him that thousands had traveled around it, and that I was myself nearly half way around. I illustrated by means of an orange, the lamp, etc., how the earth revolves around the sun, and on its own axis, how the moon accompanies the earth and revolves around it in twenty-nine days, how eclipses of the sun and moon are produced, what causes summer and winter in the Northern and Southern hemispheres, etc., etc. These facts seemed new and very interesting to him. And then, again, I thought, this was an instance where less studying of Buddha would have answered, if nature's operations had been studied more. He invited me to call upon him at his pansala near the temple. Accordingly on the next morning, and the day of my departure, Mr. Gooneratne accompanied me to the temple, where I saw the high priest and a dozen others. They showed me the temple, the figure of Buddha in various positions; showed me their library of palm-leaf books, and here I saw a copyist busily engaged copying one of the books with the stylus. He did the work with neatness and dispatch.

BUDDHISM.

I am now ready to say good-bye to Galle and to Ceylon, for the Khiva is out in the harbor, and she is to bear me to Penang and Singapore. But I must not leave just yet, for I promised to give you a chapter on Buddhism when I reached Ceylon. I like to keep my promise, and this one must not be disregarded, as I wish you to know as much about Buddhism as possible, for, take it all in all, it is the greatest and the best of the great systems of religion which the world has had. Perhaps the religion of Confucius was nearly as good, but it seems to me that Buddha was a more profound man than Confucius, more of a metaphysician, more of a philosopher; besides, his religion has had and still has three times the following, of any other system of religion the world has known.

I think I can do more justice to the system, and more justice to you, by giving some quotations from Dr. Hunter's new work, "The Indian Empire, Its History, People, and Products," just issued from the press of Trubner & Co., London. As I learn, it meets the approval of such Buddhists as have seen it. I feel sure I will not be imparting wrong information by thus quoting. In a chapter on Buddhism and Brahmanism is the following:

"The first great solvent of Brahmanism was the teaching of Gautama Buddha. The life of this celebrated man has three sides—its personal aspects, its legendary developments, and its religious consequences upon mankind. In his person Buddha appears as a prince and preacher of ancient India. In the legendary developments of his story Buddha ranks as a divine teacher . . . and apparently as a saint of the Christian church, with a day assigned to him in both the Greek and Roman calendars. As a religious founder, he left behind a system of belief which has gained more disciples than any other creed in the world, and which is now professed by five hundred million of people, or nearly one-half of the human race.

"The story of Buddha's career is a typical one. It is based on the old Indian ideal of the noble life which we have seen depicted in the Sanskrit epics. Like the Pandavas in the Mahabarata, and like Rama in the Ramayana, Buddha is the son of a king, belonging to one of the two great Aryan lines, the solar and the lunar; in his case, as in Rama's, to the solar. His youth, like that of the epic heroes, is spent under Brahman tutors, 'and at the end' Buddha retires, like Rama, to a Brahman hermitage in the forest. . . . It is to the jungles on the south of the Ganges . . . that the royal exile repaired. After a time of seclusion, the Pandavas, Rama, and Buddha alike emerge to achieve great conquests, the two former by force of arms, the last by the weapons of the spirit. Up to this point the outline of the three stories has followed the same type; but henceforth it diverges. The Sanskrit epics depict the ideal Aryan man as prince, hermit, and hero. In the legend of Buddha that ideal has developed into prince, hermit, and saint.

"Their whole life (of the Brahmans) was mapped out into four clearly-defined stages of discipline. For their existence, in its full religious significance, commenced not at birth but upon being invested at the close of childhood with the sacred thread of the twice-born. Their youth and early manhood were to be entirely spent in learning by heart from some Brahman the inspired scriptures, tending the sacred fire, and serving their preceptor. Having completed his long studies, the Brahman enters on the second stage of his life, as a householder. He married and commenced a course of family duties. When he had reared a family and gained a practical knowledge of the world he retired into the forest as a recluse for the third period of his life, feeding on roots or fruits, and practicing his religious duties with increased devotion. The fourth stage was that of the ascetic or religious mendicant, wholly withdrawn from earthly affairs, and striving to attain a condition of the mind which, heedless of the joys or pains or wants of the body, is intent only on its final absorption into the deity. The Brahman, in this fourth stage of his life, ate nothing but what was given to him unasked, and abode not more than one day in any village, lest the vanities of the world should find entrance into his heart. Throughout his whole existence he practiced a strict temperance, drinking no wine, using a simple diet, curbing the desires, shut off from the tumults of war, and having his thoughts ever fixed on study and contemplation. 'What is this world?' says a Brahman sage. 'It is even as the bough of a tree on on which a bird rests for a night, and in the morning flies away.'

"The Brahmans, therefore, were a body of men who in an early stage of this world's history bound themselves by a rule of life, the essential precepts of which were self-culture and self-restraint. As they married within their own caste, begat children only during their prime, and were not liable to lose the finest of their youth in war, they transmitted their best qualities in an ever-increasing measure to their descendants. The Brahmans of the present day are the result of three thousand years of hereditary education and self-restraint; and they have evolved a type of mankind quite distinct from the surrounding population. Even the passing traveler in India marks them out alike from the bronze-checked, large-limbed, leisure-loving Rajput or warrior caste of Aryan descent; and from the dark-skinned, flat-nosed, thick-lipped, low castes of non-Aryan origin, with their short bodies and bullet heads. The Brahman stands apart from both, tall and slim, with finely modeled lips and nose, fair complexion, high forehead, and slightly cocoanut-shaped skull—the man of self-centered refinement. He is an example of a class becoming the ruling power in a country, not by force of arms but by the vigor of hereditary culture and temperance. One race has swept across India after another, dynasties have risen and fallen, religions have spread themselves over the land and disappeared. But since the dawn of history the Brahman has calmly ruled, swaying the minds and receiving the homage of the people, and accepted by foreign nations as the highest type of Indian mankind.

"Gautama, afterward named Buddha, 'the Enlightened' and Siddhartha, 'he who has fulfilled his end,' was the only son of Suddhodana, king of Kapilavastu. This prince, the chief of the Sakya clan, ruled over an outlying Aryan settlement on the northeastern border of the middle land, about a hundred miles to the north of Benares and within sight of the snow-topped Himalayas. A Gautama Rajput of the noble solar line, he wished to sished to see his son grow up on the warlike model of his race. But the young prince shunned the sports of his playmates, and retired to solitary day-dreams in nooks of the palace garden. The king tried to win his son to a practical career by marrying him to a beautiful and talented girl; and the youthful Gautama unexpectedly proved his manliness by a victory over a flower of the young Rajput chiefs at a tournament. For a while he forgot his solemn speculations on the unseen in the sweet realities of early married life. But in his drives through the city he deeply reflected on the types of old age, disease, and death which met his eye; and he was powerfully impressed by the calm of a holy man, who seemed to have raised his soul above the changes and sorrows of this world. After ten years his wife bore to him an only son; and Gautama, fearing lest this new tie should bind him too closely to the things of earth, retired about the age of thirty to a cave among the forest-clad spurs of the Vindhyas. The story of how he turned away from the door of his wife's lamp lit chamber, denying himself even a parting caress of his new-born babe lest he should wake the sleeping mother, and galloped off into the darkness, is one of the many tender episodes in his life. After a gloomy night ride, he sent back his one companion, the faithful charioteer, with his horse and jewels to his father. Having cut off his long Rajput locks, and exchanged his princely raiment for the rags of a poor passer-by, he went on alone a homeless beggar. This abandonment of earthly pomp and power, and of loved wife and new-born son, is the Great Renunciation, which forms a favorite theme of the Buddhist scriptures in Sanskrit, Pali, and Chinese. It has furnished, during twenty centuries, the type of self-sacrifice which all Indian reformers must follow if they are to win the trust of the people."

For a time he had studied under two Brahman recluses near Rajagriha in Patna district, learning from them that the path to divine knowledge "Lies through the subjection of the flesh. . . . The temple of Buddh-Gaya marks the site of his long penance. But instead of earning peace of mind by fasting and self-torture, he reached a crisis of religious despair. . . . Torn with doubts as to whether, after all his penance, he was not destined to perdition, the haggard ascetic, in a final paroxysm, fell senseless to the earth. When he recovered the mental struggle had passed. He felt that the path to salvation lay not in self-torture in a mountain cave, but in preaching a higher life to his fellow-men."

Like Christ, he is tempted by Mara, the enemy of mankind.

"From his temptation in the wilderness, the ascetic emerged with his doubts forever laid at rest, seeing his way clear, and henceforth to be known as Buddha, literally, 'The Enlightened.' This was Buddha's second birth; and the pipal fig or Bo under whose spreading branches its pangs were endured has become the sacred tree of five hundred millions of mankind in the East. . . . The idea of a second birth was familiar to the twice-born Aryan castes of ancient India. . . . In this, as in other features, the story of Buddha adheres to ancient Aryan types, but gives to them a new spiritual significance. . . . He developed from the old Brahmanical model of the wandering ascetic, intent only on saving his own soul, the nobler type Homeward Bound.

The latest report we get from Mr. Bennett is as follows:

OGDEN, UTAH, June 27, 1882.

DEAR EUGENE: I am pursuing my homeward way. I visited Reno, Virginia City, and Carson in Nevada, and had interviews with TRUTH SEEKER friends in each place. In the two former places I was urged to stop over and address a public meeting, but feeling so anxious to pursue my eastward journey I felt impelled to decline the invitations. I hav had an interesting visit at the "Holy City," the Zion of the Latter Day Saints. A reception was tendered me at the Liberal Institute on Sunday night, the 25th inst. The hall was well filled with the best of the citizens of Salt Lake City. Mr. E. L. T. Harrison presided and made me welcome in a neat speech of twenty minutes. I spoke for an hour and a half, after which came very hearty handshakings and congratulations. Several subscribed for THE TRUTH SEEKER and the five volumes of Around the World. The friends of Salt Lake City were very kind to me.

I came here yesterday morning. A delegation of friends met me at the station and escorted me in a carriage through the city, and through the very grand Ogden Canyon—seven miles in length—north of the city. The towering rocks on either side, almost perpendicular, and a thousand feet high, and the rushing river down the canyon, with the dancing cascades and waterfalls coming in from lateral canyons, were most picturesque and interesting to view. We took an excellent dinner up there in nature's cathedral. An enthusiastic reception was given me at the Opera House last evening. Mr. James Horrocks presided and made the opening remarks. Mr. John A. Jost read the following "Welcome:"

"Our honored and highly esteemed friend and brother, we bid you welcome.

"Hero opposer of the Christian church in its desecration of the sacred rights of our glorious constitution, we rejoice to meet you.

"We hav followed you from the shore of the Atlantic with the deepest feelings of love and friendship, and with a fond solicitude for your safety and comfort upon your long and arduous journey eastward to this place, and shall continue to follow you with the same feelings till you shall again reach the most sacred spot on earth you left some eleven months ago—home, sweet home.

"We cannot forego the pleasure of meeting you as you pass through our prospering city, and detaining you while we grasp the hand and look upon the countenance of the great and brave man—the hero opponent of religious persecution of the nineteenth century, who braved the degradation of the prison cell, and the horrors of the priestly inquisition of a Christian bigoted priesthood, through their executiv, Comstock, the Torquemada of to-day, that the rights of all should be tolerated—the man who braved contumely to advocate the rights of others to differ from him.

"We glory in your courage and disinterested love in advocating the equal rights of every citizen of this fair land, and for your determined effort to preserve the same from the power of religious tyranny that would, if once in possession of that power, again confront the unbeliever with the rack, the fagot, and the fire.

"Our friend and brother, the sincere desires, wishes, and hopes of thousands disenthralled from religious errors hav followed you with an enthusiasm worthy of the cause in which you are engaged.

"We rejoice that you hav been preserved to return to you nativ land—the country consecrated to liberty—the home of the brave, which should be the land of the free. We are proud to say that none returned entitled to a more hearty welcome or a more honored reception than the brave, noble, and endeared in the hearts of every true Liberal, our beloved brother, D. M. Bennett.

"You will please accept this small token of love and esteem as the outpourings of the hearts and souls of the Liberals of Ogden and vicinity in unison with Liberal League of Ogden city at the hands of this committee appointed by them for this labor of love; and may our fondest hopes be realized in your continued success, and in hearing at an early day of your safe arrival home, of the continued love of warm hearts, the shake of ready hands, and the embrace of your faithful wife.

"JOSEPH SEWELL, JAMES HORROCKS,
"JOHN A. JOST, JOHN HORROCKS,
"C. P. LAMBERT, Sec. Com., F. H. MARSH.
"Committee."

My remarks were continued for an hour and a half and were frequently applauded. I hav met with a truly cordial meeting here. This morning I resume my homeward way to Denver and other points in Colorado. I am anxious to be with you once more.

Christian Begging.

We presume the Y. M. C. Association made a mistake in sending the following to us:

YANKTON, DAK., June 20, 1882.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: The recently-organized Young Men's Christian Association of this city, having opened a public reading room, is desirous of supplying the same with all the leading periodicals of the country.

We shall endeavor to make our rooms a place of resort for all who appreciate good reading, and papers on our tables will become well advertised in this vicinity.

If you should see proper to send us a copy of your publication on the above inducement, we would be most happy to receive it. If not, then please inform us what, if any, reduction will be made in favor of our association from your regular subscription rates.

Very respectfully, DUANE RIFENBARK, Cor. Sec.

We are afraid the young Christians of Yankton would not read THE TRUTH SEEKER if we sent it to them, which we hav no idea of doing unless they pay subscription price. We do not make any reduction to clergymen and other dead beats. If they want the paper they can hav it for $3 per year cash in advance. We sometimes trust Liberals, but must positivly insist on pay in advance from Christians, especially Y. M. C. A's., whose reputation around here is not particularly good.

What Before A.D.?

As it always givs us pleasure to oblige our friends (and at the same time disoblige our enemies), we will tell Mr. Griswold what.

AUBURN, N. Y., June 8, 282.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Please publish in THE TRUTH SEEKER for the benefit of myself and all others who may not be fortunate enough to know, the following information, viz.: What data were made use of, or what events or epochs were taken for chronological cycles, prior to the Christian "in the year of our Lord." I hav asked several of my Christian clergyman friends, but failing to get any two answers alike, and not being wholly satisfied, deeming their different replies, although probably truthfully intended, unreliable, I cordially request an answer from an Infidel source.

Hoping to get, as heretofore, good, secular, reliable information at your earliest convenience, I, with many thanks, will for the first time beneath the new "Bruno-Wakeman" cycle, subscribe myself.

L. DEWITT GRISWOLD.

There is much incompleteness in all the chronological tables of the ancients. The earliest written annals of the Greeks and Romans are lost, and various events are taken to reckon time from. Apollodorus, an Athenian, who lived in the second century B.C., dated his chronicles of events from the supposed period of the fall of Troy. In Egypt they kept the records by dynasties of sovereigns. Various epochs were selected by different writers, each community having its own epoch and method of time reckoning. Thus, in one city the reckoning was by succession of kings, in another by annual magistrates, in a third by succession of priests, those ubiquitous calamities which hav befallen all peoples and nations.

This helter-skelter method was not found satisfactory to those nations which had commercial intercourse with each other, and the need of a common epoch was severely felt. This led to the adoption of such a starting-point by several peoples, the most important of which were the Babylonians, the Greek, and the Roman. The Jews had no general era, properly so-called. In Babylonia time was reckoned from the era of Nabonassar, 747 B.C. Among the Greeks the reckoning was by Olympiads, the beginning being the year in which Corœbus, who was a half-mythical character, was victor in the Olympic games, 776 B.C. The Roman chronology was started from the foundations of the city, the date of which is variously given, but usually assigned to 753 B.C. The Chinese and other Asiatic nations reckon not only the years but months and days by cycles of sixty.

The Julian period, invented by Joseph Scaliger in 1582, although not a proper chronological era, affords considerable facility for the comparison of different eras with one another. It makes the first year of the Christian era correspond with the year 4714 of the Julian period.

The Olympic games, by which the Greeks reckoned time, were celebrated once every four years, between the new and full moon first following the summer solstice. Their origin is lost in the dimness of remote antiquity, but it is invested by priestly legends with a sacred character. The Olympiad, or period of four years, was designated by the name of the victor in the foot-race.

Before the Israelites left Egypt their year began with the autumnal equinox. But in order to celebrate their deliverance the month in which that took place was afterward regarded as the beginning of the ecclesiastical, which was also the legal year. After their dispersion, the Jews had recourse to the astronomical rules and cycles of the "heathen" nations. They adopted a cycle of eighty-four years, which was made by borrowing the Caliphic period of seventy-six years, and the Greek octaeteris of eight years. After the Nicene council the Jews abandoned this cycle. They now, and hav since the fifteenth century, date from the creation of the world, which is very indefinit, the dates in the Bible being assigned in comparativly modern times. The three versions of the Bible—the Hebrew, the Samaritan, the Septuagint—differ in such a degree that the accounts are totally irreconcilable, and no reason can be given for preferring one to another. There is nothing by which to compare them. One writer collected two hundred different calculations of the date of the creation, with thirty-four centuries variation.

The Babylonian era of Nabonassar was followed by Hipparchus and Ptolemy, with a year of 365 days.

The Macedonian era dates from the occupation of Babylon by Selucus Niator, 311 B.C.

The Mohammedan epoch is the hegira, or flight of Mohammed from Mecca to Medina, 622 A.D. But as this is subsequent to Christ, perhaps it is irrelevant to the question.

The dating from Christ is a superstitiously arbitrary affair, and fails to satisfy in the simplest manner the conditions necessary for registering the succession of events. Being placed in an intermediate period it is necessary to work both ways, and some confusion is made by chronologers calling the year preceding the period 1 B.C., while astronomers denote the year as 0. Even after the adoption in Europe of the Christian era a great variety of methods of dating grew up and prevailed in different countries for a long time. Altogether, the chronology of the world is much mixed. Before Christ most nations dated from their most important events, and it is plainly seen what a mess they hav made of it. There was nothing in their epochs which could commend them to any but themselvs, as there is nothing in the Christian era but guess-work to date from. The Bruno-Wakeman calendar would be a good substitute, inasmuch as it has a basis of common sense and fact, and serves to memorize an event in history of immense moment to the human race.

PHILADELPHIA, June 18, 1882.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: As I hav never addressed you before for information, I hope this will receive your attention. A Christian friend asks me, "Why is it that all, or nearly all, heathens believe in immortality. Although they hav crude and vague ideas, what inculcates that idea?" I being a young and poorly read Infidel, am unable to giv what I consider a satisfactory answer, and having seen similar questions answered in THE TRUTH SEEKER (of which I am a subscriber), I concluded to refer it to you. I hope you will giv me an annihilating, reply, as you did Mr. Scholes some time ago.

WALTER COLLINS.

Immortality is mostly a question of personal belief among enlightened people. A hundred persons will hav a hundred different ideas regarding it. The belief is born of a hope that it may be so; that after we hav toiled for a few years, with no apparent advantage gained, we may be permitted by Mother Nature to continue our existence in another sphere. That many nations hav had these hopes proves that all are more or less allied in thought and feeling. But to say that all hav so believed is incorrect. The Buddhists' heaven is Nirvana, which their souls will attain after many transmigrations. This Nirvana is annihilation, or endless sleep. This sect comprises a good share of the population of the world—some 500,000,000.

The origin of the belief in immortality is only a question to speculate upon; it can never be definitly settled. There are people with this belief, and there are people without it. The question is, is it true? Nature having inspired men with a desire for existence, it is but natural that they should dread being blotted out. Bacon said that men fear death for the same reason that children dread the dark. And as a child would naturally seek to escape from a dark room, which its fears people with monsters, so men seek to escape the darkness of the tomb by the hope of a resurrection. Whether there is any more substantial foundation for it than their hopes, nobody knows. Spiritualists say they hav evidence sufficient to establish the fact, but this the Materialists deny, and it may still be regarded as an open question.

But a future life is no argument in favor of Christianity. The church has no patent on the idea, and she has never produced a particle of evidence to support it. She has made assertions, but assertions are not facts, and while the belief in heaven is a part of every Christian creed, the church has left it for the reviled Spiritualists to demonstrate its existence. And immortality, if it were a fact, would do nothing to prove the dogmas of the church, or the claims of the Bible. Suppose Adam's soul to be in hell, in consequence of his fall, it would afford no evidence that he was made of dust, or that men to-day are forced to labor because he is there. And if Noah is keeping him company, does that fact sustain the flood? Admitting that this life is not all there is of us, does it prove that Jesus was born without a father, or went to heaven bodily, or that Elijah went up in a whirlwind or a chariot of fire? Admitting that when the grave closes over the clay, the soul dons wings of light, does it prove that the innocent must suffer for the guilty, or that the guilty can be justified by such suffering? Does it prove that from all time certain people hav been marked for heaven, and certain other people for hell? Does it afford the slightest evidence that mankind are totally depraved, and unable, of themselvs, to do anything truly good?

The belief in immortality is a great problem, and not to be lightly settled in a breath. There may be something real in this idea, which has fed the hope of millions, and it may be but faith's shadowy vision, or love's pleasing dream. But "it was not born of any book, nor of any creed, nor of any religion. It was born of human affection. It is the rainbow—Hope shining upon the tears of grief."

More Dirty Work.

By the following letter and extract, having reference to Clark Braden's scurrilous attack upon Col. Ingersoll, published in pamphlet form, itwill be seen that the notorious libeler is still alive and "doing his master's work:"

EUREKA, NEV., June 19, 1882.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I clip the within scrap from the Eureka Daily Sentinel of the 18th. It speaks for itself. As some of your readers possibly would like to know what came forth from the last turn of the wheel, I send it to you. Yours truly, G. L. GREEN.

THE EXTRACT.

A fifteen-page pamphlet comes to us under a glaring, sensational head. It is further described as a "scathing and fearless expose" of the famous Infidel writer and lecturer. There may be some persons who will want to purchase this book. For the information of any such persons as will take pleasure in the perusal of the highly-spiced scandal, we will say that it is published by Clark Braden, No. 315 East 65th street, New York, for ten cents a copy. We hav not read the book. It is not likely that any of us about this ranch will ever hav leisure to read it. We may be losers thereby. If so, we are sorry for it, that's all. But when you find a scandal put up under such head lines, and note; also, on the title page, a winged female demon, brandishing a dagger in her right hand, and with a spear in her left with which she holds pierced and aloft the skull of her victim; when you find this, and behold the devil in the corner gloating over human reputation blasted, you are not apt to feel like perusing the narrativ, unless you are disposed to chuckle over a lie. If anybody starts out to tell you something bad of your neighbor, and he givs himself away by displaying a motiv of interest for his scandal, especially if you discern that he proposes to make money by attacking said neighbor in his good name, listen to him, if you can't help it, but stick a pin in what he tells you and fasten it down as a lie. Judging from such surface appearances as referred to, we think it, dollars to red apples, that Mr. Clark Braden's sensational, money-turning pamphlet is largely more false than true.

But if the filth were true, what then? It can hav no force to break down what Ingersoll has spoken and written. His arguments must be overthrown by logic among reasoners, and possibly by faith among enthusiastic religionists. Scandal may demolish the man, but it cannot impair his literary work. That will stand until it is proven untrue. Beautiful flowers grow out of dung, and truth may flourish in a filthy mind. We do not affirm that Ingersoll is a bad man or a good man. It is not necessary. And his argument against the authenticity of revelation may be all bosh. We don't know anything about that, nor do we believe that anybody knows anything about what there is such war and pious wrangling over. But we do know that the world condemns Byron and N. P. Willis and a host of others for the private life they led, while the value of their contributions to literature has never been questioned. Still, Mr. Braden's scandal pamphlet will get into the swirl of sensational yellow-back reading. As gossip, for which there is as great an itch at the present time as ever, it will, no doubt, prove a toothsome morsel.

Undoubtedly Braden is using his pamphlet to get money. If he should succeed in getting enough to purchase a coffin, and would then use it, the decent portion of the world could rejoice. Detraction and slander appear to be the only weapon left the church since Anthony Comstock turned his attention to lottery and faro dealers.

URN BURIAL. An argument for cremation. Price, ten cents. For sale at this office.

Cremation is a subject that ought to be better understood by the people, and its promoters hav done well in issuing this pamphlet. They will do better if they will establish crematories in which the practical working of the science may be demonstrated. Such works, by showing how much superior this process is to the old one of burial, would help the cause of cleanliness much more than any tract that could be written. But if we cannot hav a whole loaf we must be satisfied with a half, and so this little work is most acceptable as a missionary document, for we believe in cremation. The reduction to ashes in a few moments of the dead seems much better to us than to lay them in the earth, rioting-ground for worms and festering heaps of mold. And we are glad to learn from the "Urn Burial" that the system is gradually growing into favor. Of course it is a heresy, and therefore is frowned upon by the church, which now practically monopolizes all the sacred rites of life and death, but the sensible portion of the world, including the press and some considerable portion of the medical faculty, are beginning to advocate its adoption. The reasons for it are cleanliness, economy, a healthy sentiment, and the prevention of burying alive.

THE SABBATH. A series of articles originally published in the Bremer County Independent. By M. Farrington, Denver, Iowa. Price not given. Address the author.

A very valuable summary of the arguments on the Sunday question. The author has drawn material from all sources, including divines, historians, theologians, and even from the New Testament. He finds that Sunday is no better than any other day, that it was instituted and established by man, and that the twenty-four hours from Saturday night to Monday morning are no more sacred than the preceding or following twenty-four. Mr. Farrington has done his work well, and every bigoted Christian who wishes to make Sunday a day of gloom should hav this book thrust into his hand to remind him that the Sabbath was made for man and not man for the Sabbath.

THE PLEASURES OF LIFE. By F. S. Ryman, Cornell University, Ithica, N. Y. Price not given. Address the author.

This poem was written, the author informs us, when he was about nineteen, and is designed as a slight echo of Owen Meredith's "Lucille," which he regards as a masterpiece of poetic grandeur. The scholar falls far short of his master, of course, but he has produced some very pretty verse, barring some slight mechanical faults, and if he does not instruct as deep as Epicurus did, the book will at least serve to gild an idle hour with pleasure and profit.

THE post-office authorities of Boston hav refused to forward at second-class rates No. 24 of George Chainey's This World. The reasons given for this extraordinary step are (1) that the number in question was accompanied by a supplement which, it is alleged, "does not come within the definition of a supplement," and (2) because Mr. Chainey stated in his issue of Jan. 7th that he would sooner send This World for $1 per year to those too poor to pay $2 than hav them say, "Stop my paper." This second objection, the acting first assistant postmaster-general declares, puts This World among "publications designed for free circulation, or for circulation at nominal rates." Mr. Chainey defends This World ably against these ridiculous and wholly groundless charges. Referring to this decision, which he prints, he says:

"The above made our last week's mailing bill $26 instead of $5. We would not mind this, if the official decision were according to law. If this ruling is not in direct antagonism with the language of the law, then there is no meaning to words nor truth in figures. The United States Official Postal Guide says (page 703, rule 172): 'There is no objection to a paper consisting entirely of literary matter being adopted as a supplement, and sent at the pound rate with the paper it supplements. . . .

"'The supplement must contain matter printed therein, either because there was no room for it in the body of the paper without the sacrifice of legitimate matter, or because received too late to be printed in the paper, or for greater convenience in the mechanical process of issuing a paper.' These rulings cover the ground: our supplement was composed entirely of literary matter. We were compelled to print it in this way, in order to hav it appear, for the reason given in the supplement. Any one desiring to be just would hav seen at once that it was fully authorized by the ruling, 'or for the greater [convenience in the] mechanical process of issuing the paper.' The authority who made this decision, with these rulings before him, might as well hav knocked us down and taken $20 from our pockets. We hav no more respect for the man who defrauds in the name of the law than we hav for him who steals in defiance of it."

Border Ruffianism in Liberal.

G. H. Walser, founder of the beautiful little town of Liberal, Mo., was mobbed here by a crowd of Methodist Christians on Sunday, June 19th. The facts in the case are as follows: Mr. Walser owned about two thousand acres of land here, and started a town, and wished to hav no saloon, no sectarian churches, hell, god, or devil. He was getting along nicely, and was an eyesore to the orthodox Christions, who could not bear to hav it said that a place could thrive without the foregoing institutions; hence they pushed in, got part possession of a lot, and built a gospel shop on it for sectarian purposes, contrary to the wishes of Mr. Walser and other Liberals who had an interest in the lot. The church was dedicated to man by the Liberals, but the Christians took forcible possession, held the keys, appointed trustees, and did not recognize the Liberals who held an interest in the property. On the above-mentioned day, Mr. Walser and a number of Liberals attended a meeting held there by the Methodists. At a proper time Mr. Walser arose to announce a lecture; but before he could say anything these godly people began to cry, "Put him out!" and rushed upon him, pulling him this way and that, hooting and howling like lunatics. Mr. Walser's friends rushed in and rescued him from the mob, but not until they had injured him by wrenching his arms and knocking out some of his teeth. They no doubt intended to kill him on the spot, and had it not been for his friends they would hav accomplished their cowardly and dastardly design. Some of these Christians made the remark afterward that they would hav things their way or they would walk over dead bodies.

During the afternoon a warrant was got out for Mr. Walser's arrest for disturbing public service. The trial came on the following Tuesday at Lamar, the county seat of Barton, and lasted four days. About twenty witnesses were examined on each side. Three lawyers were employed by the prosecution. Mr. Walser, assisted by Mr. Hartless, a young and shrewd lawyer, conducted his own defense, and it was ably done.

From the very commencement it was evident that it was persecution, not prosecution. Liberalism, Infidelity, Christianity, God, Jesus, and the devil were all on trial. Not ten words could be asked one of the state's witnesses before the questions would be put, "Is Walser an Infidel? Is he opposed to the Christian religion?" To gratify their desires Mr. Walser allowed them to throw open the flood gates. He told them to go on, and if he had done one single wrong since he had lived in Barton county (a period of two years), dig it up and place it before the jury, and he would abide by the consequence. He did not believe in orthodox Christianity, claimed the right to think and investigate, and would do it; he would not sacrifice his manhood to please superstition and ignorance. Nearly all the witnesses for the prosecution, when asked what kind of a gathering was at the church, said it was a Christian gathering, and that they knew of no other religion than the Christian religion in this county.

Mr. Walser was not convicted. He made an able plea in his own defense. He is one of the best lawyers in southwestern Missouri, and defended himself ably and manfully. At present the preacher and several of his congregation are under arrest for mobbing Mr. Walser, and the trial will come off shortly.

Was Goldsmith Mistaken?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In "The Letters of a Chinese Citizen of the World," prominent doctors of the Christian faith are mentioned and several quotations made from their writings concerning strange lands and stranger people which they (the doctors) claimed to hav visited while preaching the "gospel."

Foot-notes gave the names of the writers, and I think the books (it was ten years since that I read the "Letters"), from which the quotations were made, and the names given in the foot-notes, were some of the early Christian fathers'.

The quotations referred to gave me all the knowledge I hav of the extraordinary discoveries of those pious "traveled fools" in the lying age.

> "Cannibals that do each other eat,
> The anthropophagi, and men whose heads

is all that I recall in Shakspere concerning them.

I did not know until I read George Macdonald's letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER that "cannibals" and "anthropophagi" mean the same thing, but supposed anthropophagi to be the name of the "men with but one leg, that were exceeding swift and lived by the chase," or the "men with heads and shoulders like a greyhound, that taught grammar and music when the Ptolemies reigned in Egypt." This is very nearly the wording of two of Goldsmith's quotations from the fathers.

T. R. STEPHENSON,

Roseville, Cal., June 12, 282.

[Anthropophagi, according to Webster, means cannibals. Webster gets his authority from Charles Lamb. Very likely some of the early Christian writers may hav told of these things. They were an exceedingly ignorant, superstitious, and credulous lot, much given to drawing on their imaginations for their facts; and as these are no tougher yarns than many they did tell and believe, we think they may be fairly given credit for them. —ED. T. S.]

The Freethinkers' Convention.—Reduced Rates of Fare.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The following letter explains itself:

TRUNK LINE COMMISSION.

New York Central and Hudson River, New York, Lake Erie, and Western, Pennsylvania, and Baltimore and Ohio Railroads.

NEW YORK, June 27, 1882.

Referring to your application for special rates of fare to the Freethinkers' National Convention at Watkins Glen, for five days, commencing August 23d, would say that the Trunk Line Committee hav decided to grant your people the usual excursion rates of two cents per mile over their lines. It will be necessary that you should apply to the general passenger agents of the four trunk lines for whatever may be necessary to complete the arrangement.

Yours truly, R. T. RYDER, Secretary.

H. L. Green, Secretary Freethinkers' Association, Salamanca, N. Y.

The reader will perceive that from all stations on the lines of each of the above mentioned roads excursion tickets to the Watkins convention can be procured at two-thirds the usual rates.

I am inclined to think that all persons west of Chautauqua Lake had better purchase excursion tickets to that place, and from there avail themselvs of the above arrangement.

THE State Convention of the Iowa Liberal League will be held on the fair grounds at Tama, Tama county, Sept. 7th, 8th, 9th, and 10th. Except during business sessions the platform will be free to all questions of human interest. A large attendance is hoped for and confidently expected.

H. L. GREEN will lecture in North Hannibal, Oswego county, N. Y., on Sunday, July 9th.

of the preacher, striving to bring deliverance to the souls of others."

Five months after his temptation and three of his ministry Buddha had gathered around him sixty disciples, whom he sent forth to preach salvation, with these words, 'Go ye now and preach the most excellent Law.' The essence of his teaching was the deliverance of man from the sins and sorrows of life by self-renunciation and inward self-control." The conversions he made were numerous.

"Buddha preached throughout a large part of Behar, Oudh, and the districts of the northwestern provinces. Monasteries marked during ages his halting-places; and the principal scenes of his life, such as Ajodhya, Buddh-Gaya, Sravasti, the modern Sahet Mahet, Raja-Griha, etc., became the great places of pilgrimage for the Buddhist world. His visit to his aged father at Kapilavastu, whence he had gone forth as a brilliant young prince, and to which he now returned as a wandering preacher, in dingy yellow robes and the begging bowl in his hand, is a touching episode which appeals to the heart of universal mankind. The old king heard him with reverence. The son whom Buddha had left as a new-born babe was converted to the faith, and his beloved wife, from the threshold of whose chamber he had ridden away into the darkness, became one of the first Buddhist nuns. The Great Renunciation took place in his thirtieth year. . . . His silent self-preparation lasted about six, and during forty-four years he preached to the people. . . . He spent his last night in preaching and in comforting a weeping disciple. . . . He died calmly, at the age of eighty, under the shadow of a fig-tree, at Kusinagara, the modern Kasia, in Gorakhpur District"

"'The Fo-wei-kian-king,' or 'Dying Instruction of Buddha,' translated into Chinese between 397 and 415 A.D. from a still earlier Sanskrit text gives to the last scene a somewhat different, though an equal beauty. 'It was now in the middle of the night,' it says, 'perfectly quiet and still; for the sake of his diciples, he delivered a summary of the law.' After laying down the rules of good life, he revealed the inner doctrines of his faith. 'The heart is lord of the senses: govern, therefore, your heart; watch well the heart. . . . Think of the fire that shall consume the world, and early seek deliverance from it. . . . Lament not my going away, nor feel regret. For if I remained in the world, then what would become of the church? It must perish without its end. From henceforth all my disciples practicing their various duties, shall prove that my true body, the body of the law (Dharmakaya) is everlasting and imperishable. The world is fast bound in fetters; I now give it deliverance. . . . Keep your mind on my teaching; all other things change, this changes not. No more shall I speak to you. I desire to depart. I desire the eternal rest (Nirvana). This is my last exhortation.'"

"The secret of Buddha's success was that he brought spiritual deliverance to the people. He preached that salvation was equally open to all men, and that it must be earned, not by propitiating imaginary deities, but by our own conduct. He thus cut away the religious basis of caste, of the sacrificial ritual, and of Brahman supremacy as the mediators between God and man. He taught that sin, sorrow, and deliverance, the state of a man in this life, in all previous and in all future lives, are the inevitable results of his own acts (Karma). He thus applied the inexorable law of cause and effect to the soul. What a man sows, that he must reap. As no evil remains without punishment, and no good deed without reward, it follows that neither priest nor God can prevent each act bearing its own consequences. Misery or happiness in this life is the unavoidable result of our conduct in a past life; and our actions here will determine our happiness or misery in the life to come. When any creature dies he is born again in some higher or lower state of existence, according to his merit or demerit. His merit or demerit consists of the sum total of his actions in all previous lives. By this great law of Karma, Buddha explained the inequalities and apparent injustice of man's state in this world as the unavoidable consequence of acts in the past; while Christianity compensates those inequalities by rewards in the future. A system in which our whole well being, past, present, and to come, depends on ourselves, leaves little room for a personal God. But the Atheism of Buddha was a philosophical tenet, which does not weaken the sanctions of right and wrong.

"Life, according to Buddha, must always be more or less painful; and the object of every good man is to get rid of the evils of existence by merging his individual soul into the universal soul. This is Nirvana, literally, 'cessation.' Some Buddhists explain it as absolute annihilation, when the soul is blown out like the flame of a lamp. Others hold that it is the extinction of the sins, sorrows, and selfishness of individual life; the final state of union and communion with the supreme, or the absorption of the individual soul into the divine essence. The fact is, that the doctrines underwent processes of change and development like all theological dogmas. 'But the earliest idea of Nirvana,' says one of the greatest authorities on Chinese Buddhism, 'seems to have included in it no more than the enjoyment of a state of rest consequent on the extinction of all causes of sorrow.' The great practical aim of Buddha's teachings was to suddue the lusts of the flesh and the cravings of the mind; and Nirvana has been taken to mean the extinction of the sinful grasping condition of heart which, by the inevitable law of Karma, would involve the penalty of renewed individual existence. The pious Buddhist strove to reach a state of quietism or holy mediation in this world, and looked forward to an eternal calm in a world to come.

"Buddha taught that this end could not be attained by the practice of virtue. He laid down eight precepts of morality, with two more for the religious orders, making ten commandments (dasa-sila) in all. He arranged the besetting faults of mankind into ten sins, and set forth the special duties applicable to each condition of life; to parents and children, to pupils and teachers, to husbands and wives, to masters and servants, to laymen and the religious orders. In place of the Brahman rites and sacrifices, Buddha prescribed a code of practical morality as the means of salvation. The three essential features of that code were control over self, kindness to other men, and reverence for the life of all sentient creatures."

Passing the lengthy descriptions of the missionary aspects and work of Buddhism from its earliest times—the work of the Sixty; the first Buddhist Ecclesiastical Council in 543 B.C., the second—443 B.C., the third—244 B.C.; the numerous and meritorious works of Asoka with his edicts, religious institutions, missionary efforts, etc., we will briefly notice in what that great king has done in reference to the forcible reform resorted to by him, to purify the faith and secure its pristine orthodoxy. Asoka, taking measures to spread the religion, "collected the body of doctrine into an authorative version, in the Magadha language; a version which for two thousand years has formed the canon (pitakas) of the southern Buddhists. . . . Asoka is said to have supported 64,000 Buddhist priests; he founded many religious houses, and his kingdom is called the Land of the Monasteries (Vihara or Behar) to this day."

The fourth council was held four hundred years after Buddha's death, by King Kanishka, the famous Saka conqueror, who ruled over Northwestern India, and whose authority having its nucleus in Kashmir extended to both sides of the Himalayas, from Yarkand and Khokan to Agra and Sind. His council of five hundred (40, A.D.) drew up the three commentaries of the Buddhist faith.

"These commentaries supplied in parts materials for the Thibetan or northern canon, completed at subsequent periods. The northern canon, or, as the Chinese proudly call it, the 'Greater Vehicle of the Law,' includes many later corruptions or developments of the Indian faith as embodied by Asoka in the 'Lesser Vehicle,' or canon of the southern Buddhists (244 B.C.). The Buddhist canon of China, a branch of the 'Greater Vehicle,' was arranged between 67 and 1285 A.D. It includes 1,440 distinct works, comprising 5,586 books. The ultimate divergence between the canons is great, both as to the historical aspects of Buddha's life and as to his teachings. . . . One example will suffice. According to the northern or 'Greater Vehicle,' those who transgressed wilfully after ordination might yet recover themselves; while to such persons the southern or 'Lesser Vehicle' allowed no room for repentance.

"The original northern commentaries were written in the Sanskrit language. . . . Kanishka and his Kashmir Council (40 A.D.) thus became in some degree to the northern or Tibeto-Chinese Buddhists, what Asoka and his Patna Council (244 B.C.) had been to the Buddhists of Ceylon and the south.

"Buddhism was thus organized as a state religion by the councils of Asoka and Kanishka. It started from Brahmanical doctrines; but from those doctrines, not as taught in hermitages to clusters of Brahman disciples, but as vitalized by a preacher of rare power in the capital cities of India. . . . Buddhism carried transmigration to its utmost spiritual use, and proclaimed our own actions to be the sole ruling influence on our past, present, and future states. It was thus led into the denial of any external being or god who could interfere with the immutable law of cause and effect as applied to the soul. But, on the other hand, it linked together mankind as parts of one universal whole, and denounced the isolated self-seeking of the human hearts as the heresy of individuality. Its mission was to make men more moral, kinder to others, and happier themselves; not to propitiate imaginary deities. It accordingly founded its teachings on man's duty to his neighbor, instead of on his obligations to God, and constructed its ritual on a basis of relic-worship or the commemoration of good men, instead of on sacrifice. Its sacred buildings were not temples to the gods, but monasteries (viharas) for the religious orders."

From that time upward Buddhism spread throughout the known lands like lightning. In the year 243 B.C. Mahinda (Sanskrit Mahendra), Asoka's son, with his sister, the Princess Sanghamitta who had entered the order, went to Ceylon with a body of missionaries and nuns. From thence missionaries established the faith in Burmah, 450 A.D. (though two Buddhist preachers landed at Pegu as early as 207 B.C.

"Siam was converted to Buddhism in 638 A.D. . . Yara received its missionaries direct from India, between the fifth and seventh centuries, and spread the faith to Bali and Sumatra. . . . [In a foot-note Dr. Hunter remarks that 'polemical writers, Christian and Chinese, have with equal injustice accused Buddhism and Christianity of consciously plagiarizing each other's rites. Thus Kuang-Hsien, the distinguished member of the Astronomical Board, who brought about the Chinese persecution of the Christians from 1565 to 1671 writes of them: 'They pilfer this talk about heaven and hell from the refuse of Buddhism, and then turn round and revile Buddhism.' (The Death Blow to the Corrupt Doctrines of Tien-chu, i. e., Christianity, p. 46, Shanghai, 1870). 'We hardly see how the Buddhists could think otherwise or be accused of injustice, and along with them all those who study chronology and compare notes, when there is hardly a modern traveler, in Japan, China, and other Buddhist lands but is struck with the similarity. 'The temple at Rokugo,' writes Miss Bird (Unbeaten Tracks in Japan, vol. i, p. 295), from a remote town in Japan, 'was very beautiful, and except that its ornaments were superior in solidity and good taste, differed little from a Romish church. The low altar on which were lilies and lighted candles, was draped in blue and silver; and on the high altar draped in crimson and cloth of gold, there was nothing but a closed shrine, an incense burner and a vase of lotuses.' And further Dr. Hunter himself quotes from another passage of Miss Bird's book: 'In a Buddhist temple at Niagpo, the Chinese goddess of mercy, Kwan-Yin, whose resemblance to the Virgin Mary and child was already mentioned, is seen standing on a serpent bruising his head with her heel." Just as the pictures of the Virgin in thousands of her images we have seen. 'I will put an enmity between thee (the serpent) and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed; it shall bruise thy head and thou shalt bruise his heel,' reads verse 15, chapter iii, Genesis. It is this verse, we are told, that led the early and medieval Christians to adopt its representation in some of the Virgin Mary's images. But it cannot be so. For the verse threatens that the serpent's head will be bruised by the heel of the woman's seed—man, and it is the woman herself personified by the Christian mother of God who bruises the reptile's head. Whence, then, the origin of the allegory? The snake and snake ornamentation are the distinctive features of Hindoo and Buddhist religions, and the latter carried it alike to the east and the west.] Another stream of missionaries had found their way by Central Asia into China. Their first arrival in that empire dates from the second century B.C., although it was not till 65 A.D. that Buddhism then became the established religion. . . . The Scythian dynasties . . . accepted it, and the earliest remains which recent discovery has unearthed in Afghanistan are Buddhist. Kaniska's council soon after the commencement of the Christian era gave a fresh impetus to the faith. Thibet, South Central Asia, and China, lay along the great missionary routes of northern Buddhism; the Kirghis are said to have carried the religion as far as west the Caspian; on the east, the religion was introduced into the Corea in 372 A.D, and thence into Japan in 552. Buddhist doctrines are believed to have deeply affected religious thought in Alexandria and Palestine. The question is yet undecided as to how far the Buddhist ideal of the holy life, with its monks, nuns, relic-worship, bells, and rosaries, influenced Christian monachism. . . . It is certain that the analogies are striking. The form of abjuration for those who renounced the gnostic doctrines of Manes expressly mentions Buddha and Sakya. The Chinese in San Francisco have pictures of the Buddhist goddess of Mercy . . . which the Irish Catholics identify as their Virgin Mary with the infant in her arms, an aureole round her head, an adoring figure at her feet, and the spirit hovering near in the form of a bird."

"Buddhism never ousted Brahmanism . . . but the two systems co-existed as popular religions during more than a thousand years (244 B.C. to about 800 A.D."), writes Dr. Hunter. Fa-hian entered India from Afghanistan in 399–413 A.D., and found Brahman priests equally honored with Buddhist monks, and temples to the Indian gods side by side with the religious houses of the Buddhist faith. A Buddhist monarch ruled over ten kingdoms in Afghanistan. In Kashmir the king and people were devout Buddhists (so late as 645 A.D.), under the teaching of five hundred monasteries and five thousand monks. The vast monastery of Nalanda (identified with the modern Baragáon near Gaya) formed a seat of learning, where ten thousand monks and novices of the eighteen Buddhist schools here studied theology, philosophy, law, science, especially medicine, and practiced their devotions." Hionen Thsang found the two religions mingled everywhere. "On the Madras coast Buddhism flourished. Owing to the gradual increase of domination on the part of the Brahmans, and such persecutions as instigated by Sankara Acharya and Kumarika Bhatta, Buddhism began declining in India toward the sixth century, and "in the eleventh only outlying state, such as Kashmir and Orissa, remained faithful, and, before the Mohammedans came upon the scene, had almost disappeared from India. During the last thousand years Buddhism has been a banished religion from its native home. But it has won greater triumphs in its exile than it could have ever achieved in the land of its birth. It has created a literature and a religion for nearly half the human race, and has affected the beliefs of the other half. Five hundred millions of men, or forty per cent of the inhabitants of the world, still follow the teaching of Buddha. Afghanistan, Nepaul, Eastern Turkistan, Thibet, Mongolia, Manchuria, China, Japan, the Eastern Archipelago, Siam, Burmah, Ceylon, and India at one time marked the magnificent circumference of its conquests. Its shrines and monasteries stretched in a continuous line from what are now the confines of the Russian empire to the equatorial islands of the Pacific. During twenty-four centuries Buddhism has encountered and outlived a series of powerful rivals. At this day it forms, with Christianity and Islam, one of the three great religions of the world, and the most numerously followed of the three.

"The noblest survivals of Buddhism in India are to be found, not among any peculiar body, but in the religions of the people; in that principle of the brotherhood of man, with the reassertion of which each new revival of Hindooism starts; in the asylum which the great Vaishnavite sect affords to women who have fallen victims to caste rules, to the widow and the outcast; in that gentleness and charity to all men which take the place of a poor law in India, and give a high significance to the half satirical epithet of the 'mild' Hindoo."

The following, from Arnold's "Light of Asia," will aid in giving a clear view of the excellence of the religion of the great Indian philosopher and sage:

"But," spake he to the herdsmen, "wherefore, friends,
Drive ye the flocks adown under high noon,
Since 'tis at evening that men fold their sheep?"

And answer gave the peasants, "We are sent
To fetch a sacrifice of goats five score,
And five score sheep, the which our lord the king
Slayeth this night in worship of his gods."

Then said the master, "I will also go."
So paced he, patiently bearing the lamb
Beside the herdsmen in the dust and sun,
The wistful ewe low-bleating at his feet.

So entered they the city side by side,
The herdsmen and the Prince, what time the sun
Gilded slow Sona's distant stream, and threw
Long shadows down the street and through the gate,
Where the king's men kept watch.

Then some one told the king, "There cometh here
A holy hermit bringing down the flock
Which thou didst bid to crown the sacrifice."

The king stood in his hall of offering,
On either hand the white-robed Brahmans ranged,
Muttered their mantras, feeding still the fire
Which roared upon the midmost altar. Then
From scented woods flickered bright tongues of flame,
Hissing and curling as they licked the gifts
Of Ghee and spices and the soma juice,
The joy of Indra. Round about the pile
A slow, thick, scarlet streamlet smoked and ran,
Sucked by the sand, but ever rolling down,
The blood of bleating victims. One such lay,
A spotted goat, long-horned, its head bound back
With munja grass; at its stretched throat the knife
Pressed by a priest, who murmured, "This, dread gods,
Of many yajnas cometh as the crown
From Bimbasara; take ye joy to see
The spirted blood and pleasure in the scent
Of rich roasting 'mid the fragrant flames;
Let the King's sins be laid upon this goat,
And let the fire consume them burning it,
For now I strike."

But Buddha softly said,
"Let him not strike, great king!" and therewith loosed
The victim's bonds, none staying him, so great
His presence was. Then, craving leave, he spake
Of life, which all can take but none can give—
Life, which all creatures love and strive to keep,
Wonderful, dear, and pleasant unto each,
Even to the meanest; yea, a boon to all
Where pity is, for pity makes the world
Soft to the weak and noble for the strong.
Unto the dumb lips of his flock he lent
Sad pleading words, showing how man who prays
For mercy to the gods is merciless,
Being as god to those; albeit, all life
Is linked and kin, and what we slay have given
Meek tribute of the milk and wool, and set
Fast trust upon the hands which murder them.

Nor, spake he, shall one wash his spirit clean
By blood; nor gladden gods, being good, with blood;
Nor bribe them, being evil; nay, nor lay
Upon the brow of innocent bound beasts
One hair's weight of that answer all must give
For all things done amiss or wrongfully.
Alone, each for himself, reckoning with that
The fixed arithmic of the universe,
Which meteth good for good and ill for ill,
Measure for measure, unto deeds, words, thoughts;
Watchful, aware, implacable, unmoved;
Making all futures fruits of all the pasts.
Thus spake he, breathing words so piteous,
With such high lordliness of ruth and right,
The priests drew back their garments o'er the hands
Crimsoned with slaughter, and the King came near,
Standing with clasped palms, reverencing Buddh;
While still our Lord went on, teaching how fair
This earth were if all living things be linked
In friendliness and common use of foods,
Bloodless and pure; the golden grain, bright fruits,
Sweet herbs, which grow for all, the waters wan,
Sufficient drinks and meats, which, when these heard,
The might of gentleness so conquered them,
The priests themselves scattered their altar-flames
And flung away the steel of sacrifice.
And through the land next day passed a decree,
Proclaimed by criers, and in this wise graved
On rock and column, "Thus the King's will is:
There hath been slaughter for the sacrifice
And slaying for the meat, but henceforth none
Shall spill the blood of life nor taste of flesh,
Seeing that knowledge grows, and life is one,
And mercy cometh to the merciful."
So ran the edict, and from those days forth
Sweet peace hath spread between all living kind,
Man and the beasts that serve him, and the birds,
On all those banks of Ganga where our Lord
Taught with his saintly pity and soft speech.

According to the doctrines of Buddha, wisdom and virtue are the two objects to be sought after. Supreme excellence consists in the extinction of all desire. Those who fail to attain this, continue to pass from one state of existence to another. As one lamp is kindled from another, so it is with the successive conditions of the individual. If so fortunate as eventually to overcome all desire, the lamp burns out and existence ceases. This is the condition called Nirvana, (usually pronounced Nirwana by the Buddhists themselves), or the absence of desire. To be is to suffer, to cease to be is to cease to suffer.

The Buddhist, as I have already shown, has no god, he has no miracles, no supernaturalism. Merit and demerit, according to his belief, necessarily produce fruit after their kind. There is no recognition of "propitiation," "pardon," or "atonement." Cause and effect are absolute, but the effect may follow after the individual has passed through several ages of being, and he may be perfectly ignorant of the cause. It is not uncommon for a Buddhist on being plunged into misfortune, to say, "This must be on account of some sin committed by me in a former birth." As a natural consequence of the belief, not of transmigration exactly, but rather of the renewal of existence under various forms, the destruction of animal life is forbidden.

Gautama was not the only Buddha; many existed before him, and he alluded especially to six. Buddhas are persons who in each successive stage of existence have gone on acquiring more and more merit, and less and less desire of every kind. Pleasure and pain, the social relations, the appetites, the emotions of the mind have lost all influence over them. They become indifferent to all things sublunary, and are wrapped in meditation. This last condition is always that of man; on attaining Buddhaship they manifest its acquisition, by what would almost seem as miracles, until existence ceases. Those persons who do not become Buddhas, but subdue their passions and extinguish their desires, are called Rahats, and are believed to enjoy a high state of felicity.

Although established in great purity by its illustrious founder, many innovations have crept in, though perhaps not so much as in other great systems of the world; none perhaps are so pure as when first established. I have already alluded to multiplied images of Buddha, to the offerings of flowers, to the corruptions of the priesthood, and to the inequality of women. Had the teachings of Buddha always been strictly followed these innovations would not have crept in.

All Buddhists are not as enlightened as they should be. Many of them are unquestionably in a low state of ignorance. The abstract refinements and metaphysics of their great teacher are little understood by the masses; and the learned find it a thankless task to endeavor to educate them. It is not strange that these lower classes incline to a species of image-worship, but it is to be regretted that the learned priests wink at it as well as at other absurdities and superstitions which exist. But perhaps Buddhistic priests are like other priests, and uphold the superstitions they themselves do not believe in for the sake of the power they thereby maintain over the people. But the dissemination of education and general intelligence is the true remedy for these ills.

But with whatever faults may be charged to Buddhism, I am decidedly of the opinion that it has produced a higher state of morals than any other system of religion with which I am acquainted. There is to-day less of intoxication, fighting, robbery, stealing, assault and battery, manslaughter, and murder, committed in Buddhistic countries, and more of peacefulness, more of love for animal and human kind, than in Christendom and Mohammedandom. This is the result of a religion with a god, without a divine providence, without a devil, without a prayer, and without supernaturalism. These few words contain more truth, more food for deep thought than volumes of sermons and pious twaddle. Let those who think there is no getting along "without god in the world" ponder well on these truths. They cannot be successfully disputed.

ITEMS OF CEYLON HISTORY.

I do not propose to burden you with a full history of this island, but it does seem as though I ought to give somewhat of its past experiences before bidding it a final adieu.

Its extreme length is 271½ miles, and its greatest breadth, 137½ miles. Its southern point is 5° 55′ north of the equator, and its most northern point, 9° 51′. Its area, including the islands on its northwestern coast, is 25,742 square miles. Its three largest rivers are respectively 134, 84, and 72 miles in length; it has six other shorter ones. It has several mountain peaks between 6,000 and 9,000 feet above the sea.

The inhabitants of the island are divided into five classes: 1. The Veddahs, probably the aborignes of the island, are a barbarous tribe who live by hunting and fishing, with the bow and arrow, and know nothing of civilization. They have no religion save a belief in devils, of which they stand in great fear. Their numbers are few, and decreasing.

2. The Singalese are descendents of Hindoo colonists, who settled in Ceylon three thousand years ago. They are one of the branches of the great Aryan stock, and their language is clearly of Sanscrit origin. They are a handsome, well-made race, and their appearance and character are gentle, rather than bold and aggressive. They have good intellects, and easily become good scholars. They excel in mathematics and practical talent. Their national religion is Buddhism, which was introduced into the island nearly four centuries before the Christian era. Many of the Singalese have Portuguese names, from the fact that the island was once under Portuguese control. The names Fernando, Dias, De Silva, Gomez, etc., are cases in point.

3. The Tamils, who occupy the northern part of the island, and are more or less spread over other portions, were originally from the eastern part of India, and they retain the Tamil language, as well as the Hindoo religion. They differ from the Singalese in appearance, manner, and dress. A cloth around the waist and a turban on the head constitutes their ordinary dress, and the turban is often omitted. They do not generally cultivate the beard and mustache; the hair is worn long, and fastened in a knot, which bachelor dandies are fond of adjusting over one ear. An oleander flower or rose stuck behind the ear is also a mark of attention to appearance. The school-boys are said to often encircle the head with the strip of ola, on which their lesson is written. The highest official office is that of maniagar, and the second that of odiar. These officers are for the most part distinguished by a turban ironed smooth, instead of being folded loosely, and arranged in a peculiar form, somewhat like a cross. It is said that this practice was introduced by the Portuguese, as a mark of the conversion of the wearers to Christianity. If so, the dress has survived the religion. They are industrious, enterprising, and intelligent.

4. The Eurasians or Burghers are descendants from pure Dutch parents, who made the island their home, or an offspring of European and native mixture. The term "burgher" signifies in Dutch a citizen, or, one entitled to the freedom of the borough. It is now generally applied to all having some European blood and who were born in the island.

5. The Moormen are probably the descendants of Arabs who settled in Ceylon and the Indian continent and intermarried with the native races. They speak the Tamil language, though Arabic is taught in their schools. Their religion is Mohammedanism, and their occupation, trade and barter. They are speculative and money-making, and have often been named after their relatives, the Jews. They act largely as merchants and pedlers. They shave their heads, and let the beard grow. They uncover their feet and look grave when they meet an acquaintance.

The Rodias may be treated as a distinct class, though they are usually classed with the Singalese. Many think they are a branch of the Veddahs, and are descendants of the aborigines. Those who think they are Singalese have a tradition that they were the persons whose duty it was to supply the Kandian kings with game; and that on one occasion they produced human flesh, which his majesty enjoyed so much that he directed them to procure more of what he supposed was part of some wild animal. The royal barber, however, learned the facts, and acquainted the king of them. His rage was great; and, as the direst punishment that he could inflict on the offenders, he decreed that henceforth they, as well as their tribe, should be outcasts from other society; that they should not be permitted to pursue any calling, but beg their bread from door to door, and be shunned by everybody. This order of things being once established, it became no unusual thing for the king to punish noble men and women who incurred his displeasure by condemning them to join the Rodias with their whole families—a sentence worse than death. This fact may account for the beauty of form peculiar to this class, in spite of the abject demeanor which their degraded position superinduces. They live in villages of their own, and obtain their subsistence by begging, their importunity and the aversion with which they are regarded being in their favor, for people will gladly give them a trifle to get rid of them. Having formerly been debarred from tilling the soil, they have learnt to make many articles of handicraft, such as grass ropes, baskets, mats, etc. Their habits of life are said to be unnatural and immoral. In former days the women were only allowed to cover the lower part of the person, but this prohibition no longer exists, and they generally wear a colored silk-handkerchief tied around the neck and waist. Their figures are as erect as arrows. One can hardly view a race so fine physically, and so degraded morally, without pity and a desire to see them elevated. It will be long before the Kandians learn to regard them with any other than feelings of aversion. The men might find occupation on public works, but they have so long been accustomed to an idle life that they do not wish regular manual employment.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $8—three for my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER and five for the Round-the-World fund, and oblige, JOHN PHILLIPS.

EAGLE, WIS., June 27, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $5 for the Round-the-World books. Send the first volume in care of F. G. Parks, and as fast as the others are ready send them along. Respectfully, E. L. BOVEE.

GULL RIVER, MINN., June 22, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: The books I recently sent for hav been received, and I like them very much. Inclosed you will find $6—$5 for the Round-the-World books, and $1 for "Marriage and Parentage.

Yours respectfully, ALBERT MASE.

PLYMOUTH, MASS., June 27, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $4, and send one copy of "A Truth Seeker Around the World" to Nathan Churchill, and one copy to Mr. John Shubert. We may become subscribers to the other volumes as they come out to the public. I am both a Spiritualist and a Materialist, which I am glad to see Mr. Bennett is. Materialism is as nothing without the Spiritual, but both together is like a pair of shears. It will shear off all the wool from Christian dogmatism, and then there will be nothing left but the bare hide.

NATHAN CHURCHILL.

PARSIPPANY, MORRIS Co., N. J., June 24, 1882.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: Inclosed you will find seven dollars for the Round-the-World trip, if I am not too late. If the two dollars additional is not enough to bind them in substantial style, please notify at once, and I will send the difference, as I forget the price.

I am glad to learn through THE TRUTH SEEKER of Mr. D. M. Bennett's safe return to American shores and his enthusiastic reception in the "City of the Golden Gate;" and also that our friend, Mrs. Elmina D. Slenker, is enjoying herself so well among her fellow-workers at Boston.

Respectfully, ALICE V. HENNION

EASTERN MICHIGAN CAMP-MEETING AT ORION LAKE.

DETROIT, MICH., June 21, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: One of the most successful meetings ever held in Michigan closed on Sunday last at Orion Lake. It was a six-days' camp-meeting, beginning on Tuesday, June 13th. Orion Lake is situated forty miles north of Detroit, on the Detroit and Bay City railroad, and is one of the most delightful places in the state. The lake covers some sixteen hundred acres of land, and incloses several islands. One gentleman who is familiar with Lake Pleasant declared Orion to far excel in natural beauty that famous rallying-ground of the Spiritual and Liberal forces. Owing to the backwardness of the season, and the great demonstration at the soldiers' reunion in Detroit the same week, the numbers in attendance were not large; but yet the meeting met all of its financial obligations, and was in every other feature a gratifying success. There were representativs from nearly every section of the state and some from other states. Among the latter may be mentioned A. J. Pope, of Indianapolis, Indiana, a most faithful and earnest worker in any line to which he is called.

The more substantial result of the meeting was the organization of the "Fourth District Spiritual-Liberal Association," comprising the counties of Oakland, Macomb, St. Clair, and Lapeer. Last summer a committee was appointed by the Executiv Board of the State Association of Spiritualists and Liberalists to divide the state into districts as a basis for district work. The division comprehends twenty districts, and the new Fourth District Association is the first substantial step in this new departure, which it is hoped may be speedily followed by others. The Association will hold its first annual meeting at Orion in connection with a two-days' grove-meeting the last Saturday and Sunday of August. The provisional officers to hold until that time are: President, Israel C. Smith, Metamora, Lapeer county; Secretary-Treasurer, Mrs. Frances M. Odell, Farmers Creek, Lapeer county; Directors, W. B. Banon, St. Clair, St. Clair county; Charles S. Hutchins, Mt. Clemens, Macomb county; Allen S. Pearsall, Shelby, Macomb county. Owing to the simple accident that no representativ from Oakland county was present at the time the formal organization was made, no one appears in the list from that county; but this will be remedied at the annual meeting.

Our Spiritual and Liberal friends in eastern Michigan took an especial interest in this meeting, as it was the first of the kind held in that part of the state, and this interest insured for it its gratifying measure of success. The utmost harmony prevailed throughout, and the meeting dispersed with no irritation, heart-burnings, or jealousies.

The principal speakers in attendance from Michigan were J. H. Burnham, Mrs. L. A. Pearsall, and Mrs. Sarah Graves; and from abroad the popular Spiritualist speakers were Cephas B. Lynn and H. L. Green, Liberal. Our Michigan friends were most happy to greet this well-known organizer and secretary of the New York Freethinkers' Association; and it is to be hoped that many of them will renew his acquaintance at the coming annual gathering of that influential and efficient agency of progress and Freethought.

A notable fact of the meeting was an address on Sunday evening by Mr. Choate, principal of the village school, in which he placed himself squarely on the Liberal platform. This for a young man whose position in all likelihood will depend upon men subservient to church influences is an act of moral courage that is well worthy of imitation. Mr. Predmore, an old and leading citizen of the place, may also be named among the leading Liberals.

The conference meetings were presided over with dignity and tact by Mrs. Graves.

Charles E. Watkins, the well-known test and slate-writing medium, was present during the entire meeting, and gave the most perfect satisfaction to all who held interviews with him.

The Lapeer Spiritual choir, led by N. P. Wadsworth, with Mrs. Odell as organist, rendered excellent music, and Miss Palmer, of Romeo, gave some fine vocal improvisations.

Copies of most of the leading Spiritual and Liberal papers were there, and were announced from the rostrum, and placed in the hands of Mrs. Lucie E. Owen, of Lapeer, as general agent.

Among the literary contributions to the occasion were two very pretty poetical efforts, the first a "Welcome," by Mrs. Owen, last named, and the other "Destiny," by Mrs. S. S. Allen, of Flint.

H. L. GREEN'S LECTURE TRIP.

OTSEGO, June 1, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Since my last letter to THE TRUTH SEEKER, I hav lectured in Waterloo, Wheatland, Grand Mound, Burlington, Fort adison, in Iowa, and in Nauvoo, Galesburg, Yates City, and Streator, in Illinois. Our meeting was not large at Waterloo, but the subject seemed to be new to most of the persons present, and they listened attentivly for an hour and a-half to what I had to offer, and I hope I was able to say a few things that will set the young men who were present to thinking. Mrs. Maria Rapp, one of your subscribers, an intelligent German Freethought lady, took the lead in getting up the meeting, and my good friends J. D. Weaver and Dr. J. R. Corry seconded her efforts with liberal contributions. I had a very agreeable visit with Dr. Corry and his worthy wife. While stopping at Waterloo I was the guest of Mrs. Rapp, at her very pleasant home. Her late husband was one of the most activ Liberals in that vicinity. At the lecture I was pleased to take by the hand N. Roebuck, William H. Cutler, N. Derrick, Joseph Watkins, and A. C. Bratnober, all members of "our church."

I was invited to Wheatland, Iowa, by that well-known, energetic Liberal, Jerome Dutton, and when I arrived there, in a very short time, I was made to feel perfectly at home by Brother Dutton and his good wife, whose hospitality I greatly enjoyed. I became much interested in his bright boy, Claude, who for many years has been a cripple, and his young girl, who is the picture of health and intelligence. Here I made the personal acquaintance of brother H. L. Barter, who is publishing the Liberal Free Press. I wish he might get a living support. The paper is published weekly, for $1 a year. Among the Liberals I met at Wheatland I remember the names of D. S. Cook, Nathan Davidson, Henry Bulmer, and Henry Hartsman.

From Wheatland I went to Grand Mound, and for three days enjoyed the pleasant home of Mr. Leroy Dutton and Mrs. Flora Dutton, his wife. Mr. and Mrs. Dutton hav, as your readers know, been great admirers of D. M. Bennett and THE TRUTH SEEKER, and Liberals contributing largely to the Liberal movement. Mr. Dutton has one of the best farms in that section, some four hundred acres of the best land in the state, and a large, well-furnished house, the doors of which are always open to Liberals and reformers who travel that way. While at Mr. Dutton's I made the acquaintance of Dr. C. R. Fish, of Clinton, Iowa, and Mrs. Jennie Holcom, of Mendota, Illinois, both intelligent Freethinkers, and subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER, who were visiting at Mr. Dutton's. I also made the acquaintance of Charles Dutton, a brother, and Andrew Allerson, an activ Liberal. I lectured in the district school-house to an intelligent audience. The last lecture previously delivered there was by W. S. Bell, who I found had many warm friends in this section. Miss Anna Baldwin, the granddaughter of Mr. and Mrs. Dutton, entertained us all with fine vocal and instrumental music.

Mr. Warner Boecklin invited me to lecture before Liberal League No. 237, in the city of Burlington, and I was surprised when I arrived there to find Mr. Boecklin and his intelligent wife, Mrs Cornelia Boecklin, the proprietors of the finest mansion in the city. We seldom find such elegant residences owned and occupied by heretics. But here we hav beauty everywhere, not only in the residence and splendid grounds, but more particularly in the genial, intelligent, and philanthropic occupants. Mrs. Boecklin is a relativ of the late distinguished Unitarian preacher, Rev. Dr. Channing.

Liberal League No. 237, I was glad to learn, was prospering. The officers of the League are W. H. Ellery, president; Mat Stemple, secretary, and Cornelia Boecklin, treasurer. And allow me to say that Mrs. Boecklin has the courage to wear the reform dress. The League meets every two weeks at the Boecklin mansion. I am sure there is no other League in the United States that has so fine a building to meet in. And I must mention the fact that the first publications that met my eye on the center table were THE TRUTH SEEKER, the Boston Investigator, and Chainey's This World.

Fort Madison, on the Mississippi river, was my next-stopping place. Dr. J. W. Moorman, one of your subscribers, made the arrangements for my lecture there. It was in the court-house, and well attended. I greatly enjoyed my visit at the doctor's, but regretted that a sudden illness prevented his attending the lecture. While at Fort Madison I made the acquaintance of Mr. J. R. Tewksbury, wife, and daughter. Mr. Tewksbury makes his living by violating the second commandment. He is said to be the best photographer in southwestern Iowa. If there are any of your readers who desire a good likeness of your humble correspondent, let them send twenty-five cents to Brother Tewkesbury and get one—cabinet size.

The next place I visited was the old Mormon town, Nauvoo, from which the Mormons were driven by their brother Christians thirty-eight years ago. How these various Christian sects love one another! The Mormons evidently follow the teachings of the Bible nearer than any other Christian sect, and notwithstanding this their Christian brothers of other denominations would like to drive them into the sea. Solomon and David were "after God's own heart," but Joseph Smith and Brigham Young, who followed directly in their footsteps, hav no rights that modern orthodox Christians are bound to respect.

I know of no town in America that has a finer natural location than Nauvoo. The Mormons seem to hav made a very fine selection for a site for the holy city of "The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints." They were probably led there by the same deity that led the childern of Israel through the wilderness. I was entertained at Nauvoo by Earnest Heck, president of the Nauvoo Liberal League. He livs in one of the old brick Mormon houses, and my visit at his house was very agreeable to me. Mr. S. Palmer, secretary of the League, is an activ Freethinker. Mr. John Haas, a German Freethinker, very generously gave us the use of his opera hall for a lecture, and, all things considered, the audience was very respectable in size. I took by the hand here, besides those heretofore mentioned, the following subscribers to your paper: August Boeger, George A. Ritter, and W. H. Fulton. The river here surrounds one-half of the town at least, in a semi-circle; the other half is beautifully located, on an ascending bluff. The houses are so far apart that each resident can own and work a small farm. There are but a small portion of the inhabitants orthodox, and it has been suggested that this be made a Liberal city. The League here is independent, but it now proposes to take out a charter, as an auxiliary to the National Liberal League. The Liberals of Nauvoo are a very intelligent class of people.

I lectured in Galesburg, Illinois, Sunday evening, May 21st, in the opera house, to an audience of two or three hundred people, one-third at least of whom were young men. They listened very attentivly, and I am confident I said some things that will influence them to bring their judgment into use when listening hereafter to orthodox sermons on the holy Bible. They applauded very heartily at some of the absurd things I pointed out. The Universalist preacher, Rev. C. W. Tomlinson, and his wife, called in when the lecture was about half through, but for some reason soon left. I listened very attentivly during the forenoon to his discourse, in which he criticized Freethinkers, but like most other clergymen he could not listen for an hour to some one who disagreed with him, although it was an old personal friend. I dislike a religion that causes a person to hav more respect for an unknown God than a known man or woman. It is better that we keep our love and respect for man, who needs it, than for a God who does not. I will show no disrespect to any of my friends on the earth to please any God in the skies. What we need is more love for humanity and less for gods.

The two persons who arranged for the Galesburg meeting were Dr. A. G. Humphrey and D. W. Hamblin, and they paid most of the expenses out of their own pockets. Dr. Humphrey is the proprietor of a water-cure establishment at Galesburg, and has many patients. He is an able Liberal writer and speaker. I was pleased to meet Dr. A. Clark, an old-time Infidel, and forty years' subscriber to the Boston Investigator. He inquired very particularly about his old and worthy friend Amy Post, of Rochester, where he used to reside, and whom he had not seen in many years, but whom he held in high esteem, as all do who know her. I was entertained while in the city by Capt. F. D. Light, who is the proprietor of the Commercial Hotel, a good place for Freethinkers to put up.

A number of the members of the Liberal League met the evening I arrived there, and decided to hold regular meetings hereafter. Dr. Humphrey is president, and A. S. Cummings is secretary. This League will send delegates to the St. Louis congress, in September.

At Yates city, on short notice, a very respectable meeting was got together by the energetic labors of the postmaster, whose name, I regret to say, I hav forgotten.

My last stopping-place was Streator, Illinois. Here I enjoyed the hospitality of Dr. M. Woolley the author of that wonderful book, "The Science of the Bible." I am satisfied from my visit with the doctor that he really knows more about the Bible than any other man in America. His book is beyond the comprehension of most readers, but I am sure that, in the near future, it will be valued very highly. At Streator I had an agreeable visit with Mrs. Maria B. Densmore, who is known so well by the Liberal public as a writer for Liberal journals. Mrs. Densmore's age and want of health keep her within doors most of the time, but her mind and pen are still activ.

All who attended the Freethinkers' convention last year will remember William Bronson, Mrs. Densmore's brother, who made so many stirring speeches in the conference meetings. I am pleased to say that Brother Bronson will be present at the Watkins' convention. While at Streator I spent a day with Mr. Edward Jones, and viewed with interest his "Allegorical Castle." It represents very many interesting events in history, connected with the downfall of political and religious despotism.

Hereafter my address will be Salamanca, N. Y.

Truly yours, H. L. GREEN.

NOTES AND NEWS.

NORWAY, IOWA, June 25, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: For six months I hav written little of my travels for your paper. Work has pressed upon me too heavily to permit of much scribbling. During this time I hav visited between Kansas and northwestern Missouri, besides putting in several months of activ duty in Iowa. Hav met many of our most useful Western Liberals, many of your subscribers, forming a large number of very pleasant acquaintances who will not soon be forgotten, and I hav sold a fair amount of Liberal books, pamphlets, papers, etc., thus sowing good seed for the harvest by and by.

My lecture appointments hav increased in proficiency, and I hope to be able to devote myself still more to that branch of my work during the coming months.

Antichristian ideas are spreading everywhere, the new thought is permeating every stratum of society, and the old theology is apparently dying. But I think that he would be much mistaken who should for one moment relax his vigilance or sleep upon his post. And this is just what thousands of Antichristians are doing. But the old spirit of the church still livs, and we shall never be free until it is killed. Every incident, almost, of our political and legislativ life shows us that tyranny is but changing its line of attack. It has not abandoned its siege of the citadel of liberty.

The church can directly injure us only through the inculcation of her monstrous errors, but indirectly she is each year adding a new thread of steel to the fetters now upon our wrists through the laws which she induces state and national legislators to enact. And she conjures not now so much with her old shibboleth of "lewd," as with those very sweetly-sounding ones of "morality," "temperance," "order," etc. And too many of our unthinking Liberals are falling into her dextrously-set traps, are deluded by her sophistries. People educated in church doctrins are not very apt to easily rid themselvs of all her errors when they throw off the chains of her theological servitude. So it happens that thousands of so-called Liberals who talk kindly of the Christian superstitions and shout themselvs hoarse over the beauties of our supposed free government, are hand-in-glove with priest and politician for the utter obliteration of our few remaining liberties. Of all men out of place a Liberal supporting sumptuary legislation is most completely lost, and yet we in this state behold the sad spectacle of thousands of Infidels supporting and activly working for the Prohibitory amendment. Prohibition involves a principle which, if carried to its logical conclusion, would stop every Liberal press in the country, and close the lips of every Freethinker. If the majority may to-day prescribe what I may not sell or drink, or the ground that the article is injurious to myself or others, the same or another majority to-morrow may upon the same grounds say what I shall read or teach to my children. There is no limit to the demands of tyranny when once you admit its basic principle. No Freethinker who knows why he is a Freethinker can giv his vote for this kind of legislation.

To-morrow (June 27th) we, of Iowa, vote upon a prohibitory amendment to our Constitution. It is, in its inception and spirit, a clerical movement. All Liberals who are working for it are simply in the position of "old dog Tray." The church cannot conceive of a reform accomplished through any other agency than that of force.

The State Register says that every church bell in Iowa rings for the amendment. The Northwestern News quotes with approval the vindictiv remarks of the California Christian Advocate that the leaders of the League of Freedom are out of place while out of jail, and from every prohibition press in the state flows in an unceasing stream the torrent of billingsgate defamation, vituperation, and silliness. Disguise it as we may, seek to avoid the conclusion as we will, the truth is that we, as Liberals, hav a special interest in this fight beyond that of our imperativ duty to defend to the death the principle of individual sovereignty, as the bed-rock upon which rests our every right as dissenters from the popular faith, for it is apparent that the prohibitory law and the Sunday law questions are so inextricably entangled that to kill the latter vampire of usurped power we must strike to the heart of the former as well. And its enemies are very largely our friends, and they can be made still more nearly unanimous for equal laws for all days, if we are but wise enough to be brave and consistent in our devotion to liberty.

Surely and not so very slowly the narrow confines in which the individual may freely move by gracious permission of the powers that be are being lessened, and it is high time that we awake to a realization of the terrible fact. How many more sumptuary amendments do you want? how many more medical laws? how many more Utah bills? how many more books suppressed by attorney-generals, and Comstock bills enacted by state legislatures before you will get upon your feet and assert your rights?

How much better organized than we are our English brethren. Thirteen hundred accessions to the secular society in one year! But their "greatest orator" has kept ever in the front; ours has retreated to the cover of the neighboring hills, fearful of the mud batteries of the enemy. Comment is unnecessary.

Right glad am I to read of the hearty reception given to Mr. Bennett by the California comrades. Grand letters were those sent to the reception committee. How some of them must hav made the malcontests squirm! Perhaps they hav by this time learned that it never pays, in the long run, to desert the colors of freedom.

In two or three days I am off for northwestern Iowa, southeastern Dakota, and western Minnesota. Shall remain in that section until near the time for the state convention of the Iowa Leauge, which will be held some time in September. From there to St. Louis the last days of September, where I hope to grasp by the hand many old friends from all parts of the country, and to make the acquaintance of other workers in the cause. While in the northwest I hope to be kept busily employed, and shall be more than glad to organize a League in every town I visit. I want to get many subscribers for our papers. Address me at Norway, Benton county, Iowa.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed 50 cents for THE TRUTH SEEKER three months for Charles B. Drake. Mr. Drake and family are of Liberal views, intelligent humanitarians. I do not doubt but in the future your paper will find a warm reception in their congenial and pleasant home.

By the same mail I shall forward to your address a copy of the Rice County Journal, in which is an able letter from one of the Old Guard in the abolition ranks, J. W. North, of Oleander, Cal., and who was the founder of Northfield some twenty-six or seven years ago. I understand the town was founded on the basis of temperance principles. But this, like many other towns, has drifted away from its original basis. Notwithstanding that Northfield is a sectarian town, and the majority of the readers of the Journal are strictly orthodox, the views entertained and promulgated by Mr. North being antagonistic to their doctrins, yet his letters are sought and devoured with greed and eager look and wish for more. If this last letter should call out remarks in defense of the dogmas of the church from some of its stanch supporters, we may look for a lively discussion through the Journal, and thereby cause many to see the absurdity of the whole plan of Christian salvation, and emerge from the darkness of superstition and bigotry into the light of reason and common sense. Some months back, one of the ablest men in the church took Mr. North in hand, but he was too glad to lay this oppressed Infidel burden down, and proved himself a total failure to defend his religion or answer the arguments of the Freethinker.

The beautiful oration of Col. Ingersoll's, delivered in New York on Decoration Day, should be in the hands of all the clergy, and should be read from every pulpit in the union, as one of the most eloquent, patriotic, sublime orations that was ever delivered by heroic man. From beginning to end is the manifestation of the spirit of love and justice toward all humanity, and yet there are many of the shepherds, the expounders of the doctrin of the meek and lowly Jesus, who detest his very name, and would crush him out of his present existence, and hurl him into the torments of hell (if there is any such place) if it were in their power. Readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, lovers of freedom, Humanitarians, Infidels, and Freethinkers what might you expect at the hands of Christian rulers if they only dared? Echo answers, The Inquisition, with her most inhuman torture. But thanks to the Infidels and Humanitarians of the present and bygone days for the spirit of toleration. Here is a specimen of the spirit of a Baptist clergyman not very far away, toward Col. Ingersoll: "I should like to furnish the powder to blow Bob Ingersoll up with, but he is not worth the powder that would blow him up."

I rejoiced to read in THE TRUTH SEEKER of the safe arrival on American soil of our beloved hero, D. M. Bennett. May he reach his home in safety, and may peace and joy reign supreme where he dwells.

Yours truly, MRS. S. J. LENONT.

CINCINNATI, OHIO, June 5, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Perhaps there is no man now living who has witnessed so much extraordinary and wondrous absurdities in the line of priestcraft as D. M. Bennett of the New York TRUTH SEEKER. His travels over the globe hath brought him in contact with an overwhelming proof that the entire races of mankind are under the heels of a most ravenous and deceitful clique, or number of cliques, who ride rough-shod on the necks of the millions, and hold them in the most abject slavery. Their millions of deluded dupes are terrorized by the assumptions of these idle vagabonds, who are ever swindling and sponging on the ignorant masses. The multitudes of deities, seen and unseen, these miserable black-hearted priests hav set up as an authority and power for mankind to obey, to bow, to cringe, and become the most servil of slaves, is the most atrocious of crimes, inasmuch as no gods, god desses, or demons ever existed outside the dark and besotted brain of savage life. The whole business is the most glaring of frauds, whether perpetrated in lands called civilized, or amidst the wild and dark-minded races of savagism. Everywhere the systems of priestcraft, seems to be on a par in one particular, which is plundering the poor, pitiable, infatuated people, over whom these scowling priests rule with the vilest of tyranny. Can it be possible that these villainous systems, so long palmed off on a world's credulity, shall last? Will the people never see through these accursed shams, and smash the inventors and perpetrators of such self-evident frauds? Will the people be ever blind and destitute of beholding these many brazen-faced tricks to humbug a weak-minded and thoughtless world? Surely not. The time must be near when gods, visible and invisible, will become a stinking offense to the enlightened and intellectual mind, and such minds I trust are increasing daily. If such is not the case this beautiful planet is doomed to a blight which saps the foundation of all true and genuin civilization and progressiv free manhood.

Yours truly, T. WINTER.

SAN JOSE, CAL., June 19, 1882.

DEAR MRS. BENNETT: I want to tell you your good husband stayed with us last night and left this morning for Stockton, and, I a sure you, we were sorry to hav him go, for he has warm friends here. Allow me to tell you of the reception we tendered him at the California Theater last Friday evening. Our stage had six bouquets that averaged from three to seven feet in hight, and you can imagin their size and effect. The entertainment we were all proud of.

Last Friday Mr. Schwartz took his carriage and drove to New Almaden Quicksilver Mines with Mr. Bennett and Mr. York, and on Saturday a jolly load of us accompanied him to Mount Hamilton to see the Lick Observatory which is being built in the interest of science. Mr. James Lick, the noted Infidel and Freethinker, donated sufficient funds to establish and sustain an observatory with the largest telescope in the world. The exact amount donated I do not know We remained on the mountain over night. I wish you could hav been with us. We voted unanimously that it was a bright spot in our lives long to be remembered. Mr. Bennett is tired and feels anxious to get home. I think you will see him soon. I hav often thought of you as you hav watched and waited for his return, and rejoiced for and with you when the telegram was sent you that he was again on the same continent with yourself, with no ocean flowing between you. There are many friends on the coast who desire to take the traveler by the hand, but he feels that it is impossible to reach them all at this time. Very pleasant receptions hav been tendered him at San Francisco and Sacramento also. Mr. York intended to accompany him as far as Salt Lake City on his homeward journey, but has been compelled to lay by for repairs as he is quite ill from over work and unable to travel. Hoping you will soon see him, I remain, Yours for truth, MRS. J. L. YORK.

TURKVILLE, KAN., June 16, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $3 to pay for my dear old TRUTH SEEKER another year. I am very thankful to you for continuing it so long after my time ran out. Mr. Bennett's letters are very interesting to me, and I would like to hav them in book form, but cannot spare the money now.

A TRUTH SEEKER

Around the World.

Illustrated with forty cuts, and with a steel plate engraving of the author

BY D. M. BENNETT,

Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, author of "A Truth Seeker in Europe," "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," "Champions of the Church," etc., etc.

THREE VOLUMES FOR $5.00.

The Most Instruction for the Least Money of any Book of Travels yet Written.

In 1880 the Freethinkers of the world held an International Congress at Brussels, to which Mr. Bennett was sent as a delegate. He took the occasion to make the tour of Europe, and his observations were embodied in "A Truth Seeker in Europe" (price, $1.50). The letters were also published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and the readers were so well pleased with them that the proposition was made that he make the journey around the world, and giv the world the benefit of a Freethinker's observations. The proposition was accepted if the ones desiring such a work would advance five dollars each, the volumes to be dedicated to them. On July 30, 1881, Mr. Bennett began the journey, sending letters back to be published. The work will make

THREE VOLUMES OF NEARLY 900 PAGES EACH.

Those sending in five dollars before the completion of he work will hav their NAMES INSCRIBED IN THE DEDICATION OF THE VOLUMES.

The first volume describes Scotland, Ireland, England, including also an account of the Freethinkers' International Congress at London, in 1881, Holland, the Netherlands, Germany, Austria, Greece, Turkey. Smyrna, Ephesus, Rhodes, Cyprus, Beyrout, Baalbec to Damascus.

There hav been mahy books of travel printed but none like this. IT IS THE ONLY ONE OF ITS KIND.

Mr. Bennett has a shrewd habit of seeing everything going on, and in his book he has faithfully chronicled the habits and customs of the different people of many places he visited. The every-day life of [illegible] laid before the reader by one who has s[illegible] them and beheld them with his own eyes. We feel sure this work is greatly superior to any account of a journey around the world we now hav.

ALL THE VOLUMES WILL BE ILLUSTRATED

Which adds greatly to the interest of the work, and with the close description will present Old-World places in a very familiar light.

The volumes separately will be $2. Those sending $5 now will get the first volume by return mail and the other two as soon as issued, which will be in a few months, or just as soon as they can be got ready. Those sending the $5 will hav their names in the dedication of the second volume.

Vol. I. mailed on receipt of $2.

By Col. John R. Kelso, A.M.

Not since Hudibras has there been such damaging blows given to these old myths and fables. A Short History of the Bible,

Being an Account of the Formation and Development of the Canon.

By BRONSON C. KEELER.

Price, cloth, 75 cents. Paper, 50 cents.

This book should be read by every clergyman, layman, scholar, and Liberal.

I hav read Mr. Keeler's book with great pleasure and profit. He gives, in my opinion, a clear and intelligent account of the growth of the Bible. He shows why books were received as inspired, and why they were rejected. He does not deal in opinions, but in facts; and for the correctness of his facts he refers to the highest authorities. He has shown exactly who the Christian fathers were, and the weight that their evidence is entitled to. The first centuries of Christianity are filled with shadow; most histories of that period simply tell us what did not happen, and even the statements of what did not happen are contradictory The falsehoods do not agree. Mr. Keeler must hav spent a great deal of time in the examination of a vast number of volumes, and the amount of information contained in his book could not be collected in years. Every minister, every college professor, and every man who really wishes to know something about the origin and growth of the Bible should read this book.—R. G. Ingersoll.

Price, $2.00. Paper Edition from same plates, $1.00.

Those who wish to hav Col. Ingersoll's latest lectures on 'Talmagian Theology," will find them here, in full, together with many other points necessarily excluded by the limits of a lecture. "The Talmagian Catechism" puts in the form of direct question, the plainest and profoundest inquiries of modern doubt, and answers them according to Talmage and orthodox Christianity. As a piece of satire, with earnest purpose, this production stands alone, and in the literature of Freethought has not its equal.

which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case of some of them were in a terribly shattered condition—had in the Insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness, Fits; others upon the verge of Consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

SYPHILIS, positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system; GONORRHŒA, GLEET, Stricture, Orchitis, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

Middle-Aged and Old Men.

There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuation of the bladder, often accompanied by a slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen, will appear, or the color will be of a thin or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and torpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the organs.

HISTORY

OF THE

CHRISTIAN RELIGION

TO A. D. 200.

By CHARLES B. WAITE, A.M.

Verdict of European Scholars.

This work has received the indorsement of the Society of Critical Historical Theology of Zurich, Switzerland. The president of the society is Prof. Gustav Volkmar, one of the first biblical scholars of Germany, author of "Die Religion Jesu," "Jesus Nazarenus," "Ursprungs Unserer Evangelien" ["Sources of Our Gospels"], etc., etc. He is Professor of New Testament Criticism and Exegesis in the University, and teacher of General Religious History in the state college at Zurich.

Prof. Volkmar writes to the author of "The History of the Christian Religion," inclosing the official letter of the society, in which Pfarrer Kupferschmidt, the secretary, says:

"In the name of the Society of Critical Historical Theology, I hav the honor to inclose to you a few lines with the letter of our venerated Prof. Volkmar. With great interest did we receive information of your book, 'History of the Christian Religion to the Year Two Hundred.' One of our members, Herr Kappeler, has thoroughly examined the work, and has made to us a report concerning it, which became the subject of an animated discussion in the society. I leave it to Prof. Volkmar to enter into a criticism of your scientific work. It is for me to communicate to you that the whole society is rejoiced that that department of theology in which we are specially engaged has found in America so able a representativ. An unprejudiced and thorough presentation of the writings connected with the origin of our Christian religion, such as we hav found in your admirable book, places theology in accord with science; while, differently treated, it sometimes appears in contradiction to it."

The author has also received congratulatory letters from the author of "Supernatural Religion," in England, from two of the editors of "The Bible for Learners," in Holland, and others. One of these, Dr. I. Hooykaas, says, "With great and thankful surprise I received your letter with a copy of your valuable history."

One of the most favorable reviews of the history was made by the learned Norwegian, Bjornstjerne Bjornson.

THE

BIBLE—WHENCE AND WHAT?

BY

Richard B. Westbrook, D.D., LL.B.,

A theologian of high degree, and a counsellor learned in the law, on the origin and character of the Bible.

The author, though possessing all the prerogatives of a clergyman, repudiates the title "Rev." as a relic of Brahmanical caste and Roman sacerdotalism. He is entirely independent of ecclesiastical supervision and censure.

The questions, Where did the books of the Bible come from? What is their authority? and, What is the real source of dogmatic theology? are treated fearlessly in the light of history, philosophy, and comparativ religions. It is impossible to giv even a condensed statement of what is itself a marvelous condensation.

WHOLE LIBRARIES ARE HERE CONCENTRATED INTO ONE LITTLE BOOK.

The author's conclusions are, of course, against the supernatural origin and infallibility of the Bible, while the dogmas of the dominant theology are shown to be priestly perversions of the ancient mythologies.

The principles of natural religion are ably stated, and the claims of true morality are warmly adqocated.

The strong commendations of the secular prass show that is just the book for these times of agitation and "revision."

Printed in good type and bound in cloth. Price, $1.

Gems of Thought.

SENSIBILITY.

Sensibility, how charming,
Thou, my friend, canst truly tell;
But distress, with horrors arming,
Thou hast also known too well.

Fairest flower, behold the lily
Blooming in the sunny ray;
Let the blast sweep o'er the valley,
See it prostrate on the clay.

Hear the wood-lark charm the forest
Telling o'er his little joys;
Hapless bird! a prey the surest
To each pirate of the skies.

Dearly bought, the hidden treasure
Finer feelings can bestow;
Chords that vibrate sweetest pleasure
Thrill the deepest notes of woe.

—Burns.

UNLESS we are willing to adopt the logic of persecutors, and to say that we may persecute others because we are right, and that they must not persecute us because they are wrong, we must beware of admitting a principle of which we should resent the application to ourselvs as a gross injustice.—J. S. Mill.

To believe transubstantiation, or any other absurdity, contrary either to sense or reason, is in the most profane manner to make religion ridiculous by taking away the very foundation of all knowledge and of all beliefs, either in matters of religion or in anything else, for the judgment of reason being once set aside, there remains no possible means of judging whether any one thing whatsoever be more reasonable or more unreasonable to be believed than another, or whether, in any case whatsoever, either belief or unbelief be, in any degree, reasonable or unreasonable at all.—Dr. S. Clarke.

THEY who oppung [oppose] the force and certainty of reason and treat "right reason" as a chimera must argue against reason either with reason or without reason. In the latter way they do nothing, and in the former they betray their own cause and establish that which they labor to dethrone. To prove that there is no such thing as "right reason" by any good argument is indeed impossible, because that would be to show there is such a thing by the manner of proving that there is not.—Wollaston's Religion of Nature Delineated.

AS in other religions, so in that of our own country, the position of the body in the grave is discerned to be of vast importance. The head must be westward and the feet eastward, the nominal reason being that the dead person should rise from his temporary abode with his face to the east, whence Christ will come; the real reason being, in all probability, the survival of a much older custom, in which this venerable divinity, the sun, stood in the place of the savior of mankind.—Amberley's Analysis of Religious Belief.

THROUGHOUT his career Cæsar displayed always a singular indifference to life. He had no sentimental passion about him,—no Byronic mock-heresies. He had not much belief either in God or the gods. On all such questions he observed from first to last a profound silence. But one conviction he had. He intended, if he was to liv at all, to liv master of himself in matters which belonged to himself. Sylla might kill him if he so pleased. It was better to die than to put away a wife who was the mother of his child and to marry some other woman at a dictator's bidding. Life on such terms was not worth keeping.—Froude's Cæsar.

To solicit and persuade one another are privileges which belong to us all: and the wiser and better man is bound to advise the less wise and good. But he is not only not bound, but he is not allowed, speaking generally, to coerce him.—W. E. Gladstone.

THERE is probably no great religion in the world, the establishment of which has been altogether dissociated from miracles. They prove the most striking, most indisputable, most intelligible proof of the divine will, not indeed that there is any clear logical connection between the performance of a wonder and the truth of the wonder-worker's doctrins, but popular imagination jumps readily to the conclusion that a man whom rumor or tradition has invested with supernatural powers over nature must also be in possession of correct opinions, or even of supernatural knowledge, on the mysterious questions with which religion deals. Hence ecclesiastical historians of all ages and countries hav sought to show that those from whom they deduced the systems in which they wished their readers to believe were either themselvs gifted with thaumaturgic faculties, or were the subjects of special marvels worked upon them. Such miracles hav always served as their credentials, indicating their high character, and entitling them to demand the obedience of mankind to the commands they brought. —Amberley.

FRUGALITY itself is a pleasure. It is an exercise of attention and contrivance which, whenever it is successful, produces satisfaction. The very care and forecast that are necessary to keep expenses and earnings upon a level, form, when not embarrassed by too great difficulties, are agreeable engagement of the thoughts. This is lost amidst abundance. There is no pleasure in taking out of a large unmeasured fund. They who do that, and only that, are the mere loungers of money from one hand to another.—Paley.

IF a woman is her own housekeeper she should study to do her work on the most simple and easy plan, cook but a few dishes at a time, and hav each as perfect in itself as possible. She must save work wherever she can, and, above all else, limit the number of her children to only two or three at the most. Two children, if well cared for and properly reared, are all that one woman can possibly attend to and do her own housework, sewing, knitting, gardening, etc.—E. D. Slenker.

Odds and Ends.

GOD made bees,
Bees made honey;
God made man,
Man made money—
Hard to get.

A WESTERN young man, aged eighteen, has eloped with a married woman of three-score years. This æsthetic craze for antiquities is becoming altogether too general, and threatens to cause trouble.

"WHAT side of the street do you live on, Mrs. Kipple?" asked a counsel cross-examining a witness. "On either side. If you go one way, it's on the right side; if you go the other way, it's on the left."

THE Eagle at Denver gives the following as an obituary notice brought to it by a quiet, sad-eyed man, with the inquiry, "How much will it cost?"

"Smith.—Busted a trace, in this city, Friday, just after dinner, Mary Smith, wife of the undersigned and daughter of old Sam Pratt, the leading blacksmith of Denver, Colorado. The corpse was highly respected by the high-tonest families; but death got the drop on her, and she took the up bucket with perfect confidence that she would hav a square show on the other side of the divide. The plant transpires this afternoon at her boarding-house on Willow street. Come one, come all

"Dearest Mary, thou hast left us,
For you on earth there wasn't room;
But 'tis Heaven that has bereft us
And snatched our darling up the flume.

"Denver papers please copy, and send bill or draw at sight. By her late husband, P. SMITH."

BRIDGET.

Who comes from Erin's emerald shore,
Succeeded by a score or more
Of cousins who infest your door?
The servant gal.

Who comes as green as new grass is
But in a month, with haughty phiz,
Exclaims, "I want me wages riz?"
The servant gal.

Who brings with her from her last place
A character that's fair to trace,
Although she left there in disgrace?
The servant gal.

Who'll hav six evenings in the week?
Whose cousins on the seventh seek
Your houses, who of onions reek?
The servant gal's.

Who is the mightiest despot found?
Who'll hav no misthress peeking round?
Whose impudence doth all astound?
The servant gal.

Of whom is it at last you say
"Stand it I can't another day,"
Then recommend and send away?
The servant gal

GEORGE AND GWENDOLEN.

"Can you not answer me, Gwendolen?"

Up from the meadows the soft breezes of a perfect June evening were wafting the faint perfume of the cowslip, and as George W. Simpson and Gwendolen Mahaffy stood near the gate whose decrepit appearance told with more eloquence than mere words of the deathless passion that enslaved their souls, both felt that a crisis in their lives had arrived—a moment had come which would in the misty future that stretched away before them, like one of William M. Evart's letters, be either a bright beacon of hope and joy to look back upon with gladness, or a desolate landmark like the lightning-riven trees that one never beholds without a feeling of sadness. Secure in the consciousness of his own merit—that sterling merit which always lies in a strong arm, clear brain, and large feet—and yet with a modest diffidence concerning his own worth, the young man stood there in the gloaming with a half reluctant cat-on-the-back-fence expression that lent an added beauty to his pure young face, and made more pleadingly tender the earnest, father-is-coming-up-the-front-steps look with which he regarded the beautiful girl who stood by his side. He had asked her to be his wife—to leave parents, sisters, brothers, and all the endearing influences of a happy, Christian home, where two girls are kept, and go out with him into the wide world as a help-meet and companion. He had told in fervid sentences of the great love he bore her—a love that would ever be the guiding star of his life, he said, cheering him when the black clouds of adversity and despair hung heavily in the horizon of his hopes, and without which his whole existence would be one arid, trackless waste, on which lay the whited skeletons of Ambition and Hope—ghastly remnants of a life whose final wreck was all the more sad because of the happiness which it might hav held had love not flown away with mocking laugh when pleaded with so passionately.

[When it came to ornamental lying, with two rows of fluting up the back, George took first money.]

Gwendolen had stood in graceful poise as he spoke, one ear thrown slightly forward and her right foot covering the door mat, and, now that he had finished, was looking down in maiden shyness, while the rosy blushes that chased each other under her dazzling complexion would hav told, if anybody could hav seen them, of the emotions that were agitating her young soul. But no words came from her lips—those rosy ripe portals that opened with such languid grace when there was pie in the house; and George began to fear that perhaps he had talked her to sleep. Presently, however, she drew quite close to him, put her hand in his, and, resting her cheek upon his shoulder, she said: "Yes, George, I will marry you."

"But when?" asked the young man, a horrible fear that his bluff was to be called chilling his very blood.

"I will marry you," repeated Gwendolen, "when a bicycle rider is elected president.

"Turning away to hide his emotion, George muttered, in low, piratical tones, "Thank heaven, I am safe."—Chicago Tribune.

BLISS'S Electro-Magnetic Planchette,

A wonderful and mysterious little instrument that combines electricity and animal magnetism in assisting Spirit intelligence to communicate through it with mortals. It has been in the market a little over two years, and during that time thousands of skeptical persons, yes, downright Materialists, hav been convinced that this Planchette has been MOVED BY A POWER independent of themselvs while their hands hav been placed passivly upon it.

THE ADVANTAGES CLAIMED OVER OTHER PLANCHETTES.

First. A paste-board top in place of oiled, stained, or varnished wood.

Second. Five miniature batteries upon the top of each Planchette, upon which the fingers rest.

Third. Each Planchette is separately magnetized and assigned a band of developing spirits.

Price, Fifty Cents Each.

Sent post-paid, securely packed in a neat box to any part of the United States upon receipt of price. For sale at THE TRUTH SEEKER office.

Notes and Clippings.

THE Rev. James Craigie Robertson, English writer of works on ecclesiastical history, is dead.

MICHAEL DAVITT, the Irish agitator, received an enthusistic welcome in New York, about 12,000 workingmen turning out to hear him in Union Square.

THE Free Church Assembly of Scotland at its recent session, put forth a deliverance against "admiring the works of nature on the Sabbath day."

REV. DR. PECK, of New York, says, "God will divide" the wealth of the Goulds and the Vanderbilts. Let's all stand around and hold our hats.—New Haven Register.

BISHOP GILMOUR, who brought himself into unpleasant pre-eminence recently by attacking the Ladies' Land League, has been sued for slander by Edwin Cowles, of the Cleveland, O., Leader.

THE Rev. Geo. A. Lofton, whose erratic actions on a train recently occasioned so much scandal, has resigned his pastorate. He will also leave the ministry, and, it is intimated, will go into business in St. Louis.

THE Rev. Archibald Braun, of London, in referring to supplications for the church in these times, says: "We need to pray that the church of Christ may be saved from formal proprieties and stupid improprieties, from being frigid or frenzied."

THE Bishop of Melbourne, Australia, has shown good sense by declining to grant the petition of some of the people of his diocese to direct prayer for rain. He says that material phenomena are under the control of laws which will not be changed or interrupted in answer to prayer.

THE Presbyterian ministers of Chicago devoted a whole day of discussion to the question, What are we to believe concerning hades? At the end of the discussion there was no general agreement on the subject, except that nearly all the brethren thought the more it was discussed the more difficult it seemed.

As long as people will persist in building churches they must take the punishment which the Lord sends. The following illustrates our argument: Bishop Mora, of Montery and Los Angeles, was seriously injured by being thrown from a vehicle while on his way to the dedication of a new church at Hanford.

THE Rev. Philip Herbst preached heterodox sermons in the Luthern church at Columbus, O., and the trustees obtained a temporary injunction forbidding him to officiate as pastor until the question involved—that of the right of a church to receive from its minister the kind of doctrins which its creed authorizes—shall be settled in court.

A FRENCH photographer residing at Tangiers has just been commissioned by the sultan of Morocco to photograph his 364 wives. The portraits will be contained in an album, of which the sultan alone will hav a key. If the photographer could only manage to strike off some duplicates from the negativs they would probably command a considerable sale.

SOME progress is being made with the works for the Panama Canal. Excavations hav been begun at several places; but much sickness and mortality prevail among the laborers, who are to a large extent drawn from the West Indies—especially from Jamaica. The French hav built hospitals, for which there seems to be only too much need. The total absence of all proper sanitary arrangements is said to be a far greater cause of disease than the unhealthiness of the climate, although during eight or nine months of the year the heat is intense. The Europeans on the isthmus hav experienced great suffering; but their respectiv governments, acting through the resident consuls, hav been prompt to relieve all urgent cases of distress.

SIR HENRY THOMPSON says that "diet to be wholesome should be varied for all. It has, too, to be changed for different periods of life. Some constitutions thrive better on vegetables and cereals than by admixture with animal food. An exclusivly animal dietary might, perhaps, be best for a very few. So many persons hastily conclude that what is best for them is best for all. There is no greater error."

THE daily Truth says: "We hear that the portrait of Mrs. R. B. Hayes, presented by the temperance people, has been assigned a permanent place in the Green Parlor of the White House. Nothing could be more appropriate. Mrs. Hayes was really president during the supposed incumbency of the late Rutherford B." Truth is mistaken. It was Mrs. Hayes's pastor. Rutherford was two removes from the presidency.

THE doctrin of sinless perfection was discussed in the General Assembly of the Cumberland Presbyterian church, lately held at Huntsville, Ala. Some congregations of this denomination hav gone as far as the Free Methodists in professions of perfect living. A revision committee advised that liberty of conscience be allowed on that subject, but by a large vote the following was adopted: "The doctrin of sinless perfection is not authorized by the scriptures, and is a dogma of dangerous tendency." Well, we should smile.

A PHILADELPHIA pastor who recently preached against Sunday newspapers wandered so far from the path of rigid accuracy as to say that there are no Sunday papers in London. He advocated the entire cessation of Sunday labor in the offices of the dailies, and said that the Monday edition could be prepared without doing any work between Saturday midnight and Sunday midnight. He said that he knew this could be done, for he had filled every position on a paper from compositor to managing editor.

THE circus came to an Illinois town and announced its opening for Monday. On Sunday the Sunday-school superintendent gave his school an exhortation about it, and warned the children of the wickedness of going to such a depraved show. Then he told them that if there were any children present so lost to all sense of what was best for them as to go to this soul-destroying exhibition, he would thank them to rise, so that the rest of the school might see what they looked like. Instantly all arose except one lame girl. It was agreed that the circus had been well advertised.

A LITERARY treasure of singular appositness, says the London Athenæum, has just turned up in the form of a preface, written by Thackeray for the second edition of his "Irish Sketch Book," but suppressed by the publishers as being too outspoken. In it Thackeray strongly supports not merely the disestablishment of the Established church, which, he says, "will no more grow in Ireland than a palm-tree in St. Paul's churchyard," but even the repeal of the Union. The paper is said to be written in Thackeray's most vivacious and most characteristic style, and will soon be published in the Century magazine.

THERE is a Western legend that one who tastes of the water of the Missouri River thirsts for it ever afterward. Kentucky has the same legend about its whisky, and now General Abe Buford, who was recently converted by the Mountain Evangelist, seems to demonstrate that the legend may also apply to the trrf. He announces that he is not only going back to the race course, but he is going to own a fine horse, and that very soon. "Are you going to leave the church?" he was asked. "Leave the church?" said the general, "leave it? Why, bless your soul, no. A man can own a fine horse, and run him too, and go to heaven." So we may expect to hear next season of Gen. Abe Buford's string of highly moral racers going about the country to measure strides with the unenlightened and perhaps Infidel colts of the old-fashioned turfmen.—Sun.

A CURIOUS petition has just been presented to the General Assembly of the established church in Scotland. It seems that the Rev. John Campbell, minister at Iona, uses his church for strange and unusual purposes. At one time pigs were kept in it, at another cattle were housed in the sacred precincts; while every winter, for some time past, it has been converted into a stack yard. On one occasion the church was so full of corn and straw that service had to be held outside. During the past six months the church has been closed altogether.

THE danger of attending church is still further illustrated by an alarming incident which occurred during a thunder-storm on June 25th, while a flower service was proceeding at Ormskirk church, near Liverpool. About 1,600 persons attended. While the benediction was being pronounced the congregation were terrified by a sudden flash, and what appeared like a ball of fire passed through the church from the northeast. Cries of "fire" caused a panic, women and children shrieking. The vicar (Canon Sheldon), the curate, and some of the congregation exerted themselvs to allay the alarm of the people; but it was some time before this was accomplished. When the excitement had somewhat abated the vicar, standing upon a seat in the body of the church, offered up prayers for the preservation of life, and then pronounced the benediction. The congregation then left the church. It was found that the lightning had struck the steeple and had shattered some of the stone-work inside, but left very little trace outside.

THE mysterious disappearance of a young girl of fourteen at Tisza Eszlar, in Hungary, is still the cause of excitement in the neighborhood. She was missed about two months ago. Some weeks afterward a report was circulated that she had been murdered by the Jews in order to leaven the Easter bread with her blood. The authority instituted an inquiry, at which a young Jewish boy, the son of one of the attendants at the synagog, gave a detailed account of having, through the keyhole of the synagog door, seen her killed by several butchers, according to the Jewish rites. It was proved that she had been last seen at the synagog. Upon this the chief men named by the boy were arrested. In spite of the most careful search, and although a reward of five thousand florins was offered, not a trace of her could be found. A few days ago the corpse of a woman was found floating in the Theiss. An inquest was held, which has only made the matter more mysterious. It was reported that the body had been identified by the mother of the missing girl as her daughter's, but this is now contradicted. There will be much excitement until the inquest has been concluded and the result is known.

"WHILE Christians of every denomination," says the Christian at Work, "are putting forth their strength and making great sacrifices to open the eyes of the heathen to the folly and wickedness of idolatry, there are extensiv manufacturers in Birmingham, England, who do a large trade in 'gods.' The circular of one of these enterprising firms runs thus: 'We beg to offer to our Hindoo clients images of Yamen, the god of the dead, in bronze, very finely carved; also a large collection of images of Narundi, the prince of demons. He is carried by a giant of elegant structure, his saber is of the latest fashion. The god of the sun is offered for sale, having a silver tail and mounted upon a crocodile of copper. Bourberen, the god of riches, is a finely finished work of art. A great assortment of inferior gods and semi-gods. While the firm does not giv credit, discount is allowed from the account for cash." By way of explanation of the Christian at Work's remarks, it might be stated that the "great sacrifices" which the Christian missionaries are making consist in doing nothing at two or three thousand dollars per year and living in the most comfortable quarters, with wife and family, at the expense of American and European industry.

News of the Week.

ABUNDANT wheat crops are reported in the West and Northwest.

THE principal leaders of the insurrection in Uruguay hav been killed.

THE Lick Mills in San Jose, Cal., were burnt last week. Loss, $100,000.

MORE people visited summer resorts last Sunday than went to all the churches.

THE English Regatta Committee hav excluded the American Hillsdale crew of oarsmen from participating in English amateur races. The Hillsdales are not snobs, and the Regatta Committee are, which accounts for the exclusion.

THE third Iowa district Greenbackers hav nominated a Congregational minister for Congress. If Greenbackers continue making foolish nominations like this, they must not expect the co-operation of Freethinkers, which they express themselvs anxious to secure.

A Truth Seeker Around the World

Twelve Days in Ceylon.—Concluded.

The residents in Ceylon, as distinguished from the regular inhabitants, are the Malabar coolies, the Nattucotta chitties, the Parsees, the Caffres, the Malays, and the Europeans. The Tamil coolies come over from the eastern or Coromandel coast, principally from the district of Madura. By them all the work on the coffee estates is done, except the felling of the forests. They are induced to leave their own country by the high wages they receive in Ceylon. They periodically visit their own land, and when they have saved up enough they remain there. Their habits are simple, and their wants few. Their religion is Hindooism. The Nattucotta chitties are an interesting class of people. They are brokers from India, and are actively engaged in trade. Their fidelity has passed into a proverb; while thousands of rupees pass through their hands, they are found invariably honest, and their habits of life extremely simple. What a good thing it would be if some of the presidents and cashiers of our banks, insurance companies, and other corporations could take a few lessons as to the rules of life from these simple but intelligent pagans.

The Parsees are not numerous in Ceylon. There are perhaps fifty of them in Colombo, where they are connected with business houses. They have had the enterprise to get up a large theater, though constructed of bamboo poles and plaited palm leaf for sides and partitions, with palm-leaf also for roof. They act as amateurs, but attract good-sized audiences. I attended one of their representations—an opera. I deemed it a little tame, and far inferior in rendition to regular Italian, German, French, and English operatic performances. What made it seem particularly dull was that the female parts were taken by males. For a man to fall in love with another man, to sing all sorts of pretty love songs to him, and for the counterfeit woman to sing back in a man's voice, and for another old man who wants to marry the counterfeit woman to get very jealous and angry over the matter, soon becomes tiresome.

The Caffres are the descendants of recruits from the west coast of Africa, many of whom were once slaves under the Portuguese at Goa. They are woolly-headed and have all the characteristics of the negro. Their numbers are not very large, and they are usually employed as soldiers, or upon public works.

The Malays originally came from the straits of Malacca, and were enrolled in the Ceylon rifle regiments. Their descendants are principally engaged in military service. In religion they are Mohammedans. Their stature is low, but they are compactly built, and muscular. They are said to be fond of war. Their favorite weapon is a poisoned kris, which they use when at close quarters. They are, however, dressed and drilled in European style, and make good soldiers.

The Europeans are either civil or military servants of the government, or else merchants, planters, and tradesmen. They, of course, come here to make money, and when they have secured a competency they usually prefer to return to their native country.

Among the animals of Ceylon are, first, the elephant, which seem to flourish here; the buffalo, the elk, the chutah, the bear, the wild hog, the deer, the porcupine, the monkey, the jackal, the wildcat, the hare, the mongoos, the squirrel, the jerboa, the common rat, and the muskrat.

The principal birds are eagles, kites, hawks, owls, crows, devil-birds, pea-fowls, jungle-fowls, pelicans, flammingoes, cranes, herons, curlews, ducks, partridges, quails, snipes, pigeons, parrots, woodpeckers, minas, etc.

The reptiles are iguanas, lizards, snakes, frogs, toads, tarantulas, and centipedes. Of insects there are butterflies, moths, beetles, grasshoppers, glow-worms, ticks, musketoes, and ants without end.

The vegetable productions are as numerous and varied as the animal. Among the trees of value are ebony, calamander, satin, jack, halmillille, malille, keena, mendora, del, tulip, teak, palmyra-palm, etc. The trees yielding fruits and seeds considered valuable are the tamarind, mango, orange, margosa, elipe, cotton, cashew, bilembe, almond, pumelo, lime, pomegranate, wood-apple, lowey-lowey, rambotan, gurka, bullock's heart, guava, mulberry, cinnamon, and coffee. Of the palms are the talipot, the palmyra, the cocoanut, the aracannut, the kitul, and the sago are the principal. Trees most valued for shade are the banyans, rhododendrons, and tree-ferns. I saw one or more banyan-trees at Colombo that had nearly as many auxiliary trunks as the large banyan-tree at Calcutta, but not nearly so large.

Of the vegetable the most common are the brinjal, pumpkin, bandikai, cucumber, bean, spinach, tomato, sweet potato, yam, cauliflower, cabbage, peas, potatoes, etc. The peach and strawberry succeed in some parts of the hill country.

Ceylon has always been famous for its mineral productions; its "sapphires, topazes, amethysts, garnets, and other costly stones" were the theme of travelers, who told, moreover, of a ruby belonging to royalty a span in length, without a flaw, and brilliant beyond description. The principal gems of Ceylon are the amethyst, garnet, ruby, chrysoberyl, sapphire, cinnnamon-stone, catseye, moonstone, and opal. Of the metals, gold has been met with as well as nickel, cobalt and tellerium, but not in quantities sufficient to justify working the mines. Iron is of very fine quality, and plentiful, and nitre and plumbago are abundant; large quantities of the latter especially are exported. Tin is also found. Rock crystal, hornblende, mica, hyperstone, feldspar, calcspar, bitterspar, etc., are abundant. Iron quartz and meganese are found in some parts.

With the history of the past I must be very brief. The reign of the native kings is divided into two periods, the Mahawanse, or the "great dynasty," from 543 B. C. to A. D. 301, and Suluwanse, or "lesser dynasty," from 301 to 1758, the whole covering twenty-three centuries. In the first period fifty-five native kings reigned and died, and in the second one hundred and ten. These lives of kings, like most of those of other countries who have done both good and bad for their peoples, were of varied characters, some worthy and some unworthy. I will give a sketch of but a few of them, which will perhaps be all I should detain you with.

In the sixth century before the Christian era there reigned in Lála, a principality of Magadha, in the valley of the Ganges, in India, a king named Singha, or Sihabahu, who was said to have descended from a lion. He was also of the illustrious race of Suriavas, who claimed as their progenitor a beneficent being who came down from the sun, and taught mankind the arts of civilized life. Wijayo, the eldest son of this king, was so wild and unruly a character that his father was compelled to dismiss him from his court. Collecting together a band of kindred spirits, Wijayo set sail in search of adventure and ultimately reached Ceylon and made a landing near what is now Putlam. He found the island inhabited by a rude, uncivilized people whose origin is involved in obscurity, and who worship snakes and devils, and were consequently called Nagas and Yakkos.

Marrying a Yakko princess, Wijayo established himself at Tamena Newera, not far from the place of his landing; and having by the aid of his wife obtained the mastery of the island, he repudiated the alliance, dismissed her and her children, married the daughter of an Indian prince, invited over from the continent merchants and artisans; located his followers in different parts of the country, the better to develop its resources, and laid the foundation of its future greatness, giving to it the name of his father, Singha. Hence the name of the race and the language.

Dying without issue, his nephew Panduwasa succeeded him, and pursued the same line of policy as his predecessor. He married a relative of Gautama Buddha, and in order to spread civilization encouraged the brothers of his queen, who came over with her from the continent, to found subordinate principalities, which were, however, subject to himself and his successors as the paramount sovereigns of the whole island.

For two hundred years much improvement was made in the condition and resources of the country; reservoirs for water and works of irrigation were extensively inaugurated. In fact, more attention was paid to agriculture than to religion. In the year 307 B. C. King Tisso, "the delight of the deities," ascended the throne. Having dispatched an embassy entrusted with valuable gifts, to Dharmmasoka, the king of Magadha, that sovereign, in return, sent his son Mahindo to inculcate the doctrines of Buddha in Ceylon, which, with the aid of his sister Sanghamitta, he succeeded in doing, 267 B. C. At the urgent request of the Singalese king, a branch of the bo-tree under which Gautama attained the Buddhaship was with much pomp brought over from Magadha, and planted at Anuradhapura, where it took root and continues to flourish to this day, being over two thousand years old.

The energy which had hitherto been expended mainly on agricultural works now took a new direction, though not entirely diverted from its original channel, and from this period dates the erection of those stupendous masses of masonry about Anuradhapura and other ancient cities, which Singalese kings vied with each other in constructing. The earliest of these dagobas, as they are called, were erected by King Tisso, whose name has consequently been handed down to posterity amidst the plaudits of the historian. The three cousins of the king who successively filled the throne followed in his footsteps, and during the century immediately ensuing on his death the number of vihrens (temples) and dagobas rapidly increased, though it is also said that the number of tanks for the purposes of irrigation increased also.

For some time there were troubles of various kinds, including invasions from India, the successors of the Tamils obtaining the throne, but which was not recovered until the great dynasty of the kings who had in part descended from the sun terminated with Mahasen in 301 A. D.

The story of the kings of Ceylon of the lesser dynasty is but the narrative of the decline of the power and prosperity which had matured under the original conquerors, and of the rise of the Malabar marauders, whose ceaseless forays and incursions eventually reduced authority to feebleness and the island to desolation. The vapid biography of the royal imbeciles who filled the throne from the third to the thirteenth century scarcely embodies an incident of sufficient interest to diversify the monotonous repetition of temples founded and dagobas repaired, of tanks constructed, and priests endowed with lands reclaimed and fertilized by the "forced labor" of the subjugated races; civil dissensions, religious schisms, royal intrigues, and assassinations contributed equally with foreign invasions to diminish the influence of the monarchy and exhaust the strength of the kingdom.

Of sixty-two sovereigns who reigned from the death of Mahasen in 301, to the ascension of Prakrama Bahu in 1153, nine met a violent death at the hands of their relatives or subjects, two ended their days in exile, one was slain by the Malabars, and four committed suicide. Of the lives of the larger number, the Buddhist historians fail to furnish any important incidents; they relate merely the merit which each acquired by his liberality to the national religion, or the more substantial benefits conferred on the people by the formation of lakes for irrigation.

It was during the reign of Kitsori Maiwan the First that the relic supposed to be the right canine tooth of Buddha was conveyed to the island by a Brahmin princess about 300 A. D., and was deposited by the king himself "in a casket of great purity made of phalika stone." I think this tooth is now in the valued casket of relics at Kandy.

Skipping over an interregaum of trouble from the Malabars and Tamils, who seem to have done much to disturb the peace of Ceylon, we come down to the year 997, when the king Mahindo married a princess of Kalinga (in the northern part of the Madras presidency). During the reign of his son, who succeeded him, a rebellion broke out in which a Tamil army led the royalists against the insurgents. Ceylon was now reduced to the extreme of anarchy and insecurity. The foreign population had increased to such an extent as to gain a complete ascendancy over the native inhabitants, and the kings had lost authority over both.

In 1023 the Cholians repeated an invasion of the island, and carried the king a captive to the coast of India (where he died in exile), and established a Malabar viceroy, who hold possession of the island for nearly thirty years, protected in his usurpations by a foreign army. Thus throughout the reign of nineteen kings, extending over eighty-six years, the Malabars kept up a continual war with the Singalese till they filled by degrees every village in the island.

While this was the state of things at the capital, matters were little better in the principality of Rohuna, where the royal family still maintained a semblance of sovereignty. Four brothers contended for the tottering throne, and each in succession fell from it again after a brief reign, until in the year 1071, the minister Lokiswera assumed it, and held his court at Kattregam, on the borders of the Badulla and Hambantotte districts. His name is only recorded on account of his being the progenitor of a prince who effected the deliverance of the island, restored order and industry, and for a brief period recalled to mind the glories of the "great dynasty."

On the death of Lokiswera his son, Wijayo Buhu, who succeeded him, followed by the mountaineers of Rohuna, delivered the capital from the Tamils, organized a standing army to guard the coasts, and received deputations from beyond the seas. On his death a civil war for the succession ensued, which terminated in the accession, by the choice of the people, of the young prince Prakrama, whose accomplishments were of the most varied as well as comprehensive character, many of them having been acquired at foreign courts. He was crowned king of Pihiti at Pollonnaruna in 1153, and subsequently on the subjugation of Rohuna, which had for some time continued refractory, "sole king of Lanka" (the ancient name of Ceylon).

There is no name in Singalese history which holds the same rank in the admiration of the people as that of Prakrama Bahu, since to the piety of Devinipiatissa he united the chivalry of Dutugaimunu. He rebuilt the Buddhist temples and covered the face of earth with works of irrigation to an extent that would seem incredible did not their existing ruins corroborate the historical narrative of his stupendous labors. So great had been the decay of Buddhism under the dominion of the Tamils that only five ordained priests were to be found in the island; an embassy was therefore sent to Siam, where the Buddhist religion prevailed, for the ordination of additional priests. While, however, the young king was devoting himself to the interests of Buddhism, the restoration of order, and the arts of peace, he did not neglect those of war. Some merchants of Ceylon having been plundered by the subjects of the king of Cambodia and Arramana, in the Siamese peninsula, he sent forth an expedition under the command of a Tamil leader to punish the outrage, which successfully accomplished its object. He next turned his arms against the Cholian and Pandian kings who had assisted the Tamils against the island, whom he defeated, and made tributary to him; annexed the island of Ramesduram and the adjacent coast of India to his kingdom; founded a city in the Pandian dominions, and after commemorating his victory by the coining of money, returned in triumph to Ceylon.

This good king died in 1186, and with him ends the glory of Ceylon under its native rulers. For the thirty years that ensued the island was a prey to the anarchy occasioned by the struggles of rival claimants to the crown, who in rapid succession ascended it only to be hurled down again, their reigns, with two exceptions, being calculated by days and months instead of years. In the year 1211 an adventurer from the northern circars, Magha by name, landed with a force of twenty-four thousand men and made himself master of all Ceylon. His government was signalized by cruelty, oppression, and wanton destruction, and "the whole island was like a bosom of fire, the Demilos plundering it from village to village." After the lapse of twenty years a member of the royal family succeeded in recovering those parts of the island called Maya and Rohuna, and established himself at Dambedinia, fifty miles north of Colombo, where he reigned under the designation of Wijayo Bahu III. in 1235. The invaders, however, continued to hold possession of the capital and the districts about it, which they secured from attack by a line of forts extending along the coast on the west.

Pandita Prakrama Bahu next ascended the throne in 1266, and succeeded in arresting further portions of the island from the invaders. He encouraged learning and improved the internal communication between different places by the construction of roads and bridges. During his reign the island was successively invaded by the Tamils and the Malays, but their incursions were repelled. It was by this king that the sacred tooth of Buddha was taken to what is now Kandy. On his death the Tamils left Ceylon but little peace, and the seat of government was several times changed.

It was at this time that an event of some importance occurred, though not much mentioned by Singalese historians, and brought to light by the English historian Sir E. Tennent. So early as the fourth century of our era friendly intercourse had been established between the island of Ceylon and the empire of China, occasioned by the desire of the latter to extend its commerce, and strengthened by the bond of a common religion. Some of the embassadors sent to Ceylon recorded on their return to their own country what things they had seen and heard; and these annals are interesting and valuable corroboration of other history. In the year 1410, however, a Chinese embassador entrusted with offerings to Buddha was treacherously waylaid by the ruling king in Ceylon, and escaped with difficulty to his ships. The position of Ceylon toward China had previously been one of deference and recognition of superiority; and the emperor, determined to avenge this indignity, dispatched a naval and military force to Ceylon, which seized the capital and carried off the offending king a captive to China, along with the rest of the royal family. They were, however, allowed to return to their own country on the condition of their paying an annual tribute to China; the emperor further ordaining that the offending king should be deposed and the wisest member of the family exalted to the throne in his place. This choice fell on Prakrama VI., who, with his successors, continued to be the tributary to China till 1448.

The period is now reached in the affairs of Ceylon when the Europeans appear on the stage. In the sixteenth century the Portuguese, who at that time had extensive possessions in India, called at Galle and Colombo, and soon evinced a desire to gain a foothold in Ceylon. A good deal of intrigue was employed, and they hesitated not to employ duplicity, and by intrigue to set one portion of the Singalese against another and to join in with one faction to help put down another. But in every instance they were false to the party they pretended to help, and the result was the party they professed to help was brought completely under their power. The design early formed by the Portuguese was to become rulers of the island and bring the people under their control. They were not able to bring this about rapidly, and they never gained possession of the whole island. They held most of the seaports, but the interior provinces were not made subservient to them. And their authority on the coast was not permanent; the ports were sometimes nearly wrested from them, and they were under the necessity of keeping an army of twenty thousand men to hold their possessions there; so it is doubtful if the island really proved to be of much value to them; it certainly was not the great fortune to them which they expected it would be.

Some of the Singalese princes were bought over by Portuguese gold, and some nominally embraced Christianity, but Maaya Dunnai and his son, who showed so much intrepidity as to acquire the name of Rajah Singha, or the lion king, made strong and continued resistance to the Portuguese power. During an attack on Kotta in 1563 such was the closeness of the seige that the Portuguese commander caused the flesh of the slain to be salted lest provisions should fail, and being convinced that the place could never be effectually maintained as a fortress, he caused it to be dismantled and induced the king (who had placed himself under his authority) to take shelter at Colomo, where he was both the tool and victim of his nominal protectors. The Portuguese sought to excite the apprehensions of the minor chiefs of the interior at the increasing power of Maaya Dunnai, urging them to embrace Christianity and form an alliance with themselves. So early as 1547 Jayaweira, the reigning king of Kandy, had intimated a wish to adopt the Roman Catholic faith, and at his request one hundred and twenty men were sent toward Kandy to protect him from the consequent indignation of his subjects, but ere the men reached their destination the king, who had already changed his mind, caused them to be waylaid and slain. In 1550 his successor to the Kandian throne made a similar request, and in spite of the warning they had already had, a second force was dispatched by the Portuguese, which was attacked when within three miles of Kandy, defeated, and forced to retire with a loss of seven hundred men, half of whom were Europeans.

On the death of Maaya Dunnai in 1571 his son, Rajah Singha, succeeded him. He contrived to reduce most of the minor princes to obedience, and made himself master of Kandy, the king escaping to Manaar, where he and his daughter were baptized, the king by the name of Don Philip, the princess by that of Donna Catherina. As soon as Rajah Singha's arrangements were completed, he invested Colombo with a formidable force; but the Portuguese remained masters of the sea, and sent naval armaments to destroy and ravage the cities on the coasts. They even proceeded so far as the extreme south of the island, where they pillaged the magnificent temple of Dondera (by which proceeding, of course, they exhibited the superiority of Christianity), and returned laden with spoils, after having inflicted indescribable sufferings on the wretched and innocent victims of their displeasure. Discouraged by these disasters, by the intelligence that fresh troops were arriving to the aid of the Portuguese, and that his own subjects were in revolt, the grim old lion king raised the siege and retired to Settawakka. There he was aroused from his lair by a formidable revolt of the Kandians, who, instigated by the Portuguese, and commanded by a Singalese prince, who had been baptized by the name of Don Juan, poured down upon the dominions of Rajah Singha and laid them waste to the walls of his palace. But Don Juan, intoxicated by success, and indignant at the Portuguese for proposing to bestow the hand of Donna Catherina on another than himself, turned against his allies, drove them from Kandy, poisoned his rival, and once more marched against Rajah Singha, whom he defeated. The old chief, the hero of a hundred fights, unable to endure these disasters, refused surgical aid, and retired to his den at Settawakka, where he died at an advanced age in 1592.

Don Juan now ascended the throne by the name of Wimala Dharma. The delada relic (the tooth of Buddha) had been carried off to Goa in 1560, and there publicly destroyed by the archbishop (an exhibition of Christian hatred and envy), who with his own hand, in the presence of the viceroy and his court, and in spite of the offer of a fabulous price for its possession by the king of Pegu, reduced it to powder in a mortar and then burnt it in a brazier of charcoal, after which the ashes were cast into the river. But the Buddhists were not to be thus cheated out of the tooth; they proved themselves equal to the emergency; they somewhere procured another tooth, which was eventually installed in the sacred shrine at Kandy, and is now venerated by the faithful, and bushels of flowers are spread out before it, and everybody is just as well satisfied as though it were the real tooth of Buddha; and in this way proved themselves pretty good competitors in the relic business, who have gathered in the various cathedrals and churches of Europe cartloads of what are called "relics," but of which probably not one is genuine, or is what it purports to be.

Don Philip having died at Manaar, his daughter, Donna Catherina, a ward of the Portuguese, became the lawful successor to the throne. Her guardians sent an army to repel the usurper, and an engagement ensued in which they were at first successful; but Wimala Dharma, returning to the charge, routed the Portuguese, carried off and married the queen, and for twenty years reigned over the Kandian country.

Resolved, however, to chastise him, Jerome Azevedo, a Christian butcher, was sent by the Portuguese to take the command in Ceylon, a captain of whom a countryman has recorded the belief that his subsequent misfortunes (he died in prison at Lisbon) were a judgment on him for his cruelties to the Singalese. He compelled mothers to cast their infants between mill-stones previous to their own execution. At Galle he caused his soldiers to take up children on the points of their spears that they might "hear how the young cocks crowed." He caused many men to be cast off the bridge at Malwane for the troops to see the crocodiles devour them, and these creatures grew so used to the food that at a whistle they would lift their heads above water ready for another victim; but they were better than the Christian who commanded such terrible deeds to be committed.

And now succeeded a series of conflicts attended with varied success. The Singalese, maddened by these sufferings and the atrocities of their enemies, for once made common cause against them. The Portuguese troops became mutinous; and the interference of the viceroy of Goa was necessary to preserve the settlements in Ceylon from ruin. At this period, 1597, died at Colombo Don Juan Dharmapolo, the nominal and last legitimate king of Ceylon, bequeathing to the Portuguese by will that which he had never virtually possessed—the sovereignty of the island. Thus the Portuguese were again in possession of the maritime provinces, but the mountain fastnesses they scarcely reached.

It was in this century that the great missionary Jesuit Francis Xavier visited Ceylon. He went there in 1544, and by his eloquence and persuasion he induced considerable numbers to embrace Christianity. In 1591 and 1604 respectively, expeditions were sent againt Jaffna to punish its king for aid rendered to the Singalese; but on each occasion he succeeded in buying off his antagonists. In 1617, probably in consequence of some further acts of hostility, his capital was taken "under circumstances of singular barbarity," the king carried to Goa and there executed, his heir induced to enter a convent, and the peninsula formally incorporated with the Portuguese possession in the island.

THE DUTCH POSSESSION.

The revolt of the seven Dutch provinces from the oppressive yoke of Philip II. of Spain, and their declaration of independence under the name of the Netherlands, are events in the history of Europe, but they also had much to do with the interests of Ceylon and other parts of the East. The newly-formed states rapidly extended their commerce, and ere long sought the Indian seas. In 1602 one of their vessels, commanded by Admiral Spillbergen, anchored at Batticaloa, Ceylon, and the admiral, after some delay, was conducted to Kandy, where Wimala Dharma, who had carried off and married Donna Catherina after defeating the Portuguese, was then reigning. On being satisfied that the strangers were not only unconnected with, but the enemies of the Portugese, the king, in a transport of joy embraced the admiral, and in the fulness of his heart offered him permission to build a fort in the name of his master, the prince of Orange, in whatever part of the island he chose. Laden with gifts, the Dutch commander returned to Batticaloa, leaving his secretary and two musicians at the Kandian court, and having captured a Portuguese vessel off Batticaloa, he presented it with its crew and cargo to the king, as a pledge of his sincerity.

On the 27th of April, 1603, Sebald de Weert, the Dutch vice-admiral, arrived at Batticaloa, and proceeding to the Kandian capital was received with every mark of regard and favor by Wimala Dharma. A treaty was entered into, whereby the Dutch commander pledged himself to aid the king against the Portuguese, and De Weert proceeded to Achin for the purpose of procuring re-enforcements for his fleet, taking with him an embassador from the Kandian court. On his return De Weert encountered and captured four Portuguese ships; and on his arrival at Batticaloa the king proceeded in person to meet him there, expecting to share in the prizes, according to the terms of the treaty. He found, however, to his great mortification, that De Weert had released the captured vessels, and his suspicions as to the good faith of the Dutch were further excited by the representations of his embassador, who complained that De Weert had at an entertainment treated him with marked disrespect by placing him at the foot of the table, though the representative of the king, while the Portuguese were seated at the head, from which he inferred that their hostility was feigned. The embassador further cautioned the king not to place himself within the power of the vice-admiral, as he suspected him of entertaining treacherous designs. In consequence of these representations Wimala Dharma declined visiting the Dutch fleet, or even entering a tent which De Weert had caused to be erected on the shore for his reception.

Piqued at this mark of distrust, De Weert abruptly told the king that as he had thus slighted the attentions paid him, he would not proceed to attack Galle according to previous agreement, or render him any assistance. On this an altercation ensued, during which De Weert, who, to use the expression of the Dutch historian, Baldæus, "had drunk once more than was proper," made use of some coarse and insulting expression about the Kandian queen. Fired with indignation, Wimala Dharma ordered the Dutch commander to be seized. The order was misunderstood, and De Weert was, after some resistance, despatched by the followers of the king. Having thus compromised himself, and perceiving that all hope of conciliating the Dutch was at an end, Wimala Dharma directed that the attendants of De Weert should also be killed, with the exception of a youth whom he took under his protection. A few escaped by swimming to the ships; the rest were massacred. The king then returned to Kandy, whence he dispatched the following brief epistle to the Dutch officer next in command: "Who drinks wine is no good. God has done justice; if you desire peace, peace; if war, war." Wimala Dharma died soon after this, and his queen held the government alone, but her position was a painful and difficult one. The prince of Uva, the most powerful of the Kandian nobles, aspired to the throne, and as a step toward gaining it claimed the guardianship of the late king's minor children. This claim, however, was disputed by their uncle, Senerat, a Buddhist priest, who contrived to kill his rival by stabbing him in the back within the precincts of the royal palace as both were on their way to have an audience with the queen. It is as well, perhaps, that Senerat gave the blow first, as his victim was preparing to serve him in the same way. He succeeded in persuading the queen that his real motive was regard for her safety and that of her children, and in inducing her to bestow her hand upon and share her throne with him in 1604.

Such was the desire of the Dutch to conciliate the Singalese that they took no steps to avenge the slaughter of their countrymen. In 1609 a treaty offensive and defensive was drawn up between the two powers. The right to a monopoly of the trade in cinnamon, gems, and pearls was granted to the Dutch, and they were permitted to build a fort at Kottiar. But in 1612 the Portuguese surprised and destroyed it. About the same time Donna Catherina died broken-hearted at the death of her eldest son, whom she had reasons to believe had been poisoned by Senerat, who was now king. An agreement was entered into with the Dutch to help against the Portuguese, which, however, was not carried out. Numerous struggles took place between the Singalese and Portuguese, and sometimes to the benefit of the former.

In 1632 King Senerat died, and his son Rajah Singha II. came to the throne. The Portuguese deemed it a favorable time to make inroads into the Kandian dominions. The new king entered into a treaty with the Dutch to assist him. In 1638 the Dutch Admiral Westerwold, after defeating a Portuguese fleet in the neighborhood of Goa, dispatched two vessels, with directions to prepare the king for his arrival, with the rest of the fleet, in May following.

Apprised of the new alliance, the Portuguese determined to attack Kandy before the rest of the Dutch fleet arrived. The king retired from the city; the Portuguese sacked and burnt it; but on their return they were attacked by an overwhelming force; native troops deserted them; their overtures were rejected, and the whole force, commanders and all, save seventy who were made prisoners, perished on the battle-field.

On the first of May Westerwold arrived with the rest of the fleet and at once attacked and took the Portuguese fort at Batticaloa. The following year he took the fort at Trincomalie. Negombo, Matura, and Galle fell in succession. the king of Kandy invested Colombo and could have taken it, but he seemed to think some Portuguese power should be retained to act against the Dutch, whom he dreaded to have entire control.

In 1646 an armistice was agreed to between Portugal and the Netherlands, one of the articles of agreement being that each power should retain without molestation from the other whatever possessions it had already acquired in Ceylon. But the king of Kandy, being as much dissatisfied with Dutch as with Portuguese, used all means in his power to embroil them with each other, and he attacked either as seemed advisable to him. On one occasion he boldly marched through the Portuguese territory to Negombo, where he attacked the Dutch in their fort, which he succeeded in taking; and having made prisoners of the garrison, he wrapped in silk cloths the heads of such officers as had fallen in the conflict, and dispatched them to the Dutch commander at Galle. To this insult, as well as many others heaped upon them, the Dutch either submitted in silence, or sought to conciliate their haughty enemies by the most abject marks of humiliation. Their great object was gain, and for that they were content to wave, for the present, every other consideration.

After this time the Portuguese held little more foothold in the island, and the Singalese royal race became extinct in the person of Koondesala, who died in 1739; and a Tamulian, a brother of the queen dowager, was raised to the throne, with the title of Sri Wijayo Rajah. It had long been customary for the kings of Ceylon to marry Tamil wives, thus preparing the way for a total transfer of the crown to that race, the blood of which already flowed so largely in the veins of the royal family. No Singalese king again ascended the throne of Ceylon.

During Wijayo's reign the Kandians prevailed on the low country Singalese to attempt the expulsion of the Dutch; but the latter not only defeated their opponents but marched on Kandy, which they took and held for some time, the king retiring on their approach. In 1766 Governor Iman William Falck, a man of enlarged mind, who had already inaugurated a more enlightened policy within the dominions of the Dutch in the island, concluded an advantageous treaty with the Kandians, whereby a considerable extent of territory was secured to the Netherlands, and conditions favorable to the extension of trade between the coast and the interior were entered into. The results of the liberal policy of the new governor soon became apparent in the improved condition of the trade and revenue of the Dutch possessions.

BRITISH RULE.

In 1782 war was declared between the Dutch and the English; and the latter, who had by this time established themselves at Calcutta, Madras, Bombay, and other places on the coast of India, directed their efforts against Trincomalie on the coast of Ceylon, and having taken possession of it, Mr. Hugh Boyd of the East Indian Company was dispatched to Kandy as an embassador. Communications of a friendly nature had been opened between the Madras government and the Kandian court as early as 1763; but the British had failed to avail themselves of the arrangements for an alliance then made, and in consequence of this slight Mr. Boyd's overtures were rejected; and on his return to Trincomalie he had the further mortification of finding that during his absence the French had surprised the fort and carried off the English garrison.

Two years later war broke out afresh between the Dutch and the Kandians, on which event the latter solicited the aid of the English, though the same had previously been rejected. The English, very willing to secure further foothold on the island, furnished the aid desired. Aid was sent from Madras, and in rapid succession different towns on the coast were taken by the English; and the Dutch possessions in the island which had not been taken by the English were ceded to them, including the fortresses of Galle, Kaltura, and Matura, the respective garrisons being allowed to vacate them with all the honors or war. The public buildings, records, and treasures were made over to the English, and the public servants and residents were allowed the option of remaining or leaving as they saw fit. Most of the judicial officers and clergymen chose to remain, retaining their appointments and emoluments as before.

Much has been said of the pusillanimity of the Dutch in thus surrendering all they held in the island, almost without striking a blow. There is good reason for believing that bribery had something to do with the transfer that was made. It is known that previous to the advance of the British on Colombo by land, after the taking of Nigombo, an English officer landed from the fleet which was at the time hovering off the coast, and after conferring with the Dutch governor, re-embarked. On his departure some Swiss mercenaries in the service of the Dutch were allowed unmolested to transfer their allegiance to the English. Van Angelbeck then concealed his valuables, and calmly waiting the advance of the attacking army, at once capitulated on its arrival; but such was the indignation of his troops at the surrender of Colombo that they spat at and attempted to strike the British as they marched into the fort, and nothing but the presence of the English saved Van Angelbeck from the effects of the resentment of his soldiers. He never again returned to Holland, but remained a resident in the island he had basely surrendered until his death. Thus ended the rule of the Dutch in Ceylon, and thus did the English become possessors. The rule of the Dutch, though marked by a few atrocities, was not so bad as that of the Portuguese had been. The object of both had been to wholly subjugate the island; and wherever they succeeded in fixing their yoke, its wearers found it a heavy one.

It was some years after this before the English became in full possession of the Kandian portion of the island. There were intrigues, efforts to reach and retain the Kandian throne by aspirants and usurpers hardly worth while to repeat. The English were called and seemed as willing to aid a usurper or tyrant if their own interests would thereby be promoted. Things went on in this way till July, 1815, when the English deemed it necessary to declare war against the tyranny which continued to manifest itself at Kandy by one of the worst tyrants that had occupied that throne. The English advanced upon Kandy in eight different divisions. On February 14, 1815, the English entered Kandy. The king had fled with two of his wives. The place of his concealment was pointed out. The door was shattered, when the glare of torches revealed the cruel tyrant to the gaze of his exulting subjects, who bound him hand and foot, reviled him, spat on him, and dragged him to the next village with every species of insult and indignity. His life, however, was spared. He was conveyed a prisoner to Colombo, and then removed to Vellore in the Madras presidency, where he died in 1832.

From this time there was no great opposition to the English authority. Two or three restless malcontents made attempts to raise a revolt and to seat themselves on the throne of Kandy, but they were suppressed without great difficulty. Sir Robert Brownrigg devised the plan, a good military road to be constructed into the heart of the mountain districts, and Sir Edward Barnes grasped at the idea and carried it out. Henceforth successful rebellion was at an end. The completion of this work was the incentive for the commencement of others of a similar character, and at the present day Ceylon may boldly submit to a comparison with any other British colony in the world with regard to well constructed roads and bridges.

There is no question but what the steady and able administration of the English in Ceylon has been better for the people of the island than would have been the fitful, revolutionizing, and unsteady rule of native princes and kings. The English as early as 1815 had the magnanimity to grant that the national religion of the island should not be interfered with, which has been kept with a fair degree of faithfulness. Some improvements have been made from time to time by the English governors and rulers on the island, until at the present time there is hardly a better governed colony in the world, and from what I could learn there is but little desire for the English authority to be removed.

The governor-general of Ceylon is appointed by the queen, or, at least, by the home government. The governor is assisted by and presides over an executive council, consisting of the officer commanding the forces, the colonial secretary, the queen's advocate, the treasurer, and the auditor-general. The legislative council is presided over by the governor, and is composed of the members of the executive council, the government agents for the western and central provinces, the surveyor-general, the collector of sea customs, and five unofficial gentleman who respectively represent the Singalese, Tamil, Burgher, planting and mercantile interests. The island is divided into six provinces, which are presided over by officers called government agents, who, with the help of younger members of civil service called assistant agents, carry on the financial administration of their provinces. The native head men under their control are their valuable and indispensable auxiliaries. The island is duly supplied with courts. The schools and means of education are in a fair condition. The missionaries have a large number of schools wherein the tenets of Christianity are taught. Col. Olcott has taken subscriptions for fourteen thousand rupees for schools to be free from all religious or doctrinal instruction. If the lands now held by the priests can be diverted to the uses of free education it will be a good work accomplished.

THE ANTIQUITIES OF CEYLON

Consist of the ruins of edifices at the ancient capitals, dating from the sixth cectury before the Christian era, dagobas, and the ruins of Buddhistic temples, several of which were constructed more than two centuries before our era. The ancient capital, Anuradhapora, was inclosed by a wall sixty-four miles round, embracing an area of two hundred and forty-four square miles, including gardens and fine edifices. Here is the celebrated bo-tree, which came from the branch of the tree in India under which Buddha attained to his Buddhaship, and which is more than two thousand years old.

Among the dagobas about the ancient capital deserving particular notice, the first in point of antiquity is the Thuparamaya, a monument inclosing, it is claimed, the right jawbone of Buddha. It is seventy feet in hight, and was built in the third century before Christ. Some of the classic stone pillars, with elegant chiseled capitals, which surrounded it, are still in existence.

Next in antiquity, and far superior in size and magnificence, was the Ruanwelli dagoba, commenced 160 B.C. It was much injured by the Tamils in 1214, but is now one hundred and fifty feet high. It is of brick. A subterranean passage formerly led to the interior. Not far from the sacred bo-tree are many stone pillars, some standing, others fallen, or as if about to fall. There are the pillars of the famous Lowa Maha Paya, or brazen palace of Dutugaimunu, so called because the roof was covered with brass. It was built in the second century before Christ, as a residence for the priests, and was supported by sixteen hundred pillars. In their present rough condition these pillars fail to suggest the idea of beauty, particularly when compared with the graceful columns of Mehintalai or the Thuparamaya. It is thought that these pillars were once covered with cement and adorned with precious gems and pearls. It is related in the Mahawanse (a Buddhist history) that the king caused a gilt hall to be constructed in the middle of the palace, and that the hall was supported on golden pillars representing lions and other animals. At the extremity of the hall it was ornamented with festoons of pearls, and all around with beads. "In this supreme palace there are nine stories, and in each of them one hundred apartments. All these apartments were highly embellished; they had festoons of beads resplendent like gems, and the tinkling festoons were of gold. In that palace there were a thousand dormitories having windows with ornaments (like unto) jewels, which were bright as eyes." Such is a part of the description of the great famous brazen palace, a testimony both of the munificence of its erecter and his reverence for the priesthood. It is especially recorded that the laborers employed in its construction were remunerated; the king being of the opinion that "on this occasion it was not fitting to exact unpaid labor."

The Abhayagiri dagoba erected by Walagam Bahu I., 87 B.C., on his rescuing the throne from the usurpation of the Tamils, was originally 180 cubits in hight, but is now reduced to 240 feet. The Suwanaramaya dagoba was erected by the same king. The Jaytawarama dagoba was built by Mahasen in the third century after Christ. It was 210 feet in hight, and its circumference is still 1,080 feet. It is surrounded by a spacious court, paved with stone, and it has been estimated that the whole mass contains twenty millions of cubic feet.

About eight miles from Anuradhapura, in an easterly direction, a hill suddenly rises above the plain. A flight of a thousand steps, partly built, partly cut out of the rock, leads to a stone dagoba; and ascending still farther, the traveler finds himself at the base of a second dagoba of brick. This remarkable hill is called Mahintalai, in honor of Mahindo, the founder of Buddhism in Ceylon. The lower or Ambustulla dagoba is supposed to mark the spot where the meeting took place between Mahindo and King Devenepiatissa. The upper dagoba, called the Ambhalato, is said to enshrine a single hair from the head of Buddha.

Between Mahintailai and Kandy, at a distance of forty miles from the latter place, is a huge mass of gneiss, which towers above the level country to the hight of 350 feet. The name of the place is Dambool, and the caves in the side of the rock have been converted into Buddhist temples, and at the present day glow with all the brightness of coloring the painter's art can bestow. On entering a richly-carved gateway an image of Buddha is in a sitting position, and within is a figure, in a reclining posture, forty feet in length. This temple was first endowed by Walagam Bahu 86 years B.C. It is still a place of much resort, pilgrims going there from all parts of the island.

The later capital, Pollonnarua, is described as abounding in the remains of great grandeur. "No scene," says Sir Emerson Tennent, "can be conceived more impressive than this beautiful city must have been in its pristine splendor, the stately buildings stretching along the shore of the lake, their gilded cupolas reflected on its still expanse, and embowered in the dense foliage of the surrounding forests. At the present day it is by far the most remarkable assemblage of ruins in Ceylon, not alone from the number and dimensions, but from the architectural superiority of its buildings." This city had been a favorite residence of royalty so early as the year 718. Mahindo I. adopted it as the seat of government. It was here that Prakrama Bahu, the Magnificent, was crowned in 1153, and he it was who raised it to the hight of its splendor. According to the Mahawanse, it was twenty-eight miles long and sixteen miles wide, and the whole surrounded by a wall. Prakrama enlarged the lake, erected numerous edifices, and planted gardens. The Rankol dagoba was built by his queen, and is 558 feet in circumference and 186 feet in hight. The main street of the city, which formed the approach to this monument, may, according to Tennent, be still traced by the foundations of the houses that lined it on either side.

Farther up the street is the Jayta Wana Rama temple, built by the king, on a model, it is said, of one erected at Kapilewasta, in India, by Buddha himself. It differs in character from Singalese structures generally, and the workmen employed on it were brought over from India. It contains a gigantic image of Buddha. Near by is the Kiri dagoba, so called from its milk-like whiteness. It was surmounted by a golden spire. Near it are stone pillars which mark the site where the town council was wont to assemble. Date, 1187.

There is an old dagoba at Bintenne. The city itself had great antiquity. It is believed to be the Magrammum of Ptolemy, and a chief city of the Yakkos. It was here that Buddha is said to have first set foot upon his visit to Ceylon. The dagoba was built three hundred years before Christ by the brother of King Devenepiatissa. It is a huge semi-circular mound of brick work, three hundred and sixty feet in circumference, and still one hundred feet high, but so much decayed at the top that its original outline is no longer ascertainable.

There are many other antiquities on the island, but probably I have mentioned the most distinguished, and probably enough. In many places the dense foliage, so natural here, has completely covered these old ruins, so that even large trees are growing directly over where once stood some grand old structure. There is, however, abundance of proof to show that the sovereigns who once successively swayed the scepter here were not only fond of erecting monuments and edifices of glory, but that they were keenly alive to the importance of developing the resources of a grateful soil, and that the labor expended on their agricultural works brought back a return not only sufficient to supply the wants of a teeming population, but also to enable them, while maintaining a court, the splendor of which was the theme of foreign princes, and the incentive to foreign rapacity, to spend countless sums on structures, in designing which the idea of utility seems to have been utterly discarded, and that of grandeur alone entertained.

WORKS OF IRRIGATION.

Something should be said of these ancient works, which possessed far greater importance than all the palaces and monuments. Sir Henry Ward says that, leaving the main road six miles from Dambool, he met with no less than nine tanks within a distance of sixty miles. He found that they were constructed with great labor, considerable engineering skill, and of such solidity that their embankments seemed to defy the hand of time. Forty miles north of these again is Paduvil column, the most gigantic work of all, for the bund, which is in perfect repair, except at the one spot where, in the course of ages, the waters have forced a passage between it and the natural hills which it united, is eleven miles long, thirty feet broad at the summit, one hundred and sixty feet at the base, and seventy feet high; and that to the westward of this is the tank of Anuradhapura, and the giant's tank, the dimensions of which are not given.

Sir Henry Ward says he walked and rode over the Paduvil column, and estimates that its construction must have occupied a million of people for ten or fifteen years. The tank, when full, is said to have irrigated the whole space between the bund and the sea. A vast breach is now open, the depth of which is said to be unfathomable; and what was once the basin of the tank is covered with magnificent timber, except in those parts still under water during the rainy season. These are overgrown with coarse, rank grass. For miles around there is not a vestige of man; and the temporary building erected for Sir Henry had the effect of frightening away all the game in that part, so unaccustomed were the deer and the buffaloes which frequented the tank to any intrusion upon their solitudes.

It is thought that a net-work of canals connected the nine tanks together; that every river or stream that could be turned to account was intercepted, its waters diverted into these huge reservoirs, and there husbanded by the aid of artificial embankments, generally stretched between the hills, and constructed, when such a measure appeared necessary, of massive blocks of stone, artistically beveled in such a manner that pressure only consolidated them more firmly; furnished with sluices and spill-waters for the irrigation of the surrounding fields and the escape of the surplus water. At the time when these works were common throughout the island the art of irrigation in Europe was in its rudest state.

The Anuradhapura tank is the oldest work of the kind. It was constructed by Panduwasa in the fifth century before Christ. The Giant's Tank, in the Manaar district, is so called because the huge masses of rock forming the lower part of its dam, which are said to have sustained no injury by time, were supposed to have been hewn and carried to their places by giants. This tank contains within its basin ten villages, which have sprung up since its formation.

The Horra-borra Tank, in Bintinne, deserves mention. An artificial embankment two hundred feet broad was there drawn across a river at a spot where two masses of rock, rising from the bed of the stream, add solidity to the work. These rocks, though sixty feet in thickness, have been tunneled so as to allow the surplus water to escape through them. They were formerly fitted with sluice-gates, and the waters arrested by the embankment were thrown back a distance of eight or ten miles.

The Ellahara canal was commenced by King Mahasen in the year 275; it was fed by the waters of the Karaganga. This river fed various tanks in its course, that of Kowdelle being twenty-one miles in circumference; a second, now in ruins, its bed being covered by forest trees, is said to have been thirty-seven miles round. Some idea may be formed of the magnitude of the work when it is stated that one of the embankments alone stretches along a distance of twenty-four miles, and varies in hight from forty to ninety feet. The other tanks and canals which are somewhat numerous, I will have to pass over in silence, fearing I have already made a greater tax upon your time than I should have done.

ADAM'S PEAK

Is one of the highest mountain cones in Ceylon—eight thousand feet—but is difficult of ascension because the upper portion approaches so closely to the perpendicular. To the followers of Buddha and Mohammed it has equally special attractions, as the monument of the life and existence of an extraordinary man. The Buddhists assert that on one of Buddha's visits to the island he left the impression of his foot as an evidence of his power and an object of worship for his followers; the Mohammedans, on the other hand, contend that Adam, after spending his paradisaical happiness in Ceylon, where the Garden of Eden was located, endured there his penance likewise, subsequently to his fall, by standing on the summit of the peak on one foot for a long series of years, and that hence rose the impression. But were there even no traditions of the sort to hallow the mountain, its great hight, its peculiar shape, and the distance to which it can be seen at sea would alone render it worthy of attention. The foot impression upon the summit has probably had a longer period of reputed sanctity and worship than almost any other object of reverence in the East. But some who have seen it report that the resemblance to a footprint is not at all close. The summit of the mountain is rocky and surrounded by a wall about five feet high, in the shape of an irregular hexagon, by the side of which a level path has been formed, incircling the rocks, which rise to a hight of about eight feet in the center, and on the top is the holy footprint; and the whole is surmounted by a wooden temple. One who has visited it says the indentation bears very little similarity to a footprint, and that were it not for the fact that some interested devotees have made good use of mortar and trowel, the visitor would gaze for a long time before he would fancy he saw anything of the kind. Even as it is, were the plastered separations of the toes removed, one would be more likely to take it for the impression of a door with a semi-circular top than for that of a foot. It is about four feet and a half long and two feet and a quarter broad. Verily, verily, if that impression was made by one of the feet of old father Adam, he must have had a greater understanding than he has generally had a credit for. During the months of visitation by pilgrims it is preserved by a metal cover glittering with glass diamonds from the too inquiring gaze of unbelieving or wavering skeptics. The border which makes the outline of the impression is about four inches broad, made of coarse lime, painted; and the temple which surmounts the imposition is about six feet by five in size. It is supported by chains running from the corners of the roof to the outside of the walls, where they are firmly fastened to the rock.

TRADE AND CROPS OF CEYLON.

Imports, 53,647,000 rupees; exports, 52,916,000 rupees; vessels at Colombo in the year 1538, tonnage 600,000 tons; vessels at Galle in the year 423, tonnage 560,000 tons.

The products for export are coffee, tea, cinchona, chocolate, caoutchouc (three kinds), ipecac, cardamons, cinnamon, pepper, vanilla, cocoanuts, and all the products of the tree, citronella, and other essential oils, plumbago, etc.

Exports of tea, 85,000 pounds; coffee, 72,532,500 pounds; cinnamon bark (in value), 784,000 rupees; cinnamon oil, 25,667 rupees; other essential oils, 12,500 rupees; cardamons, 25,000 rupees; cinchona bark, 520,000 rupees; plumbago, 1,625,000 rupees; cocoanut oil, 2,189,000 pounds, worth 2,717,739 rupees; cocoanuts, crude, mostly to India, 85,000 rupees; cocoanut shells, 28,690 rupees; copperah (dried nut), 529,651 rupees; arrack (spirit from the cocoanut), 165,117 rupees; coir fiber, rope, yarn, matting, etc., 400,875 rupees.

The imports are principally butter, cheese, ham, bacon, confectionary, preserved meats and fruits, potatoes (from India), books, maps, and prints, liquors, wines, kerosene oil, jewelry, dried fish, and curry stuffs (from India), etc.

There, I think you will admit I have told you enough about Ceylon. I will say that I have drawn the historical items largely from "A Brief Account of Ceylon," by L. F. Liesching, who quoted from Sir E. Tennent and others.

In conclusion, I must say I leave Ceylon with very kindly remembrances of many friends whom I will not soon forget. At 12 M. on March 3d, a queer sort of boat peculiar to Ceylon took me out to the Khiva. Several friends accompanied me to the water's edge, where we took the final adieu. The boat mentioned appears to be dug out of a log, with sideboards at the top. It is long and narrow, and to prevent its rocking and capsizing two curved arms some ten feet in length reach over and attach themselves to a log ten or twelve feet in length, which keeps the craft steady. About 1 o'clock the steamer weighed anchor, and in two or three hours Ceylon was lost to view. Good bye, Ceylon.

March 8, 1882. Five days of steaming against a steady head wind brought us to Penang. One or two days it rained some, and dark clouds overhung us. One morning while viewing the clouds acted upon by contrary winds, the steamer seemed to pass under an archway of dense, dark clouds which nearly shut out the light, partially like passing into a tunnel, and soon the rain poured down freely. Other days were pleasant, though the wind remained briskly ahead. I noticed several whirlwinds, which seemed to disturb somewhat the surface of the ocean. I saw numerous schools of flying-fish, who were out for an airing, and seemed to be enjoying themselves. We passed a number of islands both on the right and left, being, I presume, the Nicobar and Andaman islands. To the north of us is Burmah, which, though I do not visit, deserves some attention from us, and while I am steaming along toward Penang, I will tell you something about it.

BURMAH

Is one of the large independent states between India and China, another of which is Siam. The history of Burmah is full of civil dissensions between the Burmese and the Peguans, their deadly enemies, and the wars which were the result were often very bloody. In 1750–52 the Peguans, with the assistance of the Portuguese, captured Ava, and annexed Burmah to Pegu. But this triumph was short-lived. The royal family of Burmah being incompetent to wage the wars necessary to regain their liberty, the cause was warmly taken up by an adventurer—Alompraw—who, having defeated the Peguans, ascended the throne. He also took summary vengeance on the English and French, who had established factories in Burmah, and had interfered with her civil feuds to secure their own interests. This ill-faith on the part of the Europeans was long remembered against them in the country where they were refused a footing.

In 1767 Burmah was invaded by a Chinese army of fifty thousand men, but the reigning king, Shempuan, was vigorous and gave it such a reception that not a man of the large army ever returned to China. In 1794 a Burmese army of five thousand men crossed the British frontier and entered the district of Chittagong in pursuit of some refugees from Aracan, but retreated when commanded to do so by the English, and the delinquents were given up. This opened an intercourse between the English and Burmese, which was of an unfriendly character. This unpleasantness, with the fact that the English wished to possess themselves of the Burmese coast, with as much of the interior as they could obtain, led to the war of 1824. This war was continued over a year, and though the Burmese are said by the British generals to have fought well, they were not able to compete with the superior weapons, skill, and bravery of the British army, and ultimately the king of Burman was willing to enter into terms of peace by ceding to the English valuable portions of his country lying on the coast. By the war of 1852–53 these possessions were enlarged inland, as far up as Prome, so that England holds the most valuable part of Burmah, and when some good excuse offers, and it suits her to do so, she will undoubtedly take the remainder.

These Burmah provinces have been of great value to England, both in a commercial and a political point of view. The exports of rice alone—for the cultivation of which the low grounds of Burmah are well adapted—to Bengal, the Coromandel coast, and other parts of India, give employment to about a thousand small vessels annually.

A considerable portion of the English-Burmese possessions is comprised of the province of Aracan, which contains some 3,000,000 inhabitants, divided into three classes, the Burmese, the Aracans, and the Mughs, besides Mussulmans from the hills, and Hindoos and Mussulmans from India. The Burmese and Mughs are manly, frank, and straightforward in character, kind and hospitable, with more of independence and good nature than sycophancy or meanness in their bearing; they are of an obliging, forgiving nature, but rather improvident, and somewhat inclined to the use of intoxicating drinks, which has been considerably increased since their acquaintance with the English. They are said to be passionate, and to make good soldiers. The women are reckoned faithful, and are allowed to go abroad without restraint; and they are said to be more industrious than the men. The whole labor of the house falls upon them; they go to market, fetch the food, the water, and every necessary; they beat out the rice, cook the meals, make cloth for the whole family, and even assist their husbands in the fields and in looking after the cattle.

The religion of the Burmese is Buddhism, and that they are mainly a moral people there is abundance of testimony. Malcom, the American Baptist missionary to Burmah, in his "Travels in Asia," places them fairly on the record as to good conduct. In giving some of his own personal experiences in Burmah, he says he was resting one day in a zayat in a small Burmese village, and was scarcely seated when a woman brought a nice mat for him to lie on; another brought him cool water; and a man went and picked him half a dozen good oranges. None, he says, sought or expected any remuneration, but quietly disappeared and left him to his repose. He goes on to say: "None can ascend the river without being struck with the hardihood, skill, energy, and good humor of the Burmese boatmen. In point of temper and morality they are infinitely superior to boatmen on our western waters. In my various trips I have seen no quarrel, nor heard a hard word." "Many of these people have never seen a white man before, but I am constantly struck with their politeness. They desist from anything on the slightest intimation; never crowd around to be troublesome, and if, on showing them my watch or pencil-case, or anything which particularly attracts them, there are more of them than can get a sight, the outer ones stand aloof and wait till their turn comes. . . . I saw no intemperance in Burmah, though an intoxicating liquor is easily made from the juice of the palm. . . . A man may travel from one end of the kingdom to the other without money, feeding and lodging as well as the people. I have seen thousands together for hours on public occasions rejoicing in all ardor, and no act of violence or case of intoxication. . . . During my whole residence in the country I have never seen an indecent act or immodest gesture in man or woman. . . . I have seen hundreds of men and women bathing, and no immodest or careless act. . . . Children are treated with great kindness, not only by the mother but by the father, who, when unemployed, takes the young child in his arms and seems pleased to attend to it, while the mother cleans the rice or sits unemployed by his side. I have as often seen fathers caressing female infants as male. A widow with male and female children is more likely to be sought in marriage than if she has none. . . . Children are almost as reverent to parents as among the Chinese. The aged are treated with great care and tenderness, and occupy the best places in all assemblies."

This is pretty good testimony, and to come, too, from a man who went there to teach them what he called a better religion. It would seem that it must be a pretty good sort of religion that will make a people conduct themselves in that manner. J. H. Stocqueler, in his "Handbook of British India," says the marriage tie is held in rather slight respect by the Mughs, and that divorces are procured for trivial offenses. The Burmese regularly court their wives, and after the consent of the parents has been obtained, a day is fixed for the wedding, and all the friends and relatives of the parties are invited to a feast at the house of the bride's father. After the dowry has been settled, they all sit down to the feast; the bride and bridegroom eat out of the same dish, which binds the contract, and they are declared to be man and wife; the son-in-law often remains a member of the family till the wife desires a home of her own and he can afford one. The Mughs go through the same ceremony, with this difference, that when young the match is made for them by their parents, and they never see each other till the marriage day; but widows or grown-up ladies do not attend to this, but exercise the liberty of choosing for themselves.

When a divorce is sought for by both parties nothing more is requisite than that they should go before a village assembly and make a declaration of their wishes. Their property is then equally divided, and they separate, perhaps to rejoin again when their ill feelings have had time to subside. This seems to be a better rule than to compel a man and woman to live together when they can no longer love each other and there is no possibility of the union being longer desirable. When a husband wishes to separate from his wife against her will, he must give up all the property and take upon him all her debts and leave the house with nothing but his gambong and dhootie; but should a woman seek divorce from her husband, she has only to tender to him, before a competent judicial authority, the sum of twenty-five rupees, which by law he is in ordinary cases bound to accept, or at the utmost she returns her husband the ornaments he may have given her, also repays the sum of money he gave her parents on the wedding, which is usually all the cost to him of the marriage, and then the release is effected by the wife breaking a palm leaf in two, eating one-half herself and giving the other to her husband. Where there are children they are divided according to their sexes, the boys being given to their father and the girls to the mother. They are considered far from being a burden in a country where food is so abundant and a livelihood so easily obtained.

The Mughs have no fixed method of disposing of their dead; the customary way is to burn them; but the poor usually bury their dead. The coffins, which are used alike in burning and burying of persons, of any substance, are in the shape of a sarcophagus, and if the family can afford it they are richly ornamented with tinsel, etc. In this the corpse, dressed in a new suit of clothes, is laid face downward, a piece of gold or silver coin, or a jewel, being put in the mouth, the great toes and the thumbs are tied together, and if a female six pieces of wood are laid on the back, and if a male but three.

When a female dies pregnant she is not burnt but buried, the child being first cut out of the womb and interred alongside of the mother; lepers, temple slaves, suicides, victims of cholera, criminals, and all those considered unclean are buried, not burnt. The chief priests and men in power are generally embalmed and their bodies preserved for some years, after which they are burnt with great ceremony. Quicksilver is the principal article used for cleaning the intestines. Music and dancing take place at the funerals of those who can afford to pay for it, and a feast is given to the neighbors seven days afterward, at which it sometimes happens that exhilarating liquors are imbibed till some of the party become very happy, or other times riots are the consequence. The day after the funeral the family repair to the spot where the body has been burnt or buried, and spread food for the deceased.

The children are usually named three or four months after their birth. The astrologers fix the name and the day, and the parents give a feast, at which there is music, dancing, and revelry. In the low countries the people of all classes live in houses built of posts and bamboo walls, the flooring being raised four or five feet from the ground, and the roofs made of bamboos and leaves. Young men who are bachelors do not sleep in their fathers' houses, but each village has a separate building for the young men, where they sleep by themselves. They are fond of wrestling, dancing, and games of various kinds.

The principal food of the country is rice, but they make use of animal food to some extent. Fish and the flesh of the superior animals, such as bullocks, deer, goats, etc., are much sought after. The rice, as in nearly all Asiatic countries, is eaten with curry, which is a mixture of chillis (red peppers), ginger, turmeric, and numerous kinds of vegetables, and sometimes small fish or bits of meat stewed together, which is added freely to boiled rice. I have tried several kinds of the rice and curry—some I have found tolerably good and others not to my taste. It is usually too hot with the peppers. A favorite drink with the Mughs and Burmese is called tarree, or a juice of a species of palm, which also furnishes leaves for thatching their houses. The liquor is sweet, slightly intoxicating, but harmless. A strong spirit is also distilled from fermented rice. The smoking of tobacco is almost as common a fault with them as in Europe and America.

Both men and women are robust in form, but they are not a handsome race. They are fond of ornaments and finery. The men usually wear a head dress, or gambong, composed of book muslin twisted round, but not over the head, and it is often gracefully entwined with their long hair, which they prize so much that it is not uncommon for them to wear false hair; a jacket which is tied at the throat and closed over the chest and reaches half way down the thigh, and a dhootie, often of brilliant-colored silk, complete their costume. The women go with the head bare, but the hair is neatly braided and tied in a knot behind; a red cloth is wrapped tightly round the bosom, from which descends a petticoat, which is often gaily colored and open on one side, so that in walking much of the leg and even the thigh is often exposed. The Mugh women wear also a loose muslin jacket, reaching below the waist, with tight sleeves, and a gay cotton handkerchief thrown carelessly over the head or shoulder. The young girls are said to be often very pretty and always merry.

The Mohammedans of the country are supposed to be the descendants of slaves imported from Bengal by the great people in early times. There are several mountain tribes—the Koonrees, Taugmros, Kyengs, and Karians—who are wholly different in religion and customs from the Burmese and the Mughs; they are in a state of barbarism. They build their houses entirely of bamboos, and very high from the ground, and live in communities of from fifteen or twenty to forty or fifty families. They change the site of their village every two or three years, as the soil of the hillsides becomes exhausted. They are frequently at war with each other, but such as descend into the low country and occupy the small hills are very peaceful, inoffensive people, though not a little addicted to drunkenness, produced from the spirit distilled from rice. They are of a roving disposition, and upon the occurrence of any great sickness or unusual misfortune they immediately move the entire village. Their attachment to their native mountains is, however, very strong, and those who have been driven by the oppression of other tribes to seek a residence in the islands, or the plains even, collect the ashes of their dead, and on the first opportunity, be it years afterward, convey them back to their native hills. Nothing will induce them to intermarry with any other people or inhabit a Mugh village. They wear very little clothing beyond a rag round the loins and another round the head, and in cold weather the richer ones have a cotton wrapper or chudder over the shoulders. They are fortunate in not being troubled with very much religion, being more nature-worshipers than anything else, and believe in a good many nats or demons, which they strive hard to placate.

The Buddhist temples of the Burmese, called Keoungs, are most substantially and often beautifully built, and as a mark of distinction they have two or three roofs raised one above another. They are generally well stocked with numerous images of Buddha of all sizes and materials, white and black marble, alabaster, wood, stone, clay, or copper, most of which are, either wholly or partially, gilt with gold or silver. Glass and metal vessels with real and artificial flowers, and various other simple articles of ornament, are arranged in front of the images; immediately over them there is usually a canopy of fine cloth ornamented with gold leaf and tinsel, and black wooden cases, the paneling of which is inlaid with little squares of glass of all colors, surmounted by images of Buddha, and in which the priests keep their sacred books and records, occupy the background and other parts of the hall. Hanging lamps, wall shades, crystal decanters, and such things are also much sought after for the ornament of the temple.

In the mountains and forests the elephant, tiger, leopard, tiger-cat, bear, deer of various kinds, and the wild boar are to be found. The bosgaurus, the wild buffalo, the sha (somewhat like the chamois), and a kind of wild dog or wolf; also a species of raccoon, the wildcat, the ballasoor, and a kind of civet are ound in the hills. There are no jackals, hares, or foxes; but asses and monkeys of numerous kinds inhabit the jungles. The birds and snakes are much the same as in India. The waters produce over two hundred kinds of fish.

Among the trees are the teak, oak, red and white jarool, praing, toon, sissoo, telsue (yields dammar), gurjun, semel or cotton-tree, peepul, with numerous kinds of palm and bamboo everywhere in great abundance. The mangrove, which is valuable as fuel, especially for steam purposes, is most abundant. Long grass covers the plains. Iron is found in many places, as also is coal.

PENANG.

On March 8th, at 11 A.M., we arrived at Penang, a thriving city situated on an island by the same name, some sixteen miles in length, and separated from the Malayan peninsula by an arm of the sea. The town is situated on a level plain, but near by are hills three thousand feet high, which give a good background to a very pretty picture. The city is situated in the northwest entrance of the straits of Malacca, which are but a few miles wide, so that the land and hills on the southern side add to the beauty of the scene. The vegetation is much of the same character as on Ceylon, the palms and banana-trees being abundant.

We had barely come to a stop before our steamer was well surrounded by numerous Chinese boats of a pattern different from what I have seen before. They are twenty feet or more in length, rather sharp at the bow, with an eye on each side, the extreme point representing an animal's or a fish's head (it is said the Chinese think the boat cannot see where to go unless it has eyes); the stern is rather wide and square at the extremity, and the rave or sideboard extends two or three feet farther back than the boat, giving it somewhat the appearance of a swallow's tail. The Chinese waterman stands near the after part of the boat, and has long oars which cross each other when he takes hold of them, so that the right hand oar is in his left hand, and vice versa. He pushes with the oars instead of pulling, and always retains the standing position; but he makes them move along with good speed. He has a sail he can put up at pleasure, and a canvas covering he uses when it rains. Here he has his furnace for cooking, here he has his bed, and this boat is his home from year to year. As the steamer stopped here a few hours I of course patronized one of these sand-pans (for that is the name of them), and went ashore to see the town, though the sun was pouring down his vertical rays at a fearful rate.

The town presents a lively, thrifty appearance, and cleanly withal, having a large number of business houses; shopping, wholesale and retail, and many of them large and well filled with goods. The population is much mixed, the larger portion being Malays, with many thousand Chinamen, with a good many Klings and other low-caste Hindoos, with Arabs and other Mohammedans. There are also a good many Europeans living here, but how many of each I did not learn. Judging by the large number of fine bungalows in the eastern part of the city, I should say there are fully a thousand European residents, with twenty or thirty thousand Chinese, and enough of the Malays and others to make fully one hundred thousand. But the Chinese are the life of the town. They have the principal part of the commercial business in their hands, as well as the mechanical pursuits, etc. I strolled through several of the business streets (and some of them are long), and found Chinese signs far more numerous than all others, and they present a continuous scene of activity and enterprise refreshing to witness. Though Chinese signs are the rule, many are also in English. I was pleased to see that Hin Hu Lee is doing a flourishing drug trade; that Sing Ling Bing is conducting the furniture manufacture very successfully, having twenty of his countrymen for journeymen; that Hing Ling Song is turning out not less than twenty pairs of shoes and boots per day; that Ah Sin Lu has a dozen tailors at work; that Hi Hon Ho is doing a lively carpenter and house-building business; that Hong Ding Su has a good blacksmith shop; that Thwang Shang Bang is making harnesses at a lively rate, and that Sam Ling Ding has a shop full of good-looking tin and copperware. I cannot begin to tell you the names of all the Chinamen in business in Penang, for there are at least twenty shoe shops, nearly as many furniture shops, with tailors, dyers, tinners, etc., in abundance. Some are selling hardware, some glassware and crockery, some notions and varieties, some dried fish, some fruits, rice, and other eatables, and also mats of various kinds. I saw a number of peripatetic dealers, those who perambulate the streets with a spring-pole on their shoulders, somewhat in the style of a neck-yoke, carrying all sorts of wares, including fruits, confections, food of all kinds, notions, "jim-cracks," etc., and several with a full cook-shop upon their shoulders, in which they could get up a meal at short notice. I noticed a large number of dyers spreading their blue cotton goods out upon the grass to dry in the sun. This is what makes the ordinary wearing apparel of the Chinamen, while the better classes wear white, and the laboring classes have simply a waist-cloth and hat. The latter article is very large and looks heavy. It seems to be made of bamboo, large enough for an umbrella—would almost answer for a boat, or to top out a hay-stack.

There are a few Chinamen in Bombay and Calcutta, but aside from those places these are the first I have met with, and I judge this to be almost as good as a visit to China. One can see here Chinese customs and habits almost as perfectly as in Peking itself. They certainly show as much life and energy as any people I have met with, and they are so much lighter in color than any other natives that a relief is experienced in this direction.

In the way of enterprise and money-making they are almost equal to the Jews, and have often been termed "the Jews of the East." Many of them become wealthy and do a large wholesale business. I hear of some who came here with nothing and commenced business by peddling fruit or something of the kind, saving every cent they made, and finally becoming heavy merchants, and sometimes owners of vessels. Many of them are men of good large frames and good muscles. As a rule, they are far stronger than the Hindoos, and they seemed not at all opposed to hard work. I see hardly any Chinese women, and am told that but few of them leave the "Flowery Kingdom."

Here I also saw the first of the Malays, and pronounce them a good-looking class of Asiatics. They are of a dark-yellow, or light-brown, rather short in stature, and well built. They are not so active, industrious, and enterprising as the Chinese, but seem a steady, well-disposed class of people. These are the inhabitants of the Malay peninsula, and the same race has spread over several of the neighboring islands, particularly Sumatra and Java.

The Klings, from India, are considerably darker. They, like the Arabs, have a heavy beard, while the faces of the Malays are as free from beard as an American Indian. They are said to be pretty good farmers, and also make very fair mechanics.

Penang has belonged to the English since the days of the East India Company. It contains about one hundred and sixty square miles, and is reckoned very rich in proportion to its size and the amount of ground under cultivation. Its staple productions are the betel-nut or the arican palm, cocoanut, nutmeg, and cloves. There are some three hundred thousand nutmeg-trees on the island; and in what is called the Province Wellesley the annual yield is over twenty-five million nutmegs. The clove-trees number nearly one hundred thousand, over half of which are in bearing.

The English portion of the town is very pretty, the comfortable-looking dwellings having ample space and being well surrounded by a fine growth of luxuriant tropical plants. The public buildings are of a respectable character, and the spires of two churches give the place the appearance of a European city. I stepped into a court-house when legal proceedings were being attended to. The judge was an Englishman, and one or two of the lawyers, but all the rest were natives, principally Malays.

Fruits are cheap here; pineapples two cents each; watermelons are plenty, but not of good quality—tough, and comparatively tasteless. In the native part of town the water comes up close around the buildings, which stand on posts, much like the pictures of such houses I saw in my childhood.

There is a noted waterfall five miles from town, where a small stream dashes from rock to rock in a fall of three hundred feet, but I did not have time to go out and see it, for I deemed it better to be on board in time than to see a cascade much inferior to what we have in our own country.

OFF FOR SINGAPORE.

At 5 P.M., having duly exchanged freight, and shipped as deck passengers one hundred and twenty Chinese, we bent our course in a southerly direction toward Singapore. The Chinese have made money enough to go home, some to remain and some only on a visit. Fault has been found with Chinamen because after they have made a good "pile" they go back to their own land to enjoy it. There is no doubt they love the country of their birth, and it does not seem to be much of a fault for them to do so. If it is commendable for those of other nations to love their own country it would seem that it is not culpable in the Chinamen. I have had a better opportunity to study Chinese habits and character than ever before, and I see much in them to admire. Their enterprise, their industry, and their cleanliness are certainly commendable. They live on very little, and are fond of rats and puppies, and they are very damaging competitors for American farmers, mechanics, and laborers, but that they are far from being the worst people in the world I am fully convinced. We have two Chinese waiters on the steamer, and they are decidedly pleasant fellows.

There is no mistaking a Chinaman; his yellow skin, his almond, oblique eyes, will point him out, but these failing, the everlasting "pig-tail" is a sure indication. The head is shaved save a round spot three inches in diameter around the crown. This is never cut, and is kept neatly braided, and often reaches a length of four or five feet. This queue is sometimes braided by itself, and sometimes with silk or other thread of brilliant colors. The Chinaman thinks very much of his pig-tail, for to lose it is a great disgrace. As a punishment for criminals the pig-tail is sometimes taken off, but the punishment is equal to a year's imprisonment. They do their eating on the deck, their food being largely a mixture of rice and other articles. I notice they are very handy with their "chopsticks"—two small smooth sticks about three inches in length, and which they hold in their right hand, one with the thumb and finger, so they can manipulate them in picking up small bits of food. In eating soup and semi-fluid food they hold the bowl or vessel close to the face, and the way they poke the soup, etc., into the mouth is very amusing.

This people have faults much like other portions of the human family. Many of them are slaves to opium smoking, the same as Anglo-Saxons are slaves to alcoholic drinks and tobacco, though I don't think the Chinese are so bad in this respect as our own people; I so far see very few indications of it. They look plump and healthy. I am told they are very fond of gambling and that often when they have been absent from their country for years and have saved up a good deal of money, they will get to gambling on their way home and lose it all. I heard, however, of men doing the same thing who would object to be ranked with Chinese.

On our way to Singapore we pass between the Malay peninsula and the island of Sumatra. We passed a number of islands, some small and others looming up boldly. As we approach the equator the weather seems to grow hot and oppressive. On the 9th many waterspouts were visible through the day. I saw one very plainly which looked like a long slim funnel reaching from a dark cloud two thousand feet above the water down to the latter, aud from the commotion that seemed to be caused it was doubtless taking up water freely. These whirlwinds or cyclones sometimes suck up large quantities of water, which, as soon as the force which takes it up is spent, returns in immense showers, called "the bursting of a cloud." These heavy floods sometimes take place on the land. The circular wind-storms or cyclones are similar to those which sometimes take place in our country when the storm makes a narrow path for a few miles, tearing up trees, prostrating houses, blowing trains from railroads, and even sometimes taking up stones weighing hundreds of pounds. The power of the wind when moving in such a spiral or narrow circular form seems to be immense, and the whirlwind itself, without being broken, travels at the rate of several miles an hour, while the velocity of the wind within the cone or circle must be at the rate of two hundred miles an hour. It requires an immense force of wind to twist a strong tree three feet through, or pick up a rock weighing half a ton. It is indeed wonderful what the forces of nature are capable of accomplishing when the conditions are adapted for heavy work. It is a peculiar condition of the atmosphere, and the invisible aerial forces which produce cyclones, tornadoes, and simoons. I much prefer that they give me a tolerably wide berth.

We arrived at the P. & O. wharf at Singapore on the morning of the 10th, the weather, barring the heat, the most charming that could be desired, and the hills and sloping grounds of the lands around the harbor being of the most charming character. Everything looks blooming and beautiful. Here I saw for the first time the fan palm. The top looks like a large peacock's tail, spread in the most regular manner—too regular and beautiful, almost, to be natural. The leaves are like the leaves of the banana, which, including the stem or stalk part, are fifteen feet in length; they stand edgewise, the leaves being a foot in width. Otherwise the tree looks as flat as though it had been pressed. While the top is twenty-five or thirty feet across, the entire width or thickness is but a foot. It truly presents a beautiful appearance.

Perhaps this is a good place to close this long letter. Dear friends, good-bye. D. M. B.

A Detour to Java.

BATAVIA, March 19, 1882.

DEAR READERS: When the steamer Khiva arrived at Singapore on the morning of the 10th inst. I repaired at once to the city, three miles away to ascertain if a steamer would soon leave for the island of Java, for if I could conveniently do so I wished to pay it a visit and see the sights of Singapore and write about them upon my return. I wished to cross the equator and visit the southern hemispheres, not that I expected to realize any particular difference between Singapore, a degree or so north of the equator, and other points a few degrees south of it. I certainly did not expect to see the equatorial line, nor to know when I passed under it or over it. I knew it was an imaginary line, or rather that though there is a precise place where the line belongs there is no line there. But I particularly wished to see the island of Java, fourth in size among the more than one hundred and twenty-five islands forming the Nearing Home.

From Omaha, under date of July 7th, Mr. Bennett writes us:

DEAR EUGENE: I made a rapid run through Colorado, visiting Denver, Blackhawk, Central City, Leadville, etc. I was kindly received by numerous friends whom I was very glad to meet, and was much interested with the various mines, smelting works, reducing and stamp mills, etc., which I visited, together with the majestic scenery of the Rocky Mountains, so grandly opened to the view of the enraptured beholder.

I had not corresponded with the friends and had not informed them of my arrival, consequently they were not looking for me so early. They wished me to stop over in each place and hold a meeting, but feeling that I could not take the time, I hurried on eastward.

The Liberal friends of this town gave me a fine reception last night in Masonic Hall, where a good audience greeted me on my homeward way. Edward D. McLaughlin, Esq., a prominent lawyer of this city, presided and made the opening speech. The remarks I followed with continued over an hour. The Liberal friends received me very kindly, and there are a large number of them. Considerable additions were made to THE TRUTH SEEKER list, as well as to the names of those who wish the Round-the-World volumes. I have had a very pleasant time here and made numerous acquaintances.

I pursue my eastern journey this morning, visiting a few points in Iowa and Illinois. I will speak in Chicago on the evening of Sunday, the 16th; in Milwaukee on the 17th; in Jackson, Mich., on the 23d; in Rochester, N. Y., on the 27th, after which I will soon be home. The malice of the lying Inter-Ocean and of the sick-roosterites is made very apparent, but aside from misleading those unacquainted with me, I trust no very great harm is accomplished. Yours truly, D. M. B.

The Chicago Liberals hav engaged Hershey Hall for the evening of the 16th and made all necessary arrangements for a hearty reception of the traveler. A pleasant time will, no doubt, be experienced by all parties.

The Lesson of the Washington Tragedy.

Last week the world witnessed the spectacle of a set of Christians hanging another Christian for his Christianity. And the world will be no better for it, unless it will take to heart the very obvious lesson that religion is what made the murderer and committed the murder. Over eighteen hundred years ago the Jews crucified the first Christian who had the courage of his convictions, and now his followers hav hung the last who had faith enough in God to obey his commands. There was as much evidence of Guiteau's inspiration as of any of the patriarchs and prophets who figure in "holy writ." Yet he was disbelieved by legal and ecclesiastical authorities. What would they do with Christ should he reappear and make the claims he is said to hav made in the first century? Hang him, undoubtedly, or put him in the insane asylum.

It would seem that there are no Christians at the present day who honestly, and with their whole beings, believe in the religion they profess so loudly, except such men as the assassin of Garfield. He was a Christian; his whole life had been devoted to preaching the gospel and ranting against Infidelity. He believed in God, in Christ, in heaven, in hell, in the resurrection, in salvation by the blood of Christ. Had he not placed such implicit faith in the Bible he would hav been alive to-day, and so would Garfield.

Guiteau's prayer upon the gallows proves his sincerity. He leaves it for the churches to prove that he was wrong. He had more faith than Christ had. His last words were, "The angels are coming to me." The well-known cry of Christ was widely different. The following prayer, which Guiteau made, is not the words of an unbeliever, but of one who was what his religion made him. Let the churches remember that, and never again say that Infidelity leads to crime. Infidels hav committed crimes, but never on account of their unbelief, while the leaves of history are thickly dotted with the names of men who had committed crimes because of their belief. It will be seen that Guiteau felt as sure of heaven as any so-called saint who ever lived:

"Father, now I go to thee and the Savior. I hav finished the work thou gavest me to do, and I am only too happy to go to thee. The world does not yet appreciate my mission, but thou knowest it. Thou knowest thou didst inspire Garfield's removal, and only good has come from it. This is the best evidence that the inspiration came from thee, and I hav set it forth in my book that all men read and know that thou, Father, didst inspire the act for which I am now murdered. This government and nation by this act, I know, will incur thy eternal enmity, as did the Jews by killing thy man, my Savior. The retribution in that case came quick and sharp, and I know thy divine law of retribution will strike this nation and my murderers in the same way. The diabolical spirit of this nation, its government, and its newspapers toward me will justify thee in cursing them, and I know that thy divine law of retribution is inexorable. I therefore predict that this nation will go down in blood, and that my murderers, from the Executiv to the hangman, will go to hell. Thy laws are inexorable, O thou supreme judge. Woe unto the men that violate thy laws! Only weeping and gnashing of teeth awaits them. The American press has a large bill to settle with thee, righteous Father, for their vindictivness in this matter. Nothing but blood will satisfy them, and now my blood be on them and this nation and its officials. Arthur, the President, is a coward and an ingrate. His ingratitude to the man that made him and saved his party and land from overthrow has no parallel in history; but thou, righteous father, wilt judge him. Father, thou knowest me, but the world hath not known me; and now I go to thee and the Savior without the slightest ill-will toward a human being. Farewell, ye men of earth."

When Garfield was first shot the church made haste to cry "Infidel!" Did ever a prayer like that come from an Infidel's lips? Guiteau felt that he was commissioned by God as divinely and fully as Jesus did. He had a mission. So had Jesus. He committed a crime against the laws of his land in pursuance of that mission. So did Jesus. He was put to death, as was Jesus, by the people whose laws he had broken. Who shall distinguish between the two? If Christianity is true, Guiteau may hav been right, in which case, will not the Christians who hung him hav a heavy penalty to pay? They profess to believe that the wanderings of the Jews are in consequence of their rejection of the Messiah; may not their rejection of Guiteau's claims lead to like disastrous consequences? They should think of these things and be consistent. We do not see how they can accept the inspiration of one "crank" and reject that of another who produces exactly the same evidence to support his claim. Guiteau's pueril song is exactly in keeping with Christ's words, that "except ye become as little children ye cannot enter the kingdom of heaven." His idea was "that of a little child babbling to his papa." We print it to show to what a state of imbecility religion can reduce an "inspired prophet:"

"I am going to the Lordy—I am so glad!
I am going to the Lordy—I am so glad!
I am going to the Lordy—Glory, hallelujah!
Glory, hallelujah! I am going to the Lord.

I love the Lordy with all my soul,
Glory, hallelujah! And that is the reason
I am going to the Lordy, glory hallelujah!
Glory hallelujah! I am going to the Lord.

I wonder what I will do when I get to the Lordy?
I guess that I will weep no more when I get to the Lordy.
I am going to the Lordy. Glory, hallelujah!
Glory, hallelujah! I am going to the Lord.

I wonder what I will see when I get to the Lordy?
I expect to see most splendid things, beyond all earthly conception,
When I am with the Lordy. Glory, hallelujah!
Glory, hallelujah! I am with the Lord."

Babble is just the word for such nonsense; but what a farce the whole thing is! Jesus's last words were of wild despair. The first inspired Christian died wailing; the last driveling. What a commentary on their faith! As a religion to liv by, Christianity has proved a failure. It has failed to make men better or kinder, more honest, or to respect the rights of others. Its most ardent advocates hav been the most tyrannical and cruel. Its firmest believers hav been the worst of men. It has developed instead of restrained wickedness. To die by, it is still worse. Its scheme of salvation puts a premium on rascality and affords hope to the murderer, but none to his unbelieving victim. Abraham's bosom is broad enough to hold every scoundrel, but there is no room in heaven for the virtuous. The lesson to be learned from Guiteau's fate is, Shun the superstition of Christianity as you would a pestilence, if you would liv usefully and die like a man.

Shaking off the Wicked, and Other Things.

JORDAN VALLEY, OR., June 22, 1882.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Is there any place in the Bible that speaks of God taking hold of the "ends of the earth" to shake the wicked off? If so, please state the chapter, as I wish to show it to a friend who denies that the Bible says the earth has ends. And where shall I find authority for the statement that the Jewish God once delighted in human sacrifices? By answering the above you will do a favor for a constant reader of your noble paper.

Yours for truth, W. R. KING.

In Job xxxviii God asks, "Where wast thou when I laid the foundations of the earth?" and in the twelfth and thirteenth verses of the same chapter propounds these pertinent queries: "Hast thou commanded the morning since thy days, and caused the day-spring to know his place, that it might take hold of the ends of the earth, that the wicked might be shaken out of it?" By Luke i, 78, it is learned that the day-spring is the thing that comes from on high "to giv light to them that sit in darkness and in the shadow of death, to guide our feet into the way of peace." As this, according to the church creeds, can only be done by God, or Christ, or the H. G. (short for holy ghost), the day-spring must be one of these three.

That God commanded (and if he had not delighted in them he would not hav commanded them) human sacrifices is learned from the following passages:

"No devoted thing that a man shall devote unto the Lord of all that he hath, both of man and of beast, and of the field of his possessions, shall be sold or redeemed; every devoted thing is most holy unto the Lord. None devoted, which shall be dedevoted of men, shall be redeemed, but shall surely be put to death" (Lev. xxvii, 28, 29).

"The king [David] took the two sons of Rizpah . . . and the five sons of Michael; . . . and he delivered them into the hands of the Gibeonites, and they hanged them in the hill betore the Lord. . . . And after that God was entreated for the land" (2 Sam. xxi. 8, 9, 14).

"And he [God] said, Take now thy son, thine only son Isaac, whom thou lovest, and get thee into the land of Moriah, and offer him there for a burnt offering" (Gen. xxii, 2).

"And Jephthah vowed a vow unto the Lord, and said, If thou shalt without fail deliver the children of Ammon into my hands, then it shall be, that whatsoever cometh forth of the doors of my house to meet me when I return in peace from the children of Ammon, shall surely be the Lord's, and I will offer it up for a burnt offering. So Jephthah passed over unto the children of Ammon to fight against them; and the Lord delivered them into his hands. . . . And Jephthah came to Mizpeh unto his house, and behold his daughter came out to meet him. . . . And he sent her away for two months; and she went with her companions and bewailed her virginity upon the mountains. And it came to pass at the end of two months that she returned unto her father, who did according to his vow which he had vowed" (Judges xi, 30, 31, 32, 34, 38, 39).

That is the kind of a God the Christians hav.

DID GOD EAT?

HAGERSTOWN, MD., July 3, 1882.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Is there not an account in the Bible of God eating a common meal with one of his servants? If so, please giv me the passage through THE TRUTH SEEKER. SAMUEL HAMMIL.

In the eighteenth chapter of Genesis it is recorded that Abraham had the pleasure of setting forth a meal for the Lord. He entertained angels unawares, which, from the fact that his wife conceived after their visit, would appear a dangerous thing for self-respecting husbands to do. It was in this wise: Abraham sat at his tent door on the plains of Mamre one day, when three men came along. He ran to meet them, and called one of them my Lord, somewhat after the manner of the English peasant who greets his landlord with "Me lud." Abraham told Sarah to "make ready quickly three measures of meal, knead it, and make cakes upon the hearth," while he picked out a fine calf from the herd and had it prepared in butter and milk. He then put these delicacies before the strangers, who did eat.

While engaged at their meal one of the strangers asked him where his wife was. Abraham answered, "In the tent." The stranger said that he would certainly return, and that Sarah should bear a child, at which Sarah laughed. Then the identity of the angel was disclosed, for we are informed that "the Lord [the angel] said unto Abraham, 'Wherefore did Sarah laugh? Is anything too hard for the Lord?'" [meaning himself.] When Sarah found out who she had been laughing at, she was afraid, and denied it, which, as it was only a little lie, was not put down against her. Then the men departed, but a wondering world is authoritativly informed in the twenty-first chapter of the same book that "The Lord visited Sarah as he had said, and the Lord did unto Sarah as he had spoken."

All of which goes to show that Abraham and his wife prepared a common meal for the Lord, and that the Lord ate it. And uninspired people might also say that it goes to show that Anthony Comstock and Oliver Stevens should let "Cupid's Yokes" and "Leaves of Grass" alone and proceed against the holy scriptures.

THE REAL BLASPHEMERS. By John R. Kelso, A.M. Paper, 50 cents. For sale at this office and by other Liberal book dealers.

As Col. Kelso says, it has always been a habit of preachers and churchmen generally to charge Freethinkers with blasphemy, especially when they cannot answer their arguments. To them Paine was a blasphemer, although he believed in God and defended his character against the aspersions of the theologians who attribute to him every vile characteristic which man himself possesses. Jehovah was but a magnified Jew, at the present reduced a little by the civilization of our time and accepted by the Christians because their forefathers believed in him. Against this kind of a God Col. Kelso argues there can be no blasphemy, because he does not exist. And imagining a decent god, he shows that the Christians are the real blasphemers, inasmuch as they charge him with doing that which he never does, and which is contrary to his nature. According to this, therefore, the champions of the Bible are the champion blasphemers, as they charge God with doing all sorts of impossible things, such as separating light from darkness, making something from nothing, etc. In his previous book he has analyzed Deity, and in this he analyzes the Bible, showing it to be false in all its essential statements. His assertions are accurate, and the good temper he displays is calculated to make the book valuable as a missionary document to hand to an inquiring churchman.

"DEITY ANALYZED," in six lectures, John R. Kelso, A.M., a book of 470 pages, written in terse prose and masterly rhyme, has been laid upon our table by the author, and we find it one of the best handbooks extant for Freethinkers and philosophers. "The Messiah or Savior," and "The Devil's Defense," are very clever and thoughtful productions, and every man who has learned to think for himself will find in this volume much food for serious reflection.—San Francisco Public Opinion.

"A TRUTH SEEKER AROUND THE WORLD." From New York to Damascus, being Vol. I., 836 octavo pages, of a series of letters written by D. M. Bennett while making a tour of the globe; as few can travel to the extent here described, and as most people will relish the fresh views of men and things in Europe, Asia, and elsewhere presented, this volume, like the other two to follow, will be eagerly sought and profitably read by increasing numbers finding facts better soul-food than creeds, codes, and customs born of superstition. The book is well printed, has a fine portrait of Mr. Bennett, and many interesting illustrations. Price, $2, three volumes for $5. Address THE TRUTH SEEKER, 141 Eighth street, New York.—The Word.

Third Annual Congress of the International Federation of Freethinkers.

We hav received from Charles Bradlaugh, as chairman of the General Council, the following notice. America should be represented by able men. Efforts hav been made to induce T. B. Wakeman to be one of the delegates, and we trust will be successful, although he is loth to leave his family and business. Let the Liberals labor with him.

"The Third Annual Congress will be held at Paris, in the large hall of the Grand Orient, Rue Cadet, on September 1, 2, and 3, 1882. The business arrangements are in the hands of the Union Democratique de Propagande Anticlericale (secretary, Mons. A. Cinqualbre, 48 rue monsieur le prince, Paris).

The questions placed on the order of the day by the Second Annual Congress, held in London, September, 1881, are as follows: "The Effect of Christianity Upon the World," "Will the Coming Man Need a Religion?" "The Oath Question in Various Countries," "The Best Methods of Propaganda." Readers of papers are requested to forward their names and the titles of their papers as soon as they conveniently can to the general secretary, J Swaagman, 48 Marlborough Hill, St. John's Wood, London, N. W,; and they are also reminded that it was decided at the London Congress that the openers of discussions and the readers of papers should be limited to thirty minutes of speech.

"Secretaries will much assist the General Council if they will be good enough to forward to the secretary of the council before August 1st the reports of their societies' work during the year, so that they may be incorporated in the General Report for 1881–82.

"The following proposition will be laid before the Congress by Mrs. Besant, member of the Council for England: That the words in rule 3—"Its seat shall be in London"—shall be amended as follows: "Its seat for the year shall be in the town selected by the Congress of each year for the next Congress ensuing.' J. SWAAGMAN."

The Watkins Dinner.

We hav received the two following letters seconding Mr. Green's proposition:

SHARON, CONN., July 2, 1882.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: It strikes me that Mr. H. L. Green's proposal in THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 1st, that a dinner be tendered to Mr. D. M. Bennett at the coming Freethinker's convention at Watkins Glen as a testimony to his fearless life and character, is eminently proper and timely. He, Mr. Green, has mentioned several, including myself, as a committee of arrangements. I am sure that all of us will be glad to act in such capacity, but I am equally sure that none of us will be so placed as to be able to take in hand the practical preparation of such a feast of reason, and so I would suggest that as Mr. Green is to be present to superintend all other arrangements, he be added to the committee and include the Bennett dinner in his general convention work.

Yours respectfully, COURTLANDT PALMER.

Mr. Bartlett will also be there:

SOUTH DARTMOUTH, MASS., July 2, 1882.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Mr. H. L. Green makes a proposition in the last TRUTH SEEKER to the effect that a dinner and reception be given to Mr. D. M. Bennett on the evening of the third day of the convention at Watkins Glen, and concludes his proposition thus: "And I ask all who second this motion to indicate through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER, Investigator, or both."

Mr. Editor, I second the motion through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and hope the dinner and reception will be decided upon at once, and that it will be a glorious success. Let our friends who are for free thought, free speech, a free press, and free mails respond through the columns of your paper.

Yours, EDWIN H. BARTLETT.

The Badge of Serfdom.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The remarks of Mrs. H. S. Lake, in a recent number of THE TRUTH SEEKER, on the Index reporter and Lucy Stone, are very suggestiv as well as most interesting.

The common custom of women merging themselvs in their husbands so entirely as to lose the identity of their own names is certainly humiliating, and, in a just sense, degrading; and the eagerness with which women fall into the long-established habit or custom is very surprising, to say the least, and shows how the long years of subjection to man hav left their firm impression upon their nature. It would be comical, were it not so mortifying, to note how quickly women put off the "maiden name" upon marriage, as though it were some upas-tree, and hastily adopt another name, often blotted with some stain or reproach, from which her own name was free and clear.

That she is no longer regarded as a femme sole after marriage is bad enough, but that she should be so eager to lose all her identity as an individual is sorrowful to contemplate.

"Husband and wife are one," screams some man, "and don't you forget it!" But which one is the one? Why, the man, of course, always and every time. He is the head of the family, the head of the house, as "Christ is the head of the church." The Bible says it, therefore it is, and women bow their heads, and the chain eats into their flesh, but they make no complaint. The law and the gospel join hands, and the women keep silence.

But there is a great deal about this legal "one" business that is as well a legal fiction. Yet I heard a lawyer in court not long since, in a conspiracy case where a husband with another had conspired to defame the character of his wife, make a motion to quash the indictment on the ground of the oneness of the husband and wife, and therefore the one (which was the husband, you know) could not possibly conspire against himself!

It is very astonishing how indifferent women are to the matter of their personal identity and its preservation, and until they assert their independence in this particular we fear they will not make great headway in the enfranchisment of the sex. Married women lose not only their names, but their children, and their badge of serfdom denotes the ownership of both child and mother.

If women were not ashamed to parade a man's name for their own, as may be witnessed upon visiting cards, advertisments for servants, reading thus, Mrs. Capt. Jabez White, Mrs. Dr. John Snow, Mrs. Hon. Peter Finigin, and the like, I should think men themselvs would feel rather sheepish to see their names in public print, preceded by a Mrs., as wanting dressmakers, nursery maids, second girls, cooks, chambermaids, and washerwomen.

I heard of one gentleman who justly rebuked this sort of thing. He took a letter from the post-office addressed to himself with a Mrs. at the beginning of his name. He said to his wife: "Let this thing stop at once. I am not a Mrs., and never shall be. Inform your correspondents immediately, and also that you hav a name of your own, and advise them accordingly."

What would men think to write themselvs as Mr. Jane O'Brien, Mr. Katy Brown, etc.? How it would sound! And it is quite as ridiculous on the other hand.

I am not inveighing against marriage, for I do believe in its truth and sanctity as much as anyone can, but I like to see my own sex as independent and individualized as the other. Woman should be neither a drudge nor a toy, an angel nor an underling, but she should be just a woman, and an equal of the best man, asserting her rights and her independence. She should be proud of her identity as a woman, and maintain that identity in marriage as well as out of it, and the name she inherited should remain hers till death. She may add her husband's name if she chooses, but her own name she should never part with, nor merge herself in another's name with the foolish glee of an ignorant child, or a slave who has been sold to a new master. Let women think of this matter and follow the example of Lucy Stone who, although many years a wife, has worn her own honored name fearlessly and unmolested.

Yours for equal rights, SUSAN H. WIXON.

The Cause in Stockton.

From Stockton, Cal., under date of June 20th, Mr. Bennett writes to THE TRUTH SEEKER, as follows:

"Pursuant to invitation, I visited this pleasant city yesterday, and a meeting of the friends was tendered me last night. Turn Hall was well filled with an appreciativ audience. After music by Mr. Dreyfoos' orchestra, Dr. A. S. Hudson made the opening speech, of twenty or thirty minutes, introducing me, and descanting on the steady growth of Freethought and the teachings of science. I then talked about an hour. After which the usual hand-shakings, with several subscriptions to THE TRUTH SEEKER and the Round-the-World volumes. There are a goodly number of intelligent Liberals here, and our cause is evidently on the increase.

"My anxiety to get home is so great that I hav decided to forego the pleasure of a visit to the Yosemite valley, and the towns south of this place. I take the eastward train to-day, stopping in Nevada a day or two, and then passing on to Salt Lake City, Denver, etc. Yours truly, D. M. B."

A Victim of Railway Monopoly.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Yesterday the Board of Pardons—the Pennsylvania Railroad monopoly-Cameron-bossisms-Quay-ring-robbing board of pardons—which met at Harrisburg one day in advance of the Cameron-ring monopoly-boss-rule-stalwart-Republican-re-convened State Convention, declined to grant me a pardon for the alleged "artificial" crime of selling railroad tickets, the specific offense being that I sold a passenger a ten-dollar ticket over the Pennsylvania railroad for nine dollars, thus saving him one dollar, and preventing the railway monopoly from robbing the passenger from whom I purchased the ticket for eight dollars.

Of the eight hundred prisoners imprisoned in this modern bastile, this Christian torture-pen, at the present time, I am the only outspoken and declared Infidel known among the entire number. This is why I am here, because I am a Freethinker, a free man, and believe in free and honest trade in railroad tickets or anything else that the law allows one to buy that is not injurious to the health and morals of mankind. I appeal to the Liberals, Freethinkers and lovers of liberty in America, not so much for financial aid, although I hav a wife and child, and am poor and penniless at present, as for their moral assistance and influence. The law under which I am imprisoned and hav now been tortured for seven months of my one year's sentence and five hundred dollars fine is unconstitutional, and so declared by leading judges and lawyers of the country, but here in Philadelphia and Pennsylvania, where everything is under the influence and iron rule of Pennsylvania railway monopoly and Cameronism, the people hav but few rights, while the monopolies and political bosses do as they please. I now appeal for justice to the tribunal of the last resort, the people.

Notwithstanding Judge Mitchell sent to the Board of Pardons by my attorney a very strong, plain, and comprehensiv letter, stating my sentence to the full extent of the vile law was rendered by him under a "false impression of the facts" in the case, and strongly advising the board to grant my petition, and notwithstanding a large number of the leading merchants and business men of Philadelphia had signed my application for pardon, the board declined to grant it. This is the reason: Because the board is a railway monopoly, Cameron-Quay-ring-board, and they could not let me out for fear of the consequences. No pardon for one who would use his voice and pen for the dethronement of "Cameronism" and "bossism," as well as monopoly. They were undoubtedly informed of my intention to launch a weekly anti-monopoly, anti-boss, anti-Cameron paper soon after my release. Hence I must suffer here till the end of my time, Nov. 1st, unless the people—my countrymen—find some other means of opening my bastile doors.

So much for not sacrificing my honor, principle, and manhood. I here publicly appeal to our champion of liberty, R. G. Ingersoll, to call the attention of the President and attorney-general to this unconstitutional law and outrage by a monopoly upon a private citizen. I also appeal to the friends of liberty in Congress—the representativs of the people—to bring my case before Congress before its adjournment. Let every lover of liberty write the governor of Pennsylvania and the leading independent press of the country ventilating this outrage. All who feel able and wish to aid me in exposing this infamy and assist me in my struggle for liberty and right, can send me one dollar or less, addressed to S. F. Wilson, care of my attorney, Wm. C. Gross, 132 South 6th street, Philadelphia, Pa., who will acknowledge the same for me by post, and I will publicly acknowledge all contributions in my paper, Wilson's Anti-Monopoly Agitator, soon after my release.

SYLVESTER F. WILSON.

[Investigator, Man, Iconoclast, Agnostic, Kansas Liberal. Index, Banner of Light, and all free and independent papers, Greenback and anti-monopoly, please copy and mail marked copy to above address, and accept grateful thanks of S. F. W.]

The Hacker Fund.

MR. EDITOR AND READERS OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: I am happy to state that the donations for June hav kept pace with those for May. There are some real, generous, noble, sacrificing souls helping along with this work of love.

Our little club is slowly, yet I hope surely, growing. I am anxious that none of you shall "fall out by the way" or forget to send in your donations on time. Order and prompt action are very desirable.

I would like to say to members of the club and special contributors, hav your donations forwarded so I can get them by the end of the month, as on the first I shall close up for the previous month and immediately forward the aggregate to Bro. Hacker. I would suggest that you each select some particular day, not too near the close, as a day, not of humiliation and prayer, but of remembrance, to perform a little self-imposed duty for the relief of your aged and destitute brother.

I am afraid that some of our friends who hav not yet contributed are ashamed to append their names to a twenty-five-cents-per-month donation, who may also feel not able to contribute more. To this I would say that if there be any cause of shame at all, it is rather in making no donation. Knowing that begging is much more offensiv than pleasant, Elmina and I hav appealed to you for a very small monthly mite, so that all could giv without shame and none feel it. A brief extract from a recent letter of Bro. Hacker's says, "We thank you for what you hav done more than words can express; also Elmina and all who hav so kindly aided us." Yours fraternally,

Baltimore, Md., Box 878. C. GARWOOD.

STATEMENT FOR THE MONTH OF JUNE.

A. J. Stough, Bozeman, Montana, $2.50; J. L. Tompkins, Lake City, Iowa, $1; Elijah Clark, Davis, Illinois, $2; Ernest Rhine, Bavonne, N. J., $2; E W. Fitzner, Nevada City, California, 50 cents; V. J. Borrette, White Rock, Nevada, 30cents: Elijah Myrick, Ayers, Massachusetts, $2; A. Minski, Superior, Nebraska, $1; William Black, Carrollton, Illinois, in advance to February 16, 283, $2; A. G, Duquoin, Illinois, 27 cents; E Livezey, Baltimore, Maryland, 25 cents; C. Garwood, Baltimore, Maryland, 25 cents.

MR. HACKER'S ACKNOWLEDGMENT.

BERLIN, N. J., July 1, 1882.

Received of C. Garwood, of Baltimore, Maryland, $14 08

Through the office of THE TRUTH SEEKER as follows: From N. N. E. Wood, M.D, Sioux City, Iowa, $1: Leonard Jackson, Mt Jackson, Virginia, $3; J F Ruggles, Bronson, Michigan, $1: W. H. Graham, Los Angeles, California, $1; J. A. Hallotte, Liberal, Missouri, 25 cents; Paul Simon, Rebold, Wisconsin, $2: O. Cooledge, Ashland, Oregon, $2; J J Ford, New York city, 50 cents; D. E. Burt, East Dubuque, Illinois, $1; J. J. Knowles, Quincy, Michigan, 25 cents: John Burr, Braceville, Illinois, 50 cents; Warren C. Barrus, Georgetown, Colorado, 50 cents.

Several others of my old-time friends hav sent gifts, but I do not know as they want their names published. If they do they will please notify me, as I desire to please all.

B. F Underwood, of Boston, has sent me $5 from the office of the Free Religious Association, but does not state whether it is from himself or from the Association. If from the latter, it is more than I am aware of having ever received from all religious societies, excepting the Shakers. We hav not words to express our gratitude to all the kind friends. J. and M. S. HACKER.

The Michigan State Association.

It is known to many that Mr. Burdick, the President of the State Association of Spiritualists and Liberalists, some time ago resigned his position. The revised articles of association contain no provision for filling vacancies. They provide that in case of the absence of the president from any meeting, one of the directors shall act in his stead, but do not say which one. This vacancy leaves the secretary the only responsible executiv officer of the Association, as he is the rightful and legitimate medium of communication and correspondence. As such officer, I shall be glad to receive communications bearing upon the organic work in the state and on all matters of interest connected with the cause from officers of societies and all other persons.

S. B. MCCRACKEN,

Detroit, Mich., July 3, 1882. Secretary.

Watkins Glen and Bismarck Grove.

In August two great meetings will be held, the New York Freethinkers' Convention, at Watkins Glen, and the Kansas Liberal Union, at Bismarck Grove. Liberals of America, let us make these meetings a grand success. Let every one who can attend one or both of them. The pleasure and profit derived will richly repay for the time and expense involved, while the moral effect of two great outpourings of enthusiastic Liberals, one in the East and one in the West, cannot be over estimated. Let the watchword, then, be "On to Watkins!" or "On to Bismarck!" J. E. REMSBURG.

Atchison, Kansas, July 6, 1882.

The Freethinkers' Convention,—Excursion Rates.

The Northern Central Railway Co., and the Lake Shore and Michigan Southern Railway Co. hav each agreed to sell excursion tickets to the Watkins Freethinkers' Convention from any station on the line of said roads or their branches. But before any person can avail themselvs of this arrangement he or she must send to me for a certificate. Friends, send in your orders, with a three-cent stamp.

eastern or Malayan archipelago, sometimes called the Thousand Islands, and the most prosperous and best governed of the lot. I knew that Java belongs to the Dutch, that it is a very fertile and productive island, and that the greater portion of the Java coffee drank is supposed to come from this island, but all beyond these few general facts I must confess I was ignorant of. I thought I should know more.

I learned at Singapore that the steamer Gen. Louden sailed for Batavia, over five hundred miles from Singapore, at 12 o'clock M., and that a second-class passage cost twenty-five dollars. I concluded to make the investment, and in due time a small boat, manned by two Malayan natives, was taking me some two miles out into the "roads" to the Louden, and in half an hour we weighed anchor and were off. Singapore looks rather pretty from the sea, as nearly all seaports do. The tall cocoanut-trees among the suburbs present the usual tropical appearance, and on the northern side the hills are picturesque and luxuriant. Our passage, as you are aware, led south between the islands of Sumatra and Borneo.

Before nightfall we had crossed the equator, without the slightest damage being incurred. We stopped at a cluster of small islands called, as I was told, Rio, or the Rio archipelago, to change mail and take on a passenger or two. Those islands look beautiful, and on the main one rather of a nice looking village stands upon the shore. The most conspicuous growth in all these places is the cocoanut-tree, the most valuable to the people of this part of the world of all other trees. The plantain or banana is also seen in abundance everywhere, but they are are not so tall and not so conspicuous as the first. On the second day we halted at another island, Montauk, and changed mail again. This also belongs to the Dutch, and presents signs of prosperity. Many small islands on the right, lying off the large island of Sumatra. I counted twenty-eight islands at one time in sight, besides two or three I thought too small to count, and threw them in for good measure.

The passengers on the steamer were Dutch or Malayans, the last in much the largest numbers, and as deck passengers. Several of the Dutch are officers in the army of different grades, besides private citizens. I found but two who spoke English, so my conversational opportunities were not of the best kind. One of them had the kindness to assure me that I looked very much like the king of Holland—"almost a perfect picture or him." I said to myself: "Now that settles it. I have always thought there was something about me, and now I know it." I have been taken for a Dutchman often, and for a Methodist preacher several times; but now to be told that I look like a Dutch king—that excels all, and I give up beat.

I cannot say that the Dutch are the most pleasant people to travel with I have met. They are good-natured and social, but rough and noisy. At meals they are decidedly uproarious. Probably if the military officers had been absent there would have been less noise. I was half suspicious, too, that the wine and beer, which were freely partaken of, had something to do with the noise. I do not think this Dutch line of steamers is as well managed as the English "P. & O." line. There is less tidiness evinced. Neither do I like the dishes or the cooking so well. Think of many having to eat "stofe," "shouse," and dishes of that sort! Stofe, I believe, is potatoes and greens mashed up together, and shouse is a kind of gravy. The names of the other dishes are equally euphonious and elegant.

There must have been fully two or three hundred natives on board, male and female, babies and all. They were around on the two decks thick as grasshoppers in Kansas. They feed themselves, and of course had their food with them, consisting of rice, grain, fruits, etc. The Malayans, much like those at Penang and Singapore, are rather pleasant-looking people, somewhat inclined to pug-noses and high cheek-bones. They are of a darker-yellow than the Chinese, with straight black hair and no beard. I think they practice pulling out all hairs from the face. I must acknowledge them a better looking people than I supposed. They seem lively and cheerful. Several groups were nearly all the time playing some game on deck. One game is a kind of cards, but smaller and wholly unlike ours; another something like dice, a top having the dots on its several sides, and while it is spinning, or while it is covered from view, money is laid down on the board duly marked off. These games were participated in by both men and women, though I noticed that the women played mostly with the small cards, and did not bet so high as the men. They are a free-and-easy sort of people, and do not seem at all fastidious. They are largely Mohammedan in religion, but it evidently sits easily upon them. Many of them are stout, well-developed people, and have pleasant countenances. They are said to be industrious and willing to work, but inclined to be a trifle slow. They are a plodding people, but not so intellectual and "sharp" as the Chinese, who are the traders and mechanics here, as at Penang and Singapore. The Malays are often the servants of the Chinese.

We arrived off this port about 3 P. M., Sunday, the 12th. The water next to the shore is shallow, and the steamer anchored three miles from the town. A small steamer took off the passengers, mail, etc., and approached the town by means of a mole or canal between two walls of brick about one hundred and fifty feet apart and running fully two miles into the shallow water of the Javan sea. This mole has undoubtedly been excavated so as to give sufficient depth of water at low tide. A lighthouse stands on one of the walls of the mole. As we enter the city the mole branches out into basins and is much utilized by small boats. We passed several small craft (principally native) in the mole.

From the ocean the western end of Java looks low but luxuriant. No mountains or high land are in sight, but farther east the high land commences and reaches altitudes of ten thousand and twelve thousand feet. Michelet calls Java "a belt of fire." The name is doubtless well deserved, for the island contains a greater number of active and extinct volcanoes than any other portion of the earth of the same area. The island is traversed by two magnificent mountain chains, and these are thickly sown with volcanoes, not fewer than forty-five in number. This belt of fire is composed of extinct as well as active volcanoes—a belt marked by lava-blackened peaks crowned with yawning craters, and occasionally throwing abroad fierce signals of flame, smoke, and vapor. This volcanic formation extends over many of the neighboring islands, including Sumatra, though more numerous in Java than elsewhere. This accounts for the great fertility of the island, as decomposed volcanic matter makes the richest of soil.

The mountains of Java are undoubtedly largely of volcanic formation. It is well known that all volcanoes (or nearly all) have been built up by the accumulation of matter—mud, ashes, and lava—ejected from their own bowels. The openings and craters often shift their position, and thus a country may be covered with irregular series of hills in chains and masses, here and there rising into lofty cones, and still the country be essentially volcanic. This is the opinion of the English scientist, Wallace, who has given much attention to this island. He says: "There has been some elevation, especially on the south coast, where extensive cliffs of coral limestone are found; and there may be a substratum of older stratified rocks; but still essentially Java is volcanic, and that noble and fertile island—the very garden of the East, and, perhaps, upon the whole, the richest, the best cultivated, and the best governed tropical island in the world—owes its very existence to the same intense volcanic activity, which still occasionally devastates its surface."

THE EASTERN ARCHIPELAGO.

Before entering into a description of Java it will be well to make a few general remarks about the great body of islands among which it is numbered. From the southern extremity of Asia to the northwestern portion of Australia stretches a double—and in some places a treble—chain of islands, some large and some small, but occupying a space of four thousand miles in length from east to west, and some thirteen hundred miles from north to south, and lying entirely in the tropical zone. Three of these islands, Borneo, Sumatra, and New Guinea, are severally larger than Great Britain. Borneo is larger than any island in the world, save Australia, which is called a continent; while Java, Celebes, and Luzon are each about the size of Ireland. Eighteen others of these islands may be compared to Jamaica, and more than a hundred others as large as the Isle of Wight.

It is believed that these islands once belonged to the Asiatic main-land and united Australia to the same continent. This is the opinion of both Earl and Wallace, and they have no doubt that Borneo, Sumatra, and Java certainly once helped to form the continent of Asia. The Eastern or Malay archipelago has been divided into two grand divisions—the Asiatic and the Australian, Java, Sumatra, Borneo, and the Philippines forming the former, and Timor group, the Celebes, the Molluccas, New Guinea, the Ke and Aru Islands constituting the latter. The following facts are adduced to justify this division:

1. In the first place, it has been found that a shallow sea connects the three great islands of Sumatra, Java, and Borneo with the Asiatic continent; and this sea averages fifty fathoms in depth, while a similarly shallow sea connects New Guinea and adjacent islands with Australia. Between the two is a deep sea more than a hundred fathoms in depth.

2. A wide difference exists in the natural productions of the two divisions. The first division has the elephant, the tapir, the rhinoceros, wild cattle, all of which belong to the same genera in the southern part of Asia. They could not have swam the breadth of waters that now divide these islands from the main-land, and it is a justifiable conclusion that they were once all of the same continent. The same lesson is taught by the birds and insects; for though the birds have wings to fly with, save some aquatic tribes, which are decidedly wanderers, the perching birds are generally as strictly limited by straits and arms of the sea as quadrupeds. As an instance, Java has several species of birds never found in Sumatra, though a strait but fifteen miles wide separates them. The same genera found on what is termed the Asiatic division are also found on the continent, while they are not found in the Australian division.

3. The volcanic character of the two divisions is very dissimilar. What is called the Asiatic division abounds in volcanoes, Sumatra having fifteen; proceeding eastward Bonda, Amboyna, Bouro, Ceram, Gilolo, Siace, and Sanquir, to the Phillippine Islands, are all volcanic. While this is the case, the southern range leading on to Australia belong to the coral formation, and not to the volcanic.

4. Australia, and the islands belonging to that continent, have neither ape, monkey, cat, nor tiger, wolves nor hyenas, no bears, no elephants, horses, sheep, deer, or oxen. Australia has the kangaroo, the opossum, and the wombat, and so have the islands grouped with her, while none of these are found in the Asiatic division. It is the same with the birds; those found in Australia are found in the islands of the second division and not in the first. The Asiatic division has woodpeckers, pheasants, barbets, fruit thieves, etc., common in the continent, while it has not honey-suckers, cockatoos, or brush-tongued lories which are possessed by Australia and the Australian islands.

5. The human races in the two divisions bring the same conclusion. In the first division the Malay race are found the same as upon the Malay peninsula, while in the Australian division the Papuans only are found, with some cross-breed where they come together. It would seem that the ground for accepting the classification claimed is almost without fault.

Sumatra is second in size in the Eastern archipelago, and second, perhaps, in the amount of exports made. It lies directly under the equator, and extends six degrees north and south. It lies obliquely from the southeast to the northwest, and is about one thousand miles long, and in the widest place, opposite Singapore, one hundred and forty miles wide. Its superficial area is one hundred and forty thousand square miles. Its northern end is separated from the Malayan Peninsula by the Strait of Malacca, and on the south it is separated from Java by the Strait of Sunda. The eastern portion is level and well watered by three sluggish rivers. On the western side range after range of mountains exist, running parallel with the coast, some of them five thousand feet high. The highest peak on the island is 12,140 feet. Several others are two thousand feet lower. The island is rich in tropical verdure, though it is not as well cultivated as Java. Its forest-trees are colossal in size, often surrounded by innumerable parasites and creeping plants of great beauty; and these are so thoroughly interlaced as to form an impervious labyrinth of the most luxuriant growth. Palms of various varieties, large fig-trees, and fragrant myrtles are very abundant. On the mountain slopes oaks of every species grow large; but the most valuable tree on the island is the camphor-tree, or dryanobalops; and another valuable tree is that which produces the gum dammar, used in varnishes for maps, etc.

The exports of Sumatra are capsicum, ginger, betel, tobacco, indigo, cotton, camphor, cinnamon, rattan, ebony, benzoin, sandal-wood, teak, aloes, ivory, rice, wax, edible bird's nests, etc. Among the productions may also be named sweet potatoes, maize, taro, bananas, mangoes, durians, citrons, etc. Owing to the frequent rains the mountains are covered with a luxuriant growth even to their very tops. The animals found on this large island are the royal tiger, the tapir, ourang-outangs, monkeys, antelopes, zebras, buffaloes, horses, goats, pigs, and oxen. The forests are peopled by many birds with bright plumages, and the rivers are inhabited by crocodiles.

The inhabitants are principally Malays. In the northern part there is an admixture of Hindoo blood. There was once a Hindoo colony there, and ruins of ancient Hindoo temples still remain. The religion of the island is Mohammedan. There is but little education among them, and of course the most absurd superstitions abound about devils, evil spirits, etc. They have not so many gods to trouble them as some races have, but the devils make up the deficiency. They are of a peaceful, quiet disposition. Even the boys among them are far less inclined to mischievous tricks than European and American boys. Wallace describes a colony of tame squirrels at Palembang, the principal town on the island. Upon holding out crumbs of bread or other food the squirrels would come down from the tree-tops and take the morsels from the hands of the feeders. Such a colony of squirrels would hardly be allowed to remain in peace in any American town. Wallace remarks that the manner in which Malays frequently obtain the confidence of wild animals is a pleasant trait in their character, and he ascribes it to the great deliberation of their habits and movements and their love of repose. The young are obedient to the wishes of their elders, and have little inclination to mischief and unruly conduct. The villages in the interior are said to be somewhat peculiar. They are surrounded by a high fence; the huts built without streets or regularity, and raised on posts six feet high, sometimes built of planks, but more often of bamboo. Benches, chairs, and stools, as well as other furniture, are a superfluity not often indulged in. Cocoanut-trees and the plantain are always cultivated about the villages, as upon the fruits they are enabled to obtain their principal livelihood.

The Dutch have some points in possession on the west coast, constituting four provinces, the capital of which is Padang. The Dutch rule these natives with a heavy hand; but probably if they had the entire island under their control it would be better for the people, and the island would be far more productive. As it is, the resources of the island are but poorly developed. It is capable of yielding to the world ten times as much of its magnificent wealth as it now does. The Dutch have tried to extend their dominions, but were not eminently successful. The natives showed too much fight to suit them.

Borneo, lying also under the equator, possessing much the same luxuriance as Java and Sumatra, is still more in a state of nature. It has been subdued by the hand of man to a very limited degree. It seems singular that while the enterprise of man has caused him to settle and subdue such cold and cheerless countries as Norway, Iceland, and even Scotland, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Maine, such a fertile and luxuriant island as this should not be colonized and appropriated by any nation. It is 850 miles in length, and 720 miles in breadth, with an area of 270,000 square miles—three times the size of Great Britain. Its chain has been likened to a shoulder of mutton, the northern end being the narrowest. It may be described as one immense forest, generally of very moderate elevation, traversed by great rivers, which descend from a central group of mountains, surrounded by wide alluvial plains. Its physical character is unlike that of Java and Sumatra; its plains are of much greater extent, and its mountains not so high, which generally reach an average altitude of from four to six thousand feet, the chain of Kimbalu reaching the hight of 13,680 feet. The rivers are mostly tidal, and wide only on the plains, where their volume is large. The island of Borneo is undoubtedly capable of growing food to sustain one hundred million of people, while perhaps it has hardly a hundredth part of that number, and they poor miserable beings at that. It seems to require cold climates to endow men with hardiness, enterprise, and thrift.

Elmina Seeing the Sights.

DEAR TRUTH SEEKERS: Since I wrote to you last I hav had so many pleasant experiences I could not describe them without wearying you all, but will only giv a brief summary, so that you may see where I've been all this time. I returned to Rhinebeck from the "Hub," and attended the four days of commencement exercises of the institute, and then went back to Pleasant Valley and staid a few days, then bade perhaps a last farewell to mother, sister, and brother, and all the home folks, and once more took my way to the great city of New York to make a farewell visit there among the pleasant friends who hav been so kind to me. I attended a theater, went to Coney Island and saw that famous watering place where hundreds of thousands of New Yorkers go day after day to recreate and bathe in the briny waves. It is truly a place of pleasure, games, and amusements of all kinds. Music and dancing, restaurants and hotels, and all that pleases are there found. I went up in the great centennial iron tower three hundred feet in an elevator, and gazed abroad over the wide waters, the green land, and sandy beaches, the hurrying crowd below looking like mere pigmys and moving specks on the earth. Went to the museum and saw the wonderful elastic skin man, who could draw the skin of the back of his neck up for a night-cap, and that under his chin for a veil, and make it in great flaps in the under side of his arm or any of his limbs; and the man with one hundred faces, who could look like George Washington, Peter Cooper, an Irishwoman, a Dutchman, or a country school-boy, and presented each character exactly. Then a friend took me to the Metropolitan Museum, where I saw all sorts of animals, birds, shells, rocks, etc., in cabinets, and there were curiosities from foreign lands, and skeletons and specimens of prehistoric ages. We took a pleasant walk in Central Park, that wonderful wilderness of tree, lake, rock, and meadow in the great city of brick and mortar, and there, in a little cave, we stood silent, still, and as alone as if we two were the only denizens of earth.

But the brightest day must hav an end, and once more the iron steed bore me away over the far fields into the Keystone state, and here I am among the friends of long ago—in Flemington, where the first years of my married life was spent, and our first child (Oscar) was born, among Mr. Slenker's relativs and those who were once our neighbors. I hav renewed old acquaintances and made new ones; hav seen the boys and girls I left mere children, now surrounded by olive branches of their own, the old and the new so intermingled I can hardly realize whether the past has come back or I myself hav! And by a wonderful coincidence the very woolen mill that Mr. Slenker worked in there, and which we saw burn down, has again burned to the ground during my present stay here. But amid all the changes one can see improvement and progress always on the advance. More comfort, more education, more real appreciation of life and its blessings are everywhere. Where one used to read our Liberal papers in fear and trembling fifty will now eagerly seek and devour them freely and publicly. A little lingering of the old myths dwells in the the minds of nearly all, but the general intelligence is leading toward fact, science, and truth. The churches look old, dilapidated, and forsaken, and the frequenters gay, happy, and worldly. Heaven fades away in the distance, and earth grows grander and more beautiful. People no longer nurse their sorrows and think it a sin to be joyful and happy, but everywhere the love of the esthetic and the good is on the increase. With so much of joy on every side, who shall say life is not a blessing? or who could long for an unknown future?

My heaven here I'll fondly seek,
In this, the only life I know,
And humbly ask, with patience meek,
That best of cheer to all may flow.
And when my hour shall come to die,
I know not when nor where nor how,
No shadows dark shall dim my sky
For finding heaven here and now.

Yours truly, ELMINA D. SLENKER.

That Old Man Abraham.

There are but few Christians who know that the statement in the eighth verse of the twenty-fifth chapter of Genesis is false and absurd. It says that Abraham died in a good old age, an old man, and full of years. Well, what is there about that that is wrong? If a man lives to be one hundred and seventy-five years old is he not full of years? He would be considered so at this age, but not in Abraham's time, when men lived to be six hundred years old. You will find by Gen. xi, that Shem, one of Noah's sons, did not die till thirty-five years after Abraham, being six hundred years old. In what sense, then, could it be said that Abraham died in a good old age and full of years, when, according to the run of ages, he had not reached what might be called the prime of life? The following table is from the Gen. xi, commencing at the tenth verse:

		DATE B.C.
Year of the flood,		2348
Shem at the birth of	Arphaxad, 100 years old, in the year	2346
" "	Salah, 135 " " "	2311
" "	Eber, 165 " " "	2281
" "	Peleg, 199 " " "	2247
" "	Ren, 229 " " "	2217
" "	Serug, 261 " " "	2185
" "	Nahor, 291 " " "	2155
" "	Terah, 320 " " "	2126
" "	Abraham, 390 " " "	2056
Shem at the death of Abraham,	565 " " "	1881
Shem died in the year		1846

Asphaxed	died,	1908;	age	438;	died before Abram,	27	yrs.
Salah	"	1878;	"	433;	" after "	3	"
Eber	"	1817;	"	464;	" " "	64	"
Peleg	"	2008;	"	239;	" before "	127	"
Reu	"	1978;	"	239;	" " "	97	"
Serug	"	1955;	"	230;	" " "	74	"
Nahor	"	2007;	"	148;	" " "	126	"
Terah	"	1921;	"	205;	" " "	40	"

Yet you will find that the Bible chronology dates Abraham's death in the year 1822 B.C., twenty-four years later than Shem's death, which would make Abraham two hundred and thirty-four years old. Gen. xii, 4, tells us that Abraham took his wife, and the souls they had gotten in Haran, and went to the land of Caanan, he then being seventy-five years old; yet the chronology puts the date at 1921 B.C., making Abraham one hundred and thirty-five years old. How and why they make the dates so incorrect I cannot see, for any common school-boy would do better, and not half try. ALFRED L. BINLEY.

The Freethinkers' Convention,

A WORD TO THE LIBERALS OF NEW ENGLAND AND OF THE WEST.

The general passenger agent of the Fitchburg railroad (Hoosac Tunnel route) has agreed to giv low rates of fare to New England people who desire to attend the Freethinkers' Convention at Watkins Glen if a certain number of names can be pledged who will take tickets; and the Lake Shore and Michigan Southern railroad will also giv us low rates from Chicago and at the various stations along its line if a certain number of names can be pledged to take excursion tickets from Chicago.

Therefore, I hereby request every person residing in New England who would like to purchase a cheap excursion ticket from Boston to the Convention and return to at once send me his or her name. And also every person living in Chicago or west of there who would like to purchase a cheap excursion ticket from Chicago to the Convention and return to at once send me his or her name. H. L. GREEN.

Means for Ends.—Learning and Loggerheads.

The system of learning pursued at all our great colleges, and consequently imitated very extensivly at the lower schools, should be well exposed to the public in order that a thorough reform may be instituted. The almost sole subjects of study are Latin and Greek (some Hebrew), abstract mathematics, and theology. The attention given to other matters is small indeed. Having passed ten years of my life at some of these institutions, the last few of which were in a regular course, for which the previous six were preparatory, and having observed in myself and several hundred others the effect of the course of study, I incline to rank the college course with the other wastes and burdens of life imposed on himself by man. It belongs to the class of expensiv governments, standing armies, church and state. But the effect on society is irreparable loss. We take the flower of our youth and literally emasculate their minds.

When our oldest colleges were instituted all the learning of the world was concealed in Greek or Latin works. Did one desire to study law, medicin, theology, history, science, he must first learn to read the languages they were published in. There was also a time when the British student of law had to learn French. The law ceased to be written in French and the students of law ceased to study French. The sciences of the world are no longer concealed in two dead languages, yet we go on wasting long years of the most precious part of life over these tongues. There is something idiotic in this habit, but it is the same with all human institutions that survive their utility. There are to-day two or three branches of science that are indispensable to human life, and which require a lifetime to even partially understand, They are left to whomsoever will take them up, while all the sons of wealth and leisure begin droning over amo, amas, and tupto tupteis from the age of ten till twenty-one. Perhaps that would not matter as to what they do, but alas! the sons of toil, those who hav but few years to spend in study alone, do so naturally follow their example. Yes, the schools for the people's children are invaded by this idiocy, and those who are to lead in the great future are wasting years to get a smatter of Greek, and after all they must remain inferior to the commonest serving maid of old Attica.

The writer has done what not one graduate in ten thousand does—he has kept up the reading of Greek and Latin each year of his life. And of what use? The thorough acquisition of science, such as chemistry and geology, or electricity or metalurgy, would hav been of more use to mankind and himself than had he learned these two languages with Hebrew and Sanskrit, with a dozen more dead tongues. Long ago men of great genius and erudition remarked the same respecting a college course. Cowper, the poet, Sidney, Adam Smith, and Macaulay, among others, hav exposed the folly and absurdity of such waste of time. Macaulav, in his "Essay on the London University," is especially severe, and in his common sense way unanswerably condemns the whole system.

As our TRUTH SEEKER world has so many quick, activ, influential minds, I present these ideas, hoping they may stir some minds up to activ opposition to such wicked waste of time and good material. Every village school has some one or more friends to some college begging for it. The ambitious youth all hope to enter college and study Greek and Latin. Lofty ambition! A simple reflection ought to expose its fallacy. If a knowledge of these tongues is so important now they are dead, and that learning is no longer like a mummy swathed in them, what must it hav been when they were the living vehicles of all the thought of civilization, and how infinitly superior to our best were the Roman plowboys and Greek milkmaids? How natural for dull, sleepy, old colleges to stand still while the world went past them, and finally mistake the means of acquiring knowledge hundreds of years ago for the sole object of all study in our nineteenth century! We shall find tallow-brained conservatists, and all the logger-headed apes of respectability, shuddering at all such heresy as this, as they hav in turn shuddered at freedom and equality, liberty of conscience and of speech, at Abolitionism and Infidelity. Never can we look for reform till the idol-breakers and truth seekers investigate the subject. I.

A World of Knownothings.

MY BELOVED BROTHERS AND SISTERS: P. T. Barnum says the world loves to be humbugged and are willing to pay for it. So it's not strange that one set of knownothings are willing to pay another set of knownothings to tell them all about the things of which they know nothing.

Every priest is a knownothing about the things in the next world; in fact, some of them don't know any too much about the things in this world. Now, I am willing to admit that I am a first-class knownothing, but I know as much about the next world as anyone, and that is just nothing at all. I hav never seen God, and my wife says that she has never seen the devil. And yet she is as well calculated to hav made his acquaintance as anyone. Amen.

Brother Jones will please pass the hat. M. BABCOCK.

Sing, Brothers, Sing.

Now is the time to prepare for making the annual Liberal meetings as interesting as possible. It will be a good plan for friends residing in those places where the meetings are to be held to get together all their acquaintances who can sing and send for several dozen "Liberal Hymn-Books," and practice on some of the most stirring and appropriate pieces until they are well learnt. These singers will then be able to lead the congregation. The tunes to which the hymns are set can be found in the "American Tune Book," and nearly every collection of music designed for church use. They are mostly tunes with which people hav been familiar for years; good tunes, too, which only need to hav the right kind of words set to them to be a joy forever. We advise our friends to try this plan. In paper covers the "Liberal Hymn-Book" costs but $1.75 a dozen. See advertisment.

The Opinion of One Who Knows Braden.

From the Falls City Journal.

This office has received a pamphlet entitled "Ingersoll Unmasked," by Clark Braden. Braden requests us to advertise himself and his pamphlet free, which is very characteristic of the dead beat. The Kearney Journal, Oakland Independent, Omaha Watchman, and a few other exchanges hav puffed this fraud, and we hope they will publish our version of Braden Unmasked. We personally know Clark Braden to be an unscrupulous liar. A number of years ago, in Pawnee city, Nebraska, he villainously slandered the memory of Joshua R. Giddings, the old antislavery hero, for which he was called to account then and there. Braden is a liar by nature and a charlatan by profession. He exhausted his resources for knavery in this state, and is no longer recognized by his own church in the East. No respectable publishing house would take Braden's pamphlet, and he was obliged to print it at his own expense, and in his own name.

Letters from Friends.

TRAPPE, WIS., June 28, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find a "V" for Mr. Bennett's Around-the-World Fund. Please send the books to

C. O. SELMER.

DISCORD, IOWA, June 26, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $5 to help bring our hero home. I am glad to learn he has safely landed on American soil. I wish you to send his books of travel. Hope I am not too late. This is the third "V" I hav sent or been instrumental in sending. We hav our first volume, and think that alone worth more than all the Bibles ever printed. We expect to get the other volumes when our turn comes. I think they will be the best legacy we can leave to ou children and grandchildren. MRS. M. ROGERS.

CHAMPLIN, MINN., June 25, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Again I take the pleasure of forwarding a "V" for the book of travels around the world. The money is from W. Brander, the book to be sent to Archibald Brander, P. E. Island. Now I must right here express my joy for the happy return of Mr. Bennett, and also my gratitude to him for giving us the best and most reliable book of travels yet written. May he be induced, after a good rest, to visit all the chief cities of the Union, to write the scenes on his long journey, and to shake hands with the million of his true friends. J. KINSER.

FALL RIVER, MASS., July 6, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $5 for the journey around the world. I hav been sick all the past winter, and forbidden to read much, but now that I am coming back to health again I want to read those letters of the brave voyager. I don't care whether my name is printed on the list or not. It is not written in the the "Lamb's book of life," and I hav no wish to hav it paraded in any other book unless it may be of benefit to some other. I am glad the traveler has arrived so far toward home, and I trust he may continue in this life many years yet to beat back the slavery of error and superstition.

Very truly yours, SUSAN H. WIXON.

PIPESTONE, MINN., July 1, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find postal order for five dollars and fifty cents, five dollars for "A Truth Seeker Around the World" for a friend of mine, Mr. J. R. Crowell, his name to appear in the books if not too late, and fifty cents for Mr. Bennett's lithograph. Send the above to the address of A. D. Ferris, Pipestone, Minnesota. It is so pleasing to hear that our old friend has landed safely on the shore of his nativ country once more, and now I should like to hav him travel over the United States and honor us with his presence, and lecture on his travels to help advance Freethought and sell his works. Will not his friends that hav subscribed for the books now pledge themselvs to giv another five for this enterprise? I, for one, will, and hope all will, for it will be a great pleasure to all to hav the honor of grasping the hand of one that has suffered martyrdom for the cause of Freethought. Hoping all will think favorably of the proposition and start him on the trip as soon as he is rested and able for the task, I remain, as ever, Yours, A. D. FERRIS.

ONEIDA, N. Y., GOD'S DAY, July 2, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed $3 for THE TRUTH SEEKER a year. I do not want to be deprived of it. I admire its independent character and the fearlessness with which it advocates the true principles of Freethought and reform. If it was as extensivly circulated as it ought to be, the church of God would be obliged to resort to still baser means to obtain money than they do at present. I hav just read an article on the first page of the Utica Saturday Globe that I consider a fair sample of the Christian church of to-day. Referring to the execution of Guiteau, it runs thus: "Many mess ges arrived at the jail this morning from different parties. A telegram from New York asks if the sender could obtain possession of Guiteau's body to exhibit for the benefit of the Young Men's Christian Association." I think the Young Men's Christian Association is getting pretty hard up. Respectfully, G. BEEBE.

WELLAND, ONT., CANADA, May 26, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I hav thought it right for me at this time to leave behind me a short sketch or outline of my life, as it may be of interest in years to come to my children, grandchildren, and great-grandchildren to know something of my history. I shall only giv an outline, and more particularly as it relates to my religious experience than anything else.

I was born at Huby, a country village in Yorkshire, England, in the year A D. 1806, on the 15th of February, of Christian parents, Thomas and Hannah Ray. I was trained or instructed in the religious creed of the church of England. My mother, as I believe, was a good and Christian woman, and took great care to hav us (six children) instructed in the principles of the Christian religion. In this respect my father was less particular. I remained at or about home until I was eighteen years of age. I had now become very sensible to religious impressions, but not without my doubts as to the correctness of some of the doctrins of the church. Jewish wars, wonderful miracles, and many curious things which I read in the scriptures I found it difficult to reconcile with the attributes of a good and just God and with what little I then knew of the laws of nature. And here I must confess I was in trouble often, not being able fully to believe nor dare not disbelieve what an affectionate and loving mother had taught me. Sometimes I shed tears; sometimes I would pray that God would enable me to come to a right conclusion.

At this time, when eighteen years of age, I took a situation at the Friend's Retreat, York, England, an institution for the insane, and belonging to and under the management of the Society of Friends. The treatment I met with during the twenty years I was there employed in various capacities gave me a liking for this people, and for about twenty years I was in the practice of attending their meetings for worship. In 1847, when about forty years of age, I removed to this country with my wife and five children, and purchased a farm of one hundred acres in the township of Pelham, where there was a Friends meeting-house and rather a large settlement of Friends, with whom I continued to meet for a few years, when some of my friends, as well as myself, thought I might be more useful if in membership in helping bear the burdens of society, when I applied for membership, and was received as a member, and continued so for over thirty years, and took my part in the management of the affairs of the society.

Some years ago some of our young Friends, and some of the older ones, also, began to think that old orthodox Quakers were lacking in religious zeal and life, and had become altogether too slow and did not keep up their end with the other Christian sects, and in order to do so began to let on a little more religious steam, and began to adopt the practices and forms of other religious societies; and instead of waiting for the moving of the holy spirit, as Friends had always professed to do, they had spirits of their own always ready; in fact, they had got the road to their heaven a short and sure way—only to believe in the atonement and your salvation was sure, etc.

One thing, perhaps more than anything else, set me to thinking, when I heard it preached, how very thankful we ought to be to our loving heavenly father for that blessed gift to us—the holy scriptures. I confess I came to the conclusion that I did not envy any one that could feel so thankful for a book that to me me was so unintelligible, so full of inconsistencies and contradictions. The discordant views held by the slow and fast friends led me to much controversy, hard feeling, and appealing to the law (I am now speaking of friends in Norwich, of which meeting I was then a member), in which some Christian charity was manifested, but of all the charities I know anything of, Christian charity is the least desirable. About this time my faith in the creed of the church had became so much relaxed that I could not longer be making a profession of faith that was not in accordance with my own honest convictions of the truth, and although I still continued to love and esteem my old friends, I felt compelled, in order to be true to my own convictions of right, to resign my right of membership in the Society of Friends without giving a reason why I did so; and now as more than two years has passed since that time, I feel well satisfied with having done so. I now belong to the one-man church. My creed is to seek for the truth, to believe all that my senses tell me is believable, to do injury to no one, to be just in all my dealings, to do what good lies in my power to the whole human race. In looking back over my past life I cannot charge myself with being a wicked man. I may hav done some things and left others undone that might hav been better otherwise, but circumstances hav much to do with our actions in this life, and the probability is that the same circumstances would produce the same results again. Then, by birth and circumstances, I am to-day just what I am. I did not make myself, nor did I make the circumstances; then how could I be different, and I think myself rather fortunate in being what I am. I think I hav a pretty correct sense of what is really right, and I feel in conscience bound to do what I know to be right, and to do no wrong to any living man or thing if I know it. And this being the case with me, I hope to carry out these views to the end; and if there is a hereafter, which I do not know—there may or may not be—but I cannot see any justice in being punished in another life for doing the best you can in this. JOHN RAY.

TOLEDO, O., July 1, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Some time since one N. M. Howard, a deacon in the First Congregational church of this city, and also recently a member of our state legislature from this county, also a broker and commission merchant, commenced an action in our court of Common Pleas against a weekly newspaper known as the Toledo Democrat, charging said paper with libel, and claims $25,000 for repairs to his alleged damaged character. The paper charged the same Howard with very naughty conduct in connection with the front soprana singer of the choir in the said church at sundry times and places, during a period of about three years last past. For about two weeks and at the present time, the trial of the said action has been progressing in our Common Pleas court, and during the said trial much of the bad has been brought out in the testimony of the numerous witnesses who hav testified in the case, but much credit must be given to the trustees of the said church for their manly, outspoken condemnation of the course of this man Howard in their testimony in the case, and in their manifest disposition to do him ample justice and not kalsomine the "sable robe" their deacon has donned while an official in their ranks, and his own family hav not furnished him a downy bed upon which to rest his weary self. And, among other testimony, it was shown by the clerk of the great hotel at the Methodist Lakeside camp-meeting ground near Sandusky City, in 1880, that during the meetings on the said grounds this "deacon" called upon the said clerk for a key to open a door connecting his, the said deacon's room, with the said singer's room in the said hotel, and that the said door was unlocked as requested by the said deacon. The said singer's name is A——, and has a husband from whom she is divorced, now living in Fostoria, in this state, and who is reported to be a very fine gentleman.

The "Lakeside Methodist Fellows" received a big advertisment in the above matter, and up to the present writing they are not reported as having settled for the said "ad," furnished by their then hotel clerk in the rendition of his testimony in the case. Too much praise cannot be given to the most of the members of the Congregational church here in their efforts of so manly and moral character, in trying to suppress vice wherever they find it, and especially in assisting this man Howard, their deacon, who was a chief officer in the "Society for the Suppression of Vice" in this city, which was established here a few years since by that noted vice propagator, Anthony Comstock. Yours, waiting for the verdict,

M. O. WAGGONER.

MUSCATINE, IOWA, July 3, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I read the damnable Inter-Ocean lie, and hope you will proceed against the scoundrels for libel. I believe that every Liberal in the land will indorse the same. What will not the followers of the cross be guilty of to traduce the characters of honest opponents? If you don't want to waste time in law, take a trip West and cowhide the villain.

Yours truly, H. M. KENNEDY.

CHENEY, W. T., May 21, 1882.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: It is a treat to read the refreshing, common-sense, and instructiv pages of THE TRUTH SEEKER each week, we hav such a surfeit of Christian orthodoxy in all our daily walks. The Ladies' Christian Temperance Union trotted out their big gun, David Willis, D.D., U.S.A. This receiver of public money for empty prayers gave a lecture on "The Perfect Woman." He gave us King Solomon's (that old libertin) view in the Bible, which, he said, had never been surpassed. His idea of a perfect woman was, of course, the stereotyped Christian one of a perfect cook, housekeeper, ornamenter of home, supporter of the clergy, temperance worker, etc; thought her position equal, but different, to man's; her voice not intended to thrill the Senate, but influence for private good, etc. All this edifying stuff written down like any school-composition by this learned D.D. But women will continue progressing, and will soon obtain the ballot in spite of all the doctors of divinity in the country.

These C. T. U. ladies are mostly strong Suffragists. How they reconcile it with the Bible is one of the mysteries of godliness. It was laughable to see them hav to take their own medicin. When will women cease to pander to and support these falsifiers and misrepresenters and study and think for themselvs?

"Dr." Willis is a pompous wind-bag—good delivery, but no reasoning faculty. The Christians, however, seemed much elated over him, and collected filthy lucre for him. A criticism of his two lectures was refused by our local paper here, which is, however, rather Liberally inclined. Please send me the "Age of Reason" as an antidote. ANNIE EVEREST.

ELKLAND, PA., July 2, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: We are pleased with the animus of W. S. Bell's article, "Ho for Watkins!" in last TRUTH SEEKER. May each and every Liberal in the states and Canadas re-echo the sentiment and respond to his and H. L. Green's call for aid and concerted action, that the approaching convention, to be held at Watkins, may be a success and organization go on increasing! The church justly taunts us as being parsimonious, penurious, disintegrating in tendency. Only the other day a divine said to me, "So long as your people do not organize we hav nothing to fear, and your parsimony shows your want of earnestness, enthusiasm, and zeal in your cause." Allow me to say this same divine is closely watching the lead of the Freethought movement. By our coming together at Watkins, as well as keeping speakers in the field, let us show we are in earnest, advancing, and becoming a power.

A word as to the reception and dinner to be tendered D. M. Bennett during time of convention. Allow us to be one of the thousands who second the motion. The proposition is just what we had been looking for, knowing that Mr. H. L. Green is not the man to let so auspicious an occasion pass unimproved. Let us do honor to our hero in doing justice to ourselvs and the cause. I beg to offer the first toast of the occasion: D. M. Bennett, hero, martyr, world-renowned truth-seeker, consecrated to truth and its dissemination; the advocate of right, the scorner and defier of wrong, the crucified of yesterday, the crowned to-day! Honored, beloved chieftain, hail thee welcome to our home and hearts!

A lone picket on the rampart.

GRACE L. PARKHURST.

EAST DUBUQUE, ILL., June 22, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $5—$3 for THE TRUTH SEEKER, $1 for Mr. J. Hacker's benefit, and $1 for Mr. Sinnett's book. I will add that I feel greatly obliged to Mr. Bennett for the information given of all he was able to reach in connection with these mysterious phenomena or subtle forces of nature being investigated by Col. Olcott, Madam Blavatsky, and the astral Brothers. I was surprised at seeing rather severe and unkind criticism on Mr. Bennett's communication in connection with this subject in Mr. Chainey's This World of April 15th. I was pained that our esteemed and gifted friend should hav erred so gravely, should hav departed so widely from the principles that he so ably defends. I fear that when leaving the late dark prison house of superstition he may hav carried with him some of his old intolerance not adapted to the sweet and bright atmosphere of perfect liberty and equal rights. He may hav taken this method of freeing himself of it, though an improper one in my opinion. We consider it a broad assumption for any man to say what forces are not in nature or set limits to her possibilities. I hav had an experience with phenomena of a nature parallel with some of the incidents related by Mr. Bennett, and could our critic hav shared with me, he would never hav characterized the communication as "rubbish." My kind regards to Mrs. Bennett.

Very respectfully yours, D. R. BURT.

ROCKY COMFORT, ARK., June 20, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: As I hav never told you anything of this country, I propose a few remarks. We are situated within about four miles of the Indian line on the west, within six miles of Red River on the south, twelve miles from Little River on the east. Last year the crops were nearly a failure, a thing very uncommon in this country. All our bread and meat had to come from St. Louis. Money is very scarce. We hav the finest prospects for crops of all kinds that ever were known in this country at this time of the year. Corn is now safe; wheat and oats are cut and being thrashed. We can't send you much money till cotton is gathered and put in the market, which will be about November. I inclose $1 to be applied as directed. Yours, E. M. JENNINGS, M. D.

ALLIANCE, O., June 22, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I am glad the veteran truth seeker landed safe in our own country. We hav been delighted with his report while away. Am glad he has been investigating occult philosophy; there are wonders in that line in our own country which I hope he will find time to investigate and report. Even though Brother Chainey thinks it poor diet for Freethinkers, you know the scriptures say "the carnal mind cannot disern the things of the spirit," and some reformers are afraid of others reporting things in advance of their own knowledge; they are running into error. But I think we should be broad enough in our Liberalism to not fear investigation in any direction; for only through the broadest liberty of thought, and freedom to scale all hights and fathom all depths, and push our research in all directions, can we hope to arrive at truth, and continue to progress infinitly. There is no limit to the possibilities of the human soul, and the sooner we realize that bonds and checks only hinder, but cannot prevent its ultimate development into truth and the sublime Spiritual unfoldment of our natures, the better. I think we can trust the honest seeker after truth in his investigations without trying to limit his sphere, or saying, thus far and no farther shalt thou go, especially if we hav discarded the dogmatic "Thus saith the Lord." With an honest God speed to the workers in every field of reform,

I am, fraternally, MRS. C. ROCKWELL.

WHITE ROCK, NEV., June 15, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $6, to be applied as follows: $3 for Charles Brown's subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER for 1882, and $3 to apply on George Gottman's account.

That beautiful notice which the San Francisco Chronicle gave you will reap its just reward. Four of its regular subscribers of this place concluded after reading that article that they had no further use for it, and one that had requested me to send for it remanded the order. I think every Liberal who has been taking it should notify the publishers that they hav no use for such a paper, and tell them the reason why. By touching them where it hurts they may possibly some time make up their minds that Freethinkers and Liberals are half-way decent, and hav rights that should be respected as well as Christians.

The Liberals of White Rock send a hearty welcome home to D. M. Bennett. They all would hav gone to San Francisco to giv his good, honest old hand a squeeze could they possibly hav done so. The most of us here are cowboys, and as the cattle are scattered over hundreds of miles of wild country, we hav to be in the saddle most of the time to keep track of them. With my kind regards,

Yours truly, V. G. BORRETTE.

PORTSMOUTH, ENGLAND, June 10, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I hav to acknowledge the receipt of the book entitled "The Godly Women of the Bible," and the first volume of Mr. Bennett's travels around the world. I hav to thank you for first complying with my request to become a subscriber and for punctually posting the books to me. I must also tender you my thanks for THE TRUTH SEEKER forwarded weekly. I expect by the time this reaches New York Mr. Bennett himself will be at home. I am anxious to hear of his safe return to New York. Also glad he is not left in that sacred ditch, the Jordan. I fancy of the two I would rather be left in the sacred river of the Hindoo—the Ganges of India.

Please inform Mrs. Bennett that Mrs. Brumage has sent by this post an antimoccasin (made by her niece), for her use as a token of remembrance of Mr. Bennett's visit to our domicil at Portsmouth. I may say that we are both pleased with Mr. Bennett's writings. On alternate Sunday evenings I read a portion of his travels to our Freethought friends, who are also well pleased. I am now about the land of Yahweh.

On Sunday, May 7th, Mr. G. Foote, of London, editor of the Freethinker, delivered two lectures in this town, one on Mr. Bradlaugh and his constituents, and "The Great Christ is Dead." The southern part of England is not so much alive to Freethought as the midland districts, but are fast waking up to think for themselvs. As a proof, the clergy and lay churchmen throw out hints to their flocks that they must avoid attending Freethought meeting, and reading such works as the "Mistakes of Moses," etc. All of Col. Ingersoll's late works hav been much read in this country. I am anxious to read his last oration.

I received a note from Mr. Bradlaugh this day, informing me that he will lecture three times on Sunday, July 9th. The south of England wants a little stirring up on Freethought matters. This is the spot that sends the Woolf to Parliament, one of his open enemies.

Mrs. Brumage joins me in kind regards to Mr. and Mrs. Bennett, and to the editor during Mr. Bennett's absence. We are well; I hope each of you are the same. Yours sincerely, J. E. BRUMAGE.

SOMERSET, KY., June 30, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: No doubt some of your readers would like a word on Kentucky's great gospel tramp, prevaricator, and damphool. known as Geo. O. Barnes, the evangelist, who has been on an extensiv tramp in this state, raking in the loose change of the demented creatures that swallow his brimstone soup. This tramp, like his mythical predecessor of Galilee, teaches doctrins strangely at variance to the universal experience of mankind. But being a god-inspired man, a kind of Jesus Christ, junior, nothing better could be expected from him. His sermons are noted chiefly for their slang and lack of logic and common sense, admirably suited to the mental caliber of the majority of his converts. He claims to be able to preach daily for five years without becoming hoarse, which he parades wherever he goes as a proof of his divine mission.

He givs his hearers to understand that all the world are wrong in their belief but him. "I alone know the way to heaven." "All preachers are working for the devil." "Bah! Ingersoll has a better chance for heaven than any preacher." "Black and Talmage tried to answer Ingersoll, but failed. His arguments are unanswerable."

But what is Barnesism? It is a belief that Barnes is inspired by God, that the Bible is the word of God, that prayer and anointing will heal the sick, that all disease is the direct work of the devil, that a true believer cannot get sick, be hurt by any power on earth; that none but sinners hav trouble of any kind, that the world is to be destroyed in five years, that Barnes has been baptized in a manner that he would not explain "to save the life of one so dear as my wife," that Marie's organ is tuned by by prayer and faith, that said organ has been tuned in said way for five years, that on journeys the "Lord" sent rain all round Barnes and not a drop fell on him, that the devil sends rain to keep the people from coming to hear him preach, that the Lord makes the wheat grow, and the devil makes it take the rust; that hundreds of consumptivs with lungs "clean gone" hav been healed through the instrumentality of Barnes, that no difference what you do you will be saved if you "confess Jesus," that scores of incurables were cured at "Pink Cottage," although it is known that the "faith fuse" is now an exploded humbug; that Barnes does not receive money for his services, and yet his daughter Marie has got enough to make him think of taking a trip around the world; that the devil made Barnes sick at Somerset, and his wife had to anoint him to exorcise the devil; that the bottle of oil Barnes always carries in his pocket to cure the sick with has curativ effects above that of other oil of the same kind; that the "Bible is every word true," yet there are many passages in it that are the "devil's lies;" that all church-members that do not "confess" to him will be damned, yet he advises his converts to join the churches; that all believers should take no thought for the morrow, but trust the good Lord to provide all things needful; that to scream "praise the Lord" at the top of the voice will drive the devil out of the room.

Such is Barnesism, the popular religion of the day. But we are glad to know this absurd, fanatical, and laughable form of superstition is opening the eyes of many hitherto strictly orthodox, but now on the broad road to liberty and light. Of these the young men form the majority, and it is a common thing to hear opinions promulgated that are inimical to the creeds of Christendom. All we need is a good Liberal educator like THE TRUTH SEEKER to finish the work begun. A good lecturer would find a field here that would pay. Yours fraternaily, J. C. OWEN.

NORSE, TEXAS, June 27, 282.

MR. EDITOR: As I hav seen nothing in your columns from this section of country, I hav thought perhaps a dot or two might be acceptable. I took passage on board THE TRUTH SEEKER craft on the first day of January last, and I am happy to say that I hav found to my satisfaction every particle of her timbers sound to the core. You will therefore see that I entertain no fears of being stranded or shipwrecked. Indeed, I think all who will come on board THE TRUTH SEEKER craft and sail out into the broad ocean of reason with Truth as their headlight, need hav no fear whatever. True, we may run against what by some would be called knots in theology, but that is the kind of game we are hunting for, and when we touch one of them they are nothing more than a pile of sand, as it were, before a battering-ram. I was considerably amused in reading your columns of June 17th, under the head of Book Notice, "Ingersoll's Interview on Talmage," etc. Well, it is amusing as well as instructing to read after Col. Ingersoll; and when he handles the subject of theology, I would not lay him down to pick up anybody else. I was a little surprised, however, at one of the colonel's expressions in your columns above alluded to. The colonel says that he "has no more confidence in fiat worlds than he has in fiat money." I feel quite sure that the colonel never uses language without comprehending its meaning, consequently did not use the above language unintentionally. Now, if Col. Ingersoll has any kind of money that is not fiat money, I would be glad to get a small piece of it for a keepsake; fact is, I will giv five dollars of fiat money for one dollar of money that is not fiat. Of course there is no fiat money out of nothing, but there is fiat money out of something; and before the fiat goes forth upon the material there is no money value in it. Fiat (decree, order) is what converts any material into money and says how much of said material shall constitute so much money. When I read the colonel's language as I hav quoted it, I thought of the anecdote I once heard of a preacher, which is as follows: "The preacher was preaching to his congregation, with all the power and vehemence he possessed, warning them of the awful dangers of the 'bottomless pit;' when warming himself up to the highest frenzy, he raised his hand aloft, and shouted in thunder tones: 'If you don't all repent of your sins and come to Jesus, you will all go to hell just as sure as I catch that fly (whack comes his fist). Damned if I didn't miss it.'" Now, I agree with the colonel as regards fiat worlds, but when it comes to fiat money, I think its like the preacher's fly—he missed it. I will close for this time; perhaps will write you again soon, and giv you a description of religion and Freethought in this section. You can count on me as a passenger on THE TRUTH SEEKER craft until death parts us; indeed, I will hav to fall very low financially if I ever do without the noble TRUTH SEEKER.

Yours in the cause of truth, W. T. M.

MONTROSE, IOWA, July 3, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I am but one among tens of thousands who rejoice at your safe return to your nativ land, friends, and home. Your enemies are few but vindictiv and bitter, an inherent disposition of Christianity. But long life to you, the champion of Freethought.

Guiteau has passed over the river. On the other shore the first one he met was an old friend of the same faith. The salutation was as follows: "Good morning, Brother Calvin, happy to meet you." "The same to you, Brother Guiteau. It seems you were hurried over the river simply for putting into execution the command of God. Not so with me, for our faith was in power when I burned at the stake my victim. Now take some rest, Brother Guiteau, and in due time I will introduce you to many of our Christian friends who hav obeyed the commands of God in the same way. Good-bye." Friend Bennett, we are not prepared to meet God, for we hav not murdered our fellow-man. A. CRANDALL.

BOSTON, MASS., July 1, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Though a little obscure—unknown—still I claim to be a star in the firmament of Freethinkers. And I just wish to indorse a suggestion made by E. Myrick, that our noble patriot advocate of Freethought giv R. B. Hayes an opportunity for an exchange of mutual magnanimity on his way east. Such opportunities for the display of real greatness are too rare to be lost. Wouldn't Mrs. Hayes giv a dinner? Who knows? GEORGE SHARPLEY.

The Editor's Wager.

The editor sat in his chair alone,
A busier person there never was known:
When in came a farmer, a jolly old soul,
Whose name for long years had been borne on the roll
Of paying subscribers. He had come into town
To bring his good wife and some farm produce down,
And, having a moment or two he could spare,
Had run in as usual to bring in a share
Of his own inward sunshine to lighten the gloom
Of the man of the press and his dull, cheerless room.
The editor's smile, as he lifted his eyes
And saw who was there, was of joyful surprise;
And he greeted his friend with a deal of glad zest,
For a good chat with him was like taking a rest.

When at length the old farmer got ready to leave,
He said, with a sly little laugh in his sleeve:
"My dear friend, there is only one thing I just want to say.
Now please don't get vexed, for you know it's my way;
But what makes you put in each paper you print
So much that is worthless—do you take the hint?
Well, petty misfortunes, and little misdeeds,
And lots of small matter that nobody reads."
The editor looked at him square in the face,
At first with a frown, then a smile took its place.

"My dear friend," he replied. "I'm surprised you don't know
Every line in the paper is read; but it's so;
And now, if you wish, I will make my words good
And prove what I say, as every man should.
I'll put in the very next paper a line
Or two about you, in coarse print or fine,
Whichever you choose, and just where you may say,
And if you don't find on the very next day
That your neighbors all read it, I promise to giv
Free subscriptions to you as long as you liv."

"Agreed," said the farmer; "you shall sing a new song;
Put it right in the middle of one of those long
Fine-type advertisments—I never yet knew
Any person of sense to read one of them through,
If I hear from it twice I will bring down to you
The best load of garden sauce I ever grew."

Then the "good days" were passed, and the farmer went out,
And the editor laughed to himself, without doubt,
As he thought of his wager, and how it would end,
And the nice little joke he would hav on his friend;
Then he wrote just two lines, and he ordered them set
In the smallest of type, thinking, "I'll win that bet."
And he placed them himself, to be sure and not fail,
In the midst of a close agate real estate sale;
For to better succeed in his little designs,
He'd selected the place where to put these lines,
And hav them connected with what followed and make
A sentence complete in itself, without break.
These the lines that he wrote, "Our old friend, good James True,
Who is one of the best men the world ever knew,
Of the well-known Hope farm"—that was all that he said
About James, but the line next below these two read,
"Will be sold very cheap"—then went on to unfold
The beauties and bounds of the land to be sold.

The paper was printed. The next day but one
The farmer came in with his eyes full of fun;
"You hav won," he began, "just as sure as you're born;
Why, before I got breakfast ate yesterday morn,
Two or three neighbors called on purpose to see
What that meant in the paper they saw about me.
(I hadn't seen it yet.) Then, during the day,
Every neighbor that met me had something to say
About my being sold. I was sold very cheap,
And you did it well, too—it was too good to keep.
So I'v told the whole story, and come with all speed
To bring you the garden sauce, as I agreed."

The editor looked from his window and saw
His friend had brought in all his horses could draw—
All for him; he declined to accept it, but found
That his friend would not listen, and was off with a bound,
Saying, cheerily, as he went out, "In your next
Just say Jim True's preaching, and this is his text,
There's naught in the paper—fruit, flowers, or weeds—
Nor a line in the paper that nobody reads."

Some Well-Deserved Compliments.

From the Ogden Daily Herald.

After 8 o'clock, Monday evening, Union Opera House was well filled with an audience eager to hear the reputed Liberalist and editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, Mr. D. M. Bennett, who is on his return from an eleven months' trip around the world.

The chairman introduced the gentleman who was the recipient of the ovation with fitting remarks.

The secretary of the Liberal League then read the address of reception to the guest, expressing the solicitude of the fellow-thinkers in his welfare during his journey around the world, and maintaining the equal rights of all men in matters of belief in the land which ought to be the land of the free.

Mr. D. M. Bennett then stepped to the front, expressing his warm thanks for the cordial reception accorded him. He referred to the kindness of his friends in enabling him to make the circle of the world, a friendship he could never forget. He then alluded to the fact of his having been sent to prison, some years ago, and traced the course of his Freethought journal, THE TRUTH SEEKER, from small beginnings in a town in Illinois to its present flourishing condition in New York. In plain words, he sketched the course of his persecution instigated in the Y. M. C. A. in New York, and mainly carried out by Anthony Comstock.

In 1880 he was sent over to Brussels, Belgium, and he extended his tour over various countries of Europe. This was finally extended into a journey all over the world, on which the speaker started on the 30th of July, 1881. As a result of this tour Mr. Bennett has written five volumes of travels, two of which are published, and the others will shortly be issued.

The speaker also gave a few rapid sketches of his traveling impressions, as in Egypt, Chaldea, India, and then branched over into a glance at the development of the civilization of mankind, drawing comparisons between various systems of religions, especially dwelling on the creeds of Buddha. He also asserted that the status of morality in Europe, to his observation, was by no means superior to that of the pagan countries of Asia.

Further on the speaker paid a glowing tribute to the great political power of England, extending all over the face of the earth, but he could not help contrasting the immorality of the "Christian" civilization with the good behavior of the Asiatic pagans. Mr. Bennett also spoke on the uselessness and even danger of missions to "convert the heathen," and expressed his belief that there is little probability in the pagan nations being brought over to "Christianity."

In conclusion the speaker combated the error of supernaturalism, the misconception of a creator having made nature out of nothing, and the folly of man making gods in his own image.

In conclusion, after paying the "Mormon" church the compliment of having a united and therefore strong organization, Mr. Bennett exhorted the Liberals to organize in union and harmony.

From Pomeroy's Great West.

D. M. Bennett, editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, published in New York city, and the champion of personal freedom, arrived in Denver Wednesday last, on his way home from his trip around the world. Mr. Bennett will, when he reaches New York, hav been on his way twelve months. During his trip he has been writing a series of articles for his paper, descriptiv of his travels, and they hav formed one of the most attractiv features of the paper. Mr. Bennett is a close observer, and his manner of describing what he saw cannot be excelled by any living writer. He has circumnavigated the globe, and the sights he has seen are narrated in his book, entitled "A Truth Seeker Around the World," in the most charming manner. His description of Egypt and the Holy Land is perfect, and now, since the recent revolt in Egypt, will prove of unusual interest. This book will comprise five volumes, containing 4,500 pages—an incredible amount of matter, gathered in so short a space of time—and it can be truthfully said that it exceeds anything ever attempted by any traveler in a flying trip of 25,000 miles. Mr. Bennett will spend a couple of weeks in Colorado, visiting the many places of interest, and will incorporate in his book a description of this wonderful state. To our brethern of the press all over the state we ask that Mr. Bennett be given every opportunity to see the mines and industries of the state, as a description by such a noted writer will do the state more good than the many garbled reports given by irresponsible correspondents.

While in India Mr. Bennett met that religious montebank Joseph Cook, whom the nativs ran out of the country, and on the platform, amid his heathen audience, routed this notorious Bible banger, and crammed down his throat, so to speak, the stories he was trying to induce the nativs to believe. Mr. Bennett's lectures in Ceylon were so well thought of that they were printed in the Singalese language and scattered broadcast over the country.

On his return from the interior of the state it would be a good idea for people who are interested in foreign travel to get Mr. Bennett to giv a lecture and tell us what he has seen.

The first volume of Mr. Bennett's book is out, and describes Scotland, Ireland, England, including, also, an account of the Freethinkers' International Congress at London, in 1881, the Netherlands, Germany, Austria, Greece, Turkey, Smyrna, Ephesus, Rhodes, Cyprus, Beyrout, Baalbec, to Damascus. The second is in print, the third is in the hands of the compositors, and the fourth and fifth will be ready in about three months. Each volume is illustrated with forty illustrations, making it the finest work of the kind ever published.

Address D. M. Bennett, 141 Eighth street, New York city.

From Man.

If a man has courage, goodness, truth, and humanity in him, just let his enemies try to crush him out and see how gloriously his worth will spring into light as his defender and savior. The attempt to crush out the great TRUTH SEEKER has had just this result. Thousands who rejoice in the triumph of truth and human nature over hypocritical bigotry greet his return to the golden gates of California after his world pilgrimage with an enthusiasm that, we confess, surprises us.

But why should they not? Who has suffered more or worked harder for the enlightenment of our people than he? That he has faults, who has confessed more frankly or atoned for them more patiently and nobly? A man is to be measured by the average of his whole life and its results. When this measure is applied to Mr. Bennett he rises so far above his defamers that their clamors cannot be heard. His pilgrimage has now certainly been long enough to leave all his sins behind him, and we welcome him to our shores with the heartiest congratulations upon the success of his voyage. Let his record of it, called "A Truth Seeker Around the World." be sent for at THE TRUTH SEEKER office, 141 Eighth street, New York. And let those who gather at these ovations remember that to render them permanent a League should be organized on the spot. Send to the office of Man, 744 Broadway, New York, to hav a charter forwarded at once.

From the Ogden Daily Pilot.

D. M. Bennett, the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, came in from California on this morning's train from the west, and goes to Salt Lake City. Mr. Bennett is the prophet of advanced Liberalism in religious matters, and proposes to lecture in Zion. He is on his return from a trip around the world, in the course of which he has made a thorough study of the customs, manners, religions, and superstitions of the different countries and peoples he has visited, and proposes to giv his views on the subjects of his researches. The work will take up five volumes of nine hundred pages each, with plates and illustrations, and will present an exhaustiv review of the way things look from Mr. Bennett's standpoint. It is hoped that the gentleman can be induced to stop over in Ogden on Sunday evening and giv the people a chance to hear of what he has seen during his long journey of eleven months, and of the inferences he has drawn from his views of peoples and things.

From the Ogden (Utah) Daily Herald.

D. M. Bennett, editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, came in from the west by the express train this morning. The old gentleman looks tolerably well and feels happy on his return from his trip around the world. He is an indefatigable worker, not much of a speaker, but a very fluent writer. During his journey of eleven months' duration he has written five volumes on his own peculiar and others' views on man as to his present and future condition. Two of the books are published and the other ones are ready for the press.

Mr. Bennett went to Salt Lake City to-day; on his return he will remain over and lecture in Ogden on Saturday or Sunday night.

From the Salt Lake City Herald.

This noted man [D. M. Bennett], editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, who has been placed behind the prison bars by the notorious Comstock, and whose name is as well known in a certain circle of thinkers as that of Robert G. Ingersoll, came in from the west yesterday on his return from a tour around the world. During his journey of eleven months he has written five volumes on his own peculiar views of man and things, which will be published in due time. The gentleman looks venerable and feels well. It is expected that he will lecture in the Liberal Institute before he leaves Utah, that building having been tendered him free of all expenses for that purpose.

From the Ogden Daily Herald.

As previously announced, Mr. D M. Bennett, the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, will lecture at 8 o'clock to-night in Union Opera House. Although not possessed of oratorical gifts like Ingersoll, Bradlaugh, Beecher, or others, he is a fluent speaker, and having a thorough command and prompt control of a vast store of miscellaneous and interesting knowledge, he is sure to satisfy his audience Having just returned from an extended tour through Persia, India, China, and Japan, he will hav a good deal to say about the manners and customs of various races.

From the Central City Daily Register.

Mr. D. M. Bennett, the venerable editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, of New York, and who has a national, if not a world-wide, reputation in journalism, is a visitor to this section of the Rocky Mountains to-day. He is just returning from a twelve-month trip around the world, which his patrons and admirers gave him by subscription. His observations of his extended travels will be issued in book form in five volumes, which cannot but be interesting to the public, written from his standpoint. He is entertained while in Central by some of his admirers.

From the Judge.

D. M. Bennett has returned from his trip around the world. He has proved himself a hero and a noble man in spite of Comstock and his soap-boiler.

Western Michigan Camp-Meeting, at Ionia.

A Spiritual-Liberal camp meeting, to continue such number of days as may hereafter be announced, but to close on Sunday, August 6, 1882, will be held on the Fair Ground, at Ionia, under authority of the committee on district work, of the State Association of Spiritualists and Liberalists.

The meeting will be conducted similarly to the one which has just closed so successfully at Orion, and a district association will be organized. Friends at Ionia hav given assurance of their cordial support and encouragement.

Further announcement will be made in due time. S. B. MCCRACKEN, Manager.

A TRUTH SEEKER

Around the World.

Illustrated with forty cuts, and with a steel plate engrav ing of the author

BY D. M. BENNETT,

Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, author of "A Truth Seeker in Europe," "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," "Champions of the Church," etc., etc.

THREE VOLUMES FOR $5.00.

The Most Instruction for the Least Money of any Book of Travels yet Written.

In 1880 the Freethinkers of the world held an International Congress at Brussels, to which Mr. Bennett was sent as a delegate. He took the occasion to make the tour of Europe, and his observations were embodied in "A Truth Seeker in Europe" (price, $1.50). The letters were also published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and the readers were so well pleased with them that the proposition was made that he make the journey around the world, and giv the world the benefit of a Freethinker's observations. The proposition was accepted if the ones desiring such a work would advance five dollars each, the volumes to be dedicated to them. On July 30, 1881, Mr. Bennett began the journey, sending letters back to be published. The work will make

THREE VOLUMES OF NEARLY 900 PAGES EACH.

Those sending in five dollars before the completion of he work will hav their NAMES INSCRIBED IN THE DEDICATION OF THE VOLUMES.

The first volume describes Scotland, Ireland, England, including also an account of the Freethinkers' International Congress at London, in 1881, Holland, the Netherlands, Germany, Austria, Greece, Turkey. Smyrna, Ephesus, Rhodes, Cyprus, Beyrout, Baalbec to Damascus.

There hav been many books of travel printed but none like this. IT IS THE ONLY ONE OF ITS KIND.

Mr. Bennett has a shrewd habit of seeing everything going on, and in his book he has faithfully chronicled the habits and customs of the different people of many places he visited. The every-day life of [illegible] laid before the reader by one who has [illegible] them and beheld them with his own eyes. We feel sure this work is greatly superior to any account of a journey around the world we now hav.

ALL THE VOLUMES WILL BE ILLUSTRATED

Which adds greatly to the interest of the work, and with the close description will present Old-World places in a very familiar light.

The volumes separately will be $2. Those sending $5 now will get the first volume by return mail and the other two as soon as issued, which will be in a few months, or just as soon as they can be got ready. Those sending the $5 will hav their names in the dedication of the second volume.

Vol. I. mailed on receipt of $2.

DEITY ANALYZED

AND

THE DEVIL'S DEFENSE.

By Col. John R. Kelso, A.M.

Not since Hudibras has there been such damaging blows given to these old myths and fables. The colonel has made the sacredness of the scriptures appear as absurd as Cervantes made that of the knights of the age of chivalry. The singular audacity with which he attack. the foundations of Christianity shows the earnestness of his own convictions in regard to its fabulous origin.—L Hutchison.

A Short History of the Bible.

Being an Account of the Formation and Development of the Canon.

By BRONSON C. KEELER.

Price, cloth, 75 cents. Paper, 50 cents.

This book should be read by every clergyman, layman, scholar, and Liberal.

I hav read Mr. Keeler's book with great pleasure and profit. He givs, in my opinion, a clear and intelligent account of the growth of the Bible. He shows why books were received as inspired, and why they were rejected. He does not deal in opinions, but in facts; and for the correctness of his facts, he refers to the highest authorities. He has shown exactly who the Christian fathers were, and the weight that their evidence is entitled to. The first centuries of Christianity are filled with shadow; most histories of that period simply tell us what did not happen, and even the statements of what did not happen are contradictory The falsehoods do not agree. Mr. Keeler must hav spent a great deal of time in the examination of a vast number of volumes, and the amount of information contained in his book could not be collected in years. Every minister, every college professor, and every man who really wishes to know something about the origin and growth of the Bible should read this book.—R. G. Ingersoll.

ENTITLED

INGERSOLL ON TALMAGE,

BEING

Six Interviews with the Famous Orator on Six Sermons by the Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, of Brooklyn, to which is added

A TALMAGIAN CATECHISM.

Stenographically reported by I. NEWTON BAKER.

Printed in bold, clear type, on heavy, tinted paper, and handsomely bound in muslin, with heavy boards, beveled edges, gilt top, Octavo, 443 pages.

Price, $2.00. Paper Edition from same plates, $1.00.

Those who wish to hav Col. Ingersoll's latest lectures on 'Talmagian Theology," will find them here, in full, together with many other points necessarily excluded by the limits of a lecture. "The Talmagian Catechism" puts in the form of direct question, the plainest and profoundest inquiries of modern doubt, and answers them according to Talmage and orthodox Christianity. As a piece of satire, with earnest purpose, this production stands alone, and in the literature of Freethought has not its equal.

CONSULT!

VINELAND, N. J.

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES.

Spermatorrhea and Impotency,

as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excesses in maturer years, or other causes, and producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, &c., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an

which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition—had been in the Insane Asylums, many had Falling Sickness, Fits; others upon the verge of Consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

SYPHILIS positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system; GONORRHŒA, GLEET, Stricture, Orchitis, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

Middle-Aged and Old Men.

There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuation of the bladder, often accompanied by a slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen, will appear, or the color will be of a thin or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and torpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the organs.

☞ Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable and correspondence strictly confidential.

PRIVATE COUNSELOR.

Sent to any address securely sealed for two three-cent stamps, treating on Spermatorrhea or Seminal Weakness, giving its cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, followed by strong testimonials, headed by an affidavit as to their genuineness. Should be read by all. ☞ Remember no medicine is given. Address DR. R. P. FELLOWS, Vineland, New Jersey. Please state in what paper you saw this.

[From the House and Home of N. J.

Among the successful physicians who hav departed from the narrow beaten track of orthodoxy, we may rank Dr. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J. His principles are true, and system based upon scientific fact.'

[From the (Mo.) Liberal.

Gems of Thought.

AND yet, alas! the real ills of life
Claim the full vigor of a mind prepared,
Prepared for patient, long, laborious strife,
Its guide experience, and truth its guard.
We fare on earth as other men hav fared;
They were successful? Let not us despair.
Was disappointment oft their sole reward?
Yet shall their tale instruct, if it declare
How they hav borne the load ourselvs are doomed to bear? —Beattie.

I AM compelled to testify, and yet I do it willingly, that I hav known both men and women not daring, nor even desiring, to affirm another life, and yet convinced that life is well worth living; and this, too, after they had missed some dearest child or friend, and notwithstanding they were people of the largest heart, the rarest tenderness. And I thank heaven that I do not feel called upon to address myself to such people in the tone which is so frequently adopted by many earnest people at the present time, assuring them that they hav no right to feel that life here is worth living, unless they can hav a complete assurance of a blessed immortality. I do not care to frighten people, or to bully them into belief in either God or immortality.—J. W. Chadwick.

GOD gave you that gifted tongue of yours, and set it between your teeth, to make known your true meaning to us—not to be rattled like a muffin-man's bell.—Carlyle.

EVERY man's religion is, not what he professes, or what show he makes in external observances, but what influence it really has upon the man himself, in the habit of his mind, and in the course of his actions, in his family, in his business, in his dealings with all mankind, in his common conversation, and even in his very diversions themselvs, as well as in the more solemn acts of prayer and devotion.—Dr. Samuel Clarke.

IN Luther's "Table-Talk," a posthumous work of anecdotes and sayings, collected by his friends, the most interesting now of all the books proceeding from him, we hav many beautiful, unconscious displays of the man, and what sort of a nature he had. His behavior at the death-bed of his little daughter, so still, so great, and loving, is among the most affecting things. He is resigned that his little Magdalene should die, yet longs inexpressibly that she might liv, follows in awestruck thought the flight of her little soul through those unknown realms, awestruck; most heartfelt, we can see; sincere—for, after all dogmatic creeds and articles, he feels what nothing it is that we know, or can know; his little Magdalene shall be with God, as God wills; for Luther, too, that is all; Islam is all. —Carlyle. [NOTE.—Just so; when it comes of the last push, the mighty man is not mightier than his "even Christian;" and the philosopher not much wiser than Dr. Talmage, or any other church clown. As to Luther's "Table-Talk," it has been, within the last quarter of a century, republished by Bohn, of London, and, after reading it again and again, I bear willing testimony to its value. It may be recommended to those of strong digestiv stomachs, on the same principle that Coleridge avails himself of, in recommending the study of Jeremy Taylor's works: "Jeremy Taylor," writes Coleridge, "is an excellent author for a young man to study, for the purpose of imbibing noble principles, and at the same time of learning to exercise caution and thought in detecting his numerous errors." "Boswell's Johnson" is, perhaps, on the whole, the best book for such mental exercise. In Coleridge's own "Table-Talk," the blunders so far outnumber the hits that it is perilous to recommend it. "Art is long and time is fleeting."—C. W. C.]

IMAGIN that, instead of oppcsing an extortionate claim, we giv up our cloak also to the man who wishes to take our coat. Plainly, such conduct can hav but one result. We shall become the victims of extortionate claims, and our property will be squandered among the undeserving, instead of being kept for better uses. Or suppose that persecution, for the sake of our opinions, instead of being met with armed resistance, whenever that resistance is likely to be successful, is received only with blessings showered on the heads of the oppressors; without doubt, the hands of the persecuting party will be strengthened, and liberty, which is everywhere the rssult of resisting evil, will never be established. The freedom we ourselvs enjoy, both as a nation in respect to other nations, and as individuals, in respect to our domestic government, is the consequence of acting on a principle the direct reverse of that laid down by Jesus.—Amberley's Analysis of Religious Belief.

WE'RE the sons of sires that baffled
Crowned and mitred tyrrany;
They defied the field and scaffold,
For their birth-right—so will we.
—Campbell.

THE countries which are still swayed by the sultan and the Pope constitute dark spots on the map of the world, the regions where ignorance, cruelty, and despotism are the rule. When one remembers the millions on millions of men who hav been tortured and slain by sultans and popes, or by their minions, in accordance with the dictates of an arrogant theology, one cannot help gloating over "the almighty fix" in which these two seedy and dilapidated potentates find themselves to-day. It serves them right, for they are expiating, in some slight degree, the abominable cruelties of their predecessors of other days. One can hardly understand how enlightened mankind, in view of the hideous memories of the past, can tolerate the presence of a priest.—Free-Religious Index.

SCIENCE has made out the dependence of our mind and present consciousness and memory on the bodily conditions, so far as to justify the conclusion that the dissolution of the body carries with it the dissolution of our present consciousness and memory, which are reared on the bodily basis. At least, it raises apprehensions in the highest degree that this will be the case.—Graham's Creed of Science.

Odds and Ends.

A MISSOURI ROUNDELAY.

From the Papers of the late Jesse James, Esq.

I'm a bandit bold, with a lust for gold, and a heart that knows no fear;
I rob and slash, and plunder and gash throughout the joybus year.
My favorit food's gunpowder and blood, washed down with whisky neat;
And I'd rather kill than hav my fill of Delmonico dinners to eat.
Oh! giv me a man to stab,
Or a nice old woman to jab,
With my bonny bright steel,
Till she ceases to squeal,
And her gore dyes her red as a crab, crab—
And her gore dyes her red as a crab.

You should see my mien as I board a train, and my pops on the passengers pull.
The way I do it is quite too too; it, indeed, is just awfully aw-ful.
The ladies squeak, and the gents, so meek, pass out their wallets rich;
And I gather them in—the diamond pin, the watches, and rings, and sich.
Oh! trot out you boodle, quick,
Or my knife in your ribs I'll stick!
Or, in joyous frolic,
A cold lead colic
Stir up in your parts stomatick, tick—
Stir up your parts sto-ma-tick!

At home with the boys all my household joys are esthetic and chastely gay;
We hav prayers with meat, and there's always a seat when the parson comes our way;
For pa wore the cloth, and though I may be off, ma hasn't forgot her place,
And there's never a dollar that I may collar to which she don't say grace.
In fact, in Missouree
It's just such gents as me
As rule the roast,
And well may boast
They're the pride of our great countree, tree—
They're the pride of our great countree.

POSTSCRIPT.

(Communications through Madam de Limerick, seventh daughter of a seventy-seventh son, born with a caul. Ladies, 50 cents; gents, $1.)

By treachery's bolt, from an army Colt, I was kicked into paradise,
And now I frolic, on wings angelic, in the mansions of the skies,
I've a job on hand, and it looms up grand—just whisper it to them at home:
Jack Sheppard and me has it fixed, you see, to capture the golden throne.
—Alf. T. in the Judge.

THE CHARMS OF JUNE.

"Can I come in?" asked a young lady recently, as she opened the door of the editorial room.

"I suppose you can," replied the horse reporter, "unless you hav been suddenly stricken with paralysis, but you will hav to let go of that door knob first."

Encouraged by this kindly greeting, the young lady entered the room and seated herself.

"I want some advice," she said, "but I hardly know"—and here the young lady blushed violently and began regarding the floor with great attention.

"It's about getting married, isn't it?" asked the horse reporter.

"Yes, sir," replied the girl.

"I thought so. The hesitating, don't-know-whether-I-had-better-buy-ice-cream-or-caramels-with-my-money look on your countenance told me me that at once. What is the difficulty in your case?"

"Well," said she, "I'm engaged to a young man ——"

"I supposed it was a man," said the horse reporter. "Go ahead."

"And he says," she continued, "we ought to be married right away. Do you think June is a good month for weddings?"

"There is no doubt about June being the boss month to get married in," said the horse reporter. "In June everything looks pretty smooth. The first blossoms of the early summer—beautiful harbingers of the wealth of bud and bloom that is to come—are trembling on their stalks; the birds are singing as if in very glee from every branch and bough; the perfect light of the turquoise-tinted sky is reflected from an air that is as pure and balmy as the breath of a perfect houri from Circassia; while the newly-plowed fields, freshly kissed by the dews of heaven and warmed by the kindly rays of the sun, are holding within the bosom of the earth the many seeds that ere another month shall hav come and gone will spring up to life and light, growing stronger and more perfect with every gladsome day, until in autumn, when the leaves, touched by the blighting breath of the first frost, are transformed into all the vivid hues that tell so eloquently the story of nature's wondrous handiwork, and the very earth shall laugh in the golden glory of an abundant harvest. What time than this could be more fit for young hearts to plight a willing troth—hearts strong in a love that shall never know surcease or change, that shall be more steadfast and trusting with every hour, until when the autumn of life is reached the strong, wilful passion of youth becomes a ripened, tender holy affection that is beautiful beyond compare? It is when the tresses that were once brown are flecked with gray; when the cheeks once peachy and dimpled are marked by the furrows that grief and care hav made; when the eyes that in the days agone sparkled with such witching merriment are dull and lusterless; it is then that the love of a truly happy married life should be crowned with the halo of a tranquil existence that knows no sorrow or care. Yes, my bonny lass, you should get married in June, sweet June, month of roses and race meetings. Go to him who has won your young love, and say to him that the glad fruition of his hopes has come at last. Seek with him some ivy-crowned chapel, and there, amid the solemn hush that so well befits the occasion, let a mitred bishop make you one."

"Thanks," said the young lady. "Good day."

"So long," replied the horse reporter.

As the girl departed a man entered the room. "I am thinking of taking a fishing trip," he said, "and wanted to inquire in what month suckers bite the best."

"June," promptly replied the horse reporter.

The Investigator is devoted to the Liberal cause in religion; or in other words, to universal mental liberty. Independent in all its discussions, discarding superstitious theories of what never can be known, it devotes its columns to things of this world alone, and leaves the next, if there be one, to those who hav entered its unknown shores. Believing that it is the duty of mortals to work for the interests of this world, it confines itself to the things of this life entirely. It has arrived at the age of fifty-one years, and asks for a support from those who are fond of sound reasoning, good reading, reliable news, anecdotes, science, art, and a useful family journal. HISTORY

OF THE

CHRISTIAN RELICION

TO A. D. 200.

By CHARLES B. WAITE, A.M.

Verdict of European Scholars.

This work has received the indorsement of the Society of Critical Historical Theology of Zurich, Switzerland. The president of the society is Prof. Gustav Volkmar, one of the first biblical scholars of Germany, author of "Die Religion Jesu," "Jesus Nazarenus," "Ursprungs Unserer Evangelien" ["Sources of Our Gospels"], etc., etc. He is Professor of New Testament Criticism and Exegesis in the University, and teacher of General Religious History in the state college at Zurich.

Prof. Volkmar writes to the author of "The History of the Christian Religion," inclosing the official letter of the society, in which Pfarrer Kupferschmidt, the secretary, says:

"In the name of the Society of Critical Historical Theology, I hav the honor to inclose to you a few lines with the letter of our venerated Prof. Volkmar. With great interest did we receive information of your book, 'History of the Christian Religion to the Year Two Hundred.' One of our members, Herr Kappeler, has thoroughly examined the work, and has made to us a report concerning it, which became the subject of an animated discussion in the society. I leave it to Prof. Volkmar to enter into a criticism of your scientific work. It is for me to communicate to you that the whole society is rejoiced that that department of theology in which we are specially engaged has found in America so able a representativ. An unprejudiced and thorough presentation of the writings connected with the origin of our Christian religion, such as we hav found in your admirable book, places theology in accord with science; while, differently treated, it sometimes appears in contradiction to it."

The author has also received congratulatory letters from the author of "Supernatural Religion," in England, from two of the editors of "The Bible for Learners," in Holland, and others. One of these, Dr. I. Hooykaas, says, "With great and thankful surprise I received your letter with a copy of your valuable history."

One of the most favorable reviews of the history was made by the learned Norwegian, Bjornstjerne Bjornson.

Price, $2.25. Address, D. M. BENNETT, 141 Eighth st. New York.

THE

BIBLE—WHENCE AND WHAT?

BY

Richard B. Westbrook, D.D., LL.B.,

A theologian of high degree, and a counsellor learned in the law, on the origin and character of the Bible.

The author, though possessing all the prerogativs of a clergyman, repudiates the title "Rev." as a relic of Brahmanical caste and Roman sacerdotalism. He is entirely independent of ecclesiastical supervision and censure.

The questions, Where did the books of the Bible come from? What is their authority? and, What is the real source of dogmatic theology? are treated fearlessly in the light of history, philosophy, and comparativ religions. It is impossible to giv even a condensed statement of what is itself a marvelous condensation.

WHOLE LIBRARIES ARE HERE CONCENTRATED INTO ONE LITTLE BOOK.

The author's conclusions are, of course, against the supernatural origin and infallibility of the Bible, while the dogmas of the dominant theology are shown to be priestly perversions of the ancient mythologies.

The principles of natural religion are ably stated, and the claims of true morality are warmly advocated.

The strong commendations of the secular prass show that is just the book for these times of agitation and "revision."

Notes and Clippings.

THE Rev. William T. Ellis, of St. Louis, was fined $5 in a police court, but it was not for an offense which affected his standing as a clergyman. He had insisted on picking over a barrel of decayed potatoes in front of his house, to the discomfort of his neighbors.

SOME of the barbers of Philadelphia do not wish to work on Sundays, and hav therefore appointed a committee to enforce an old law against Sunday labor. The members get shaved in shops which they find open, and then become witnesses against the proprietors, who are fined $4 apiece.

THE Rev. J. E. Starr became matrimonially engaged to Miss Graham, of Brampton, Ont. She told him that a fellow Methodist clergyman, the Rev. R. N. Willoughby, had been a suitor two years before and had forcibly kissed her. Mr. Starr made this kiss the basis of a formal charge against Mr. Willoughby, and a conference trial is to be held.

THE members of the German Lutheran church of Columbus, Ohio, are involved in a quarrel, in which each side has got out an injunction restraining the other from entering the church, and the sheriff is in charge of the building. The trouble grew out of the objection of the pastor, the Rev. Mr. Herbst, to accept certain doctrinal forms on predestination, as passed by the last General Joint Synod of Ohio. Anticipating this trouble, Mr. Herbst purchased an old chapel, and preaches there to his following.

THE Chicago Christians hav asked Moody and Sanky, now in England, to return home.

"Moody, dear Moody, come home to us now,
Our converts are all on the run;
You promised, dear Moody, that you would come home
As soon as that Scotch job was done.
Our fire has gone out, our churches are cold,
The old women won't come to tea,
And some of the faithful are sick unto death,
While others go out on the spree.
Come home, come home, come home,
Please Moody, dear Moody, come home!"

IT is related of a Maryland deacon whose peaches are first in the New York market that having company at his farmhouse one evening recently, a terrific thunder-storm came on and shook things up worse than an explosion in a crockery store. Everybody was thoroughly frightened, and directly after a blinding flash one of the visitors anxiously asked, "Friends, don't you think we had better kneel and ask for protection?" "No, Brother Jones, no," protested the deacon. "I hav just had a lightning-rod put on the house at an expense of $36, and I propose we hold off and giv her a fair show to do business."—Detroit Free Press.

A NUMBER of Philadelphians who disagreed with all the established churches as to one or another dogma, formed a society under the name "Outcasts of Israel," and hired a hall for meetings. But at their first gathering it was demonstrated that they differed as radically with one another. Sister Miles announced that she was leading a consecrated, holy, sinless life. Brother Hartshorn said that such a thing was impossible with poor humanity. "You are not spiritual enough to comprehend it," said she; "you are too animal." "It seems to me," retorted he, "that the animal is interrupting me now." Then the discussion became an unseemly quarrel.

THE methodist ministers of Cincinnati hav declared for a prohibitory liquor clause in the Constitution of Ohio like that of Iowa. "We invite the people," they say, "of all political parties, and of all churches and no church, to unite with us at the proper time in petitioning the present legislature to pass a joint resolution submitting the proposed amendment to the decision of the voters of the state." Similar movements hav been put under way in Illinois and Indiana, and a total abstinence revival seems likely to extend over the West. The Constitutional amendment adopted by Iowa is taken as a model by the agitators. It is as follows: "No person shall manufacture for sale, sell, or keep for sale as a beverage any intoxicating liquors whatever, including ale, wine, and beer. The General Assembly shall, by law, prescribe regulations for the enforcement of the provisions herein contained, and shall thereby provide suitable penalties for violations of the provisions thereof."

GARIBALDI said a few years ago, in stating his religious views: "God is thought and reason; all I wish to see done is to substitute genius and intelligence for God's priesthood. Do not imagin that I pretend to teach the religion of God. I am not so impudent. I am, however, a little of a mathematician and a little of an astronomer, owing to my long sea life; and on the sea I saw and observed the works of God; but, I repeat, I hav not the presumption to teach God. Truth, reason, and God are, in my opinion, synonymous. Copernicus, Leibnitz, Newton, Franklin, Arago, Galileo are God's priests, for God's priests are genius and intelligence. Every one, however, has a right to believe according to the dictates of his own conscience."

SOME of the ministers of Philadelphia hav been criticising the mayor of that city for his recent action in regard to the Sunday laws. He says that if they suppose they are going to entangle him in any controversy they are very much mistaken, for he has no desire for thus gratifying their longing for notoriety. He further says that these gentlemen do not know what they are talking about when they undertake to be critics in the matter of legislation and the law. The mayor regards it as a public misfortune that "every tom-tit of a divine wants to attract attention as a denouncer of officials and of political policies." He says that he goes to Quaker meeting, where he is glad to say that there are none of these political harangs.

"ONE of the inhibitory 'General Rules' of the Methodist Episcopal church," says the Methodist, "mentions among the things not to be done 'the reading those books and singing those songs which do not tend to the knowledge and glory of God.' As a piece of church law to be enforced by pains and penalties, that rule, with many others of its kind, has long since become obsolete. The manner in which the cultured Infidelity of the age as embodied in its literature is treated among us has had its effect in very largely encouraging the use of just that kind of books which were most earnestly condemned by our Methodist fathers. Dickens and Thackeray, and George Eliot, and that class of writers, are the great teachers of thousands of Methodists—chiefly the young and susceptible, who necessarily assimilate what they read."

THE Evansville Argus has evolved the following story. It illustates how the grace of God will sometimes bring a man out of a tight place with flying colors: "The people of a little town in Warrick county hav been hanging right over the brink of a church scandal, but are not aware of the fact, nor will they be until this copy of the Argus reaches its readers over there. Just before the close of the services last Sunday a good brother walked forward to the pulpit, handed the minister an announcement, as he thought, and asked him to read it to the congregation before he dismissed them. Just before time was called on the doxology the minister said, 'Brother Bramley has handed me the following,' and in a clear voice he read the note, which ran as follows: "My Own Pet Bram: Are you never coming to see me again? I am dying to see my darling once more and gaze into his beloved eyes. The old mummy that calls herself your wife will never find it out. How can you endure her? Come, darling, to one who truly loves you. Your own and only Mary." The good brother had handed in the wrong announcement. At the close of the reading the minister looked horror-struck, the congregation stared at Bramley with cold, hard stares, and his wife rose up in her seat and glared at him like a tigress. It was a close call, but he was equal to the occasion, and, rising calmly and with a look of perfect resignation on his face, he said, 'Brothers and Sisters: It may appear strange to you that I should ask our beloved pastor to read such a terrible thing as that from the pulpit, but the best way to fight the devil is to fight him boldly face to face. The writer of that vile note is unknown to me, but is evidently some depraved child of sin who is endeavoring to besmirch my Christian reputation. I shall use every endeavor to ferret out the writer, and, if discovered, will fearlessly proclaim her name and hold her up to the contempt of all good Christian people.' He sat down amid murmurs of approbation and sympathy."

THE Rev. Mr. Hicks, who figured as the spiritual adviser of Guiteau, is evidently a sensationalist of the first water. This fact was indicated by his conduct before the execution, and became fully manifest by his performances on the scaffold; it is now made additionally apparent by the zest with which he enters into the squabbles of the doctors over Guiteau's body, eagerly elbowing his way to the front as the central and controling personage, and fomenting contentions as if for the sake of notoriety, rather than trying to quiet them. Attracted by these quarrels, a wretched figure reappears on the scene—Mrs. Scoville, who writes to Hicks that she will sue him for possession of her brother's corpse and for the property he left to this spiritual adviser. Such a suit would serve to prolong the attention which the reverend gentleman likes to attract, and in the end it is by no means impossible that, besides writing a book and lecturing on Guiteau, he may set up a museum of his relics.—Sun.

AN English religious paper, The Christian, publishes the following school-girl's letter. Puck copies it with the remark that it is so disgusting as to be almost funny: "I must tell you the good news. Since I wrote to you four of our girls hav come to the savior thoroughly. Isn't it splendid? One night after we had come from the service, and had gone up to bed, —— was crying; she was in dreadful trouble and could not find rest. I was obliged to leave her, because I sleep in another room; but her companion is a Christian (though she never let any one know it before). During the night, ——, who sleeps in my room, joined these two, and all three prayed together about two in the morning, and they all found Jesus. It was the first news I heard in the morning, and even if they had not told me I could hav guessed it from their happy faces. That was Friday morning. Before breakfast another of them was in great trouble; she said she was so wicked and so miserable. I told her that that was just the reason she wanted Jesus, and that he wanted her. We prayed together, and she gave herself to him. That was another happy face to go down to breakfast. We went to the last of the services yesterday, and there was an after-meeting for those who were wishing to become Christians, or who would like to stay for other reasons. A good many of us stayed, and my own companion was converted there. We had such a nice time last night. It seems almost too good to be true—only it is true. It just shows how God answers our prayers in a way we never think of—'exceeding abundantly above all we ask or think.' They were all worldly girls, fond of dances and all that sort of thing, and it will be very hard for them when they go home into the midst of it all again. Yesterday morning Miss —— gave us all a holiday, and allowed us to spend the morning up-stairs together, reading the Bible, etc. We had a splendid morning. You may imagin how we all felt after what God had just been doing for us. —— is still unconverted, but she will not always be. She is bound to be converted, because we hav all prayed for her so much."

CHARLES LANGHEIMER, whom Charles Dickens interviewed in his "American Notes," while visiting the Philadelphia prison about thirty years ago, is again in jail. Langheimer, better known as "Dickens's Dutchman," is seventy-nine years old, and has spent forty-two years in prison.

DURING the past ten days Alexandria has been bombarded by the English. Arabi Pasha's troops hav withdrawn from the city, and left it at the mercy of the Bedouins and released convicts, who hav fired and pillaged the town and massacred the European residents, numbering, it is reported, over two thousand persons. The city is still burning. English and American marines hav been landed in force, with orders to shoot all rioters and incendiaries. Turkey has been invited by the powers to take a part in the investment of Alexandria. The original cause of the present trouble between England and Arabi Pasha is that the chief ruler or khedive of Egypt had contracted various public debts, a large portion of which are held by English and French subjects. Against this state of affairs, and the management placed over them, Arabi Pasha, representing the nativ political element of the country, rebelled, and the khedive was unable to subdue him. The military proceedings now in progress are for the purpose of overthrowing Arabi and restoring power to the khedive, who is viceroy to the sultan of Turkey, of whose dominions Egypt is considered a part. As the matter stands at latest accounts, Arabi threatens to return to Alexandria, after having first cut the aqueduct supplying the city with water, and the English and American marines are at the front in wait for him. When the war will end is beyond the knowledge of any man. The Suez canal is closed.

A Truth Seeker Around the World

A Detour to Java.

BORNEO.—CONTINUED.

The aborigines of Borneo are Dyaks, and these are divided into Sea Dyaks and Hill Dyaks. The former are largely pirates, and of course would be a benefit to no country. The Hill Dyaks are a better race, inclining to be peaceful, but not vigorous or industrious. They are described as more talkative and cheerful, and less suspicious than the Malays, of whom there is also a considerable number on the island. They are said to be truthful, temperate, and hospitable. They have no written language, and what religion they have is made up of gross superstitions little better than fetichism, though perhaps no more so than the religions of many other people in the world. They hold that their god Djath governs the sublunar world, and the god Sangjang reigns over hell, for they, too, are able to afford a hell; and these gods are invoked by sprinkling rice on the ground and offering various sacrifices. They often have wooden idols in their houses, probably to represent their invisible gods. Some travelers say the people of the island are a sort of Pantheists, and, like the ancient Greeks, believe in gods above the earth and gods below the earth, with innumerable good and evil spirits, of whom Budjang-Brani is the worst devil. They think diseases are caused by the influence of demons, which also cause, all the misfortunes in the world, and these are driven away by shouts and shrieks and pounding on a discordant gong. I have known Christians to act in a similar manner. It is said the Dyaks cherish a vague notion of divine unity and of the immortality of the soul. In this respect they are much like all other religionists. The notions of all are vague.

In one respect these natives are more advanced than believers in some other systems of religion—they allow women to administer some of its rites; some of them are dancing priestesses or bayaderes, while the duties of others are directed to healing the sick, exorcising evil spirits, conducting the souls of the departed to the abodes where their ancestors are, demanding the favor and protection of the gods. Before a woman can assume the sacerdotal rank, the soul of a sangsang or angel must have passed into her body, and while she continues to discharge the duties of the sacred office she must abstain from all intercourse with her family. With a portion of the Dyaks the souls of the dead wait around their former residences until the funeral ceremonies are performed, when they take their departure to the abodes of bliss; but with others the dead depart at once and do not wait for funeral services. As soon as the corpse is stretched in its coffin, its spirit departs for the other world under the guidance of a sangsang, and to the sound of hymns chanted by the priestesses or bilians. The dead pass over an invisible bridge, which begins at the place where they died and ends where happiness dwells. The dead body, reposing on its bier, is first carried out into the open air; afterward, probably when the flesh has been eaten off by animals, the bones are cleaned and burned, and collected in urns, which are deposited in the sandong, or house of the dead. The funeral ceremony is an occasion of great pomp, when not only buffaloes and wild hogs are sacrificed, but human beings also. The heads of the victims are hung up in the sandong. One chief is reported having deposited in his wife's coffin eight suits of clothing and all her ornaments. Immediately after her death he immolated a slave and others, when her corpse was removed from the house; and after the cremation of the body eight slaves, sixty hogs, and two buffaloes were sacrificed around the pile.

A singular custom is said to exist among the wealthy; the survivor, whether husband or wife, cannot under any pretext quit the house for a certain period, which time is longer or shorter in different families. Often the widow or widower remains thus seated and impassive, doing nothing for as many as seven months together. Human sacrifices are offered on the conclusion of peace with enemies, or treaties of alliance. The public and private charms and talismans are then dipped in human blood, and those present sprinkle their foreheads, shoulders, chest, stomach, and down to the knees and feet, at the same time muttering vows and prayers in behalf of one another.

Among a tribe called Ot-Danoons their occasions of festivity, always prolonged, coarse, and noisy, terminate very often in contention. Men and women become intoxicated; the quarrelsome seize their weapons and threaten hostilities; but those who have preserved some degree of sobriety separate the belligerant parties and bind them till they recover their senses. Often after these orgies the ground is covered with the prostrate bodies of the turbulent captives. When these superstitious people remove into a new locality, custom requires that they should pay the inhabitants a certain sum of money for the purchase of buffaloes, hogs, etc., which are immediately sacrificed to the gods to appease their wrath, which, as with other gods, is always ready to be aroused on the smallest provocation. These ceremonies often cost the new-comers a sum of money equaling fifteen or twenty dollars. They have another custom, still more execrable, of shutting up their daughters at the age of eight or ten years in a narrow and dimly-lighted cell. She is not permitted to emerge from it on any consideration, nor even to receive the visits of her father, mother, brothers, or sisters. For six or seven dreary years she sees only the slaves attached to her service; and her sole occupation is to weave mats. Her limbs, deprived of all exercise, do not acquire their natural size or use, and her feet remain small and stunted, but this is a high mark of gentility. She gains her freedom when she reaches a marriageable age, and returns to the world more like a specter than a human being; she is pale as a waxen effigy, her trembling limbs scarcely able to support her attenuated body, and ignorant as a new-born child. On this occasion a slave is immolated, that the body of the young girl may be sprinkled with the victim's blood. The object of this imprisonment is to render the child famous, and to preserve a daintiness of figure and a delicacy of appearance, which are considered the very first attractions.

The Ot-Danoons practice tattooing, as also do some of the Dyaks. Sometimes the forms of the tattooing are graceful and complicated, and cover the whole body with the exception of the face. This ceremony is performed under instructions from the priestesses, who are supposed to know how the sangsangs ornament themselves. The legs of the women are tattooed from the knees to the feet. They wear a short, narrow apron, generally blue, fastened around the waist by a girdle of rattan or a leather belt, to which strings of pearls and other ornaments are attached. They are very fond of decorations. The women of this tribe are muscular, and they undertake the most arduous labors. The men are also equally vain and use much ornamentation. They are greedy for money, and often use extortion with strangers. They are not very honest or truthful, and less moral than the Hill Dyaks.

The animal productions of Borneo are much like those of Sumatra. This is pehaps the real home of the ourang-outang, many of which reach a large size. These animals are not lively like monkeys, but prefer solitude and listlessness. They will sit for hours upon the limb of a tree looking toward the earth as though in deep meditation, and often heave a sigh as if melancholy. Wallace says they are not so pugnacious as represented, and do not attack man unless in self-defense. Their numbers are said to be decreasing.

It is almost a wonder that England has not had some grievance with Borneo, so as to get up a war with it and capture it. If she would send ten or twenty thousand of her sons and daughters there to civilize and develop the resources it would be a most valuable country. There are some Chinese settlements on the shores, and I cannot see why a million or two of Chinese should not leave their own over-crowded country and make Borneo their permanent home. I am quite willing they should emigrate there instead of making the longer journey to California. This large island also possesses much mineral wealth, but its mines have been but poorly developed.

Other points among these numerous islands must be mentioned very briefly or my story will become too long. I will notice a few of the peculiarities of some of the islands, and give some of their religious superstitions. The Island of Bali lies south of Java, and is about eighty-five miles in length and fifty-five in width. It has a very fertile soil, and a very mild tropical climate. As a "garden spot" it is hardly surpassed by any similar portion of the earth's surface. It grows everything found in tropical regions, and is represented as charming and attractive in every particular. It has plains next the ocean, then a range of well-wooded hills, and above these a lofty volcanic ridge, bold, impressive, majestic, culminating in a peak 11,326 feet high. After a long repose this volcano burst out actively in 1843. The island is subject to earthquakes. In 1815 an earthquake here was so severe as to shatter into fragments a mountain of considerable size, by which twelve thousand persons lost their lives. The principal products are rice, cotton, and coffee; among the animals, some tigers, monkeys, hogs, goats, cattle, buffaloes, and small hardy horses. The birds are numerous and of brilliant plumage.

The inhabitants are partly Malays and partly Chinese. The costume of the people is extremely simple and primitive, consisting of a small piece of cotton cloth, to which a sabak, a kind of cloak, is added on state occasions. The houses of the poor are of mud, sun-baked, and covered with reeds or bamboo; those of the princes are of brick, neatly laid in cement. The villages are arranged in squares or parallelograms, and inclosed by high walls. The religion is said to be a modified Hindooism, but I can hardly see how that can be when it has been settled by the Malays and Chinese.

Lombok comes next east, and is a smaller island, being forty-eight miles long and thirty-seven wide. Here also plains come next to the sea, and in the interior mountains 12,000 feet high. One cone appears to once have been a volcano. All the neighboring valleys and ravines are hung with dark woods, which also mantle the base of the cone, and seem to struggle up it in irregular wavy lines, defining slight hollows in its declivities. The upper part of the cone, as well as the sharp ridges and peaks and mounds of the lower mass, are brown and barren, except where relieved by clumps of pine-like trees. No lava-streams are visible, probably having been covered long ago by dust and ashes, as have been many of the volcanoes of Java. Though somewhat lower than the peak of Teneriffe, it is said to be much more majestic when viewed from the north, where it seems to rise abruptly out of the sea; while on the south, where it rises from a somewhat low, level country, it is richly wooded. The vegetable growth of this island is spoken of in the highest degree.

The productions of Celebes and the Spice Islands are spoken of in the highest terms, they vieing with the most fertile portions of the earth, and enjoying climates as lovely. Here the clove and nutmeg-trees abound. They also have volcanoes and earthquakes.

Batchian is spoken of as a paradise of birds, among which are several varieties of the magnificent birds or paradise. Wallace here discovered a species of bird which he termed Semioptera Wallacci. In his description of it he says the plumage is sober, being of an ashy olive, with a purplish tinge on the back; the crown of the head is beautifully glossed with pale metallic violet, and the feathers of the front extend as much over the beak as in most of the family. The neck and breast are scaled with fine metallic green, and the feathers on the lower part are elongated on each side, so as to form a two-pointed gorget, which can be folded beneath the wings, or partially erected and spread out in the same way as the side plumes of the birds of paradise. The four long white plumes, which give the bird its most unique character, spring from little tubercles close to the upper edge of the shoulder or bend of the wing; they are narrow, gently curved, and equally webbed on both sides, of a creamy-white color.

Of the people of Bouru a little should be said. The aborigines, or Alfoories, resemble the Malays, but away from the sea-coast appear to be very ignorant. Wallace says many of those he met had never seen a pin; and the better informed, few in number, took pride in teaching their companions the uses of "the needle with a head, and without an eye." They were equally ignorant of paper, teapots, teacups, and teaspoons. Their houses are mere hovels. Formerly each tribe was compelled to send one young maiden annually to its "regent" for a bride; but the Dutch, having acquired some power in the island, have caused this custom to be discontinued. In regard to marriage each man has to buy his wife for a price regulated by the standing of the bride's father; thus the daughter of a man of nobility costs much more than that of a poor and obscure man. They are said to believe in one supreme being, who created all things, and is the source of both good and evil. They also believe in malignant spirits. They imagine that prayer leads to prosperity, and the neglect of it to adversity. Through the infinite love of the supreme being he was induced to send a great teacher, Nabiata (whether a begotten son I cannot say), who dwelt among the mountains, and delivered the will of his divine master in seven commandments, as follows:

1. Thou shalt not kill nor wound.
2. Thou shalt not steal.
3. Thou shalt not commit adultery.
4. Thou shalt not set thyself up againt the fenna (tribe).
5. A man shall not set himself up against the chief of his tribe.
6. A chief shall not set himself up against him that is over his or other tribes.
7. The chief over more than one tribe shall not set himself up againt him who is placed over all the tribes.

Nabiata also taught that though the body perishes the soul will live forever; that those who keep the foregoing commandments shall dwell in his presence far above the firmament, while those who do wickedly shall never enter the abodes of the happy; nor shall they remain on earth, but for ever and ever, lonely and in sorrow, they shall wander among the clouds, yearning with a desire never to be gratified to join their brethren in heaven. Nabiata also introduced circumcision, performed on children of both sexes when they reached the age of eight years. This teacher seems to be dispensing pretty fair Judaism and Christianity.

One ceremony practiced on this island is that of shaving the heads of children, which takes place on the first birthday or thereabouts, and has a religious significance. The priest begins the rite by repeating a low monotonous prayer in a monotonous nasal chant, which at times swells into a chorus through the accession of other voices. When this is ended a servant brings in the child, followed by another servant carrying a large plate partly filled with water, in which may be observed two parts of the blossom of cocoanut, a razor, and a pair of shears. The chief priest dips his fingers in the water, places them on the head of the infant, and clips off a lock of the hair with the shears. The lock of hair is then thrown into the water with a piece of money. The example of throwing in a piece of money is followed by all present. Tea and small rice cakes are handed around, and the ceremony is concluded.

Marriage ceremonies are always interesting. This is the way they get married on this island: The house and verandah of the groom is brilliantly illuminated by Chinese lanterns. The bride at her home is tastefully decorated with trailing plants and flowers, where she awaits the coming of her future companion. Female friends gather into the room with the bride, and soon engage in the favorite custom of chewing betelnut. A shrill piping attends the approach of the groom. A company of gaily dressed boys bearing wax tapers lead the procession, and another similar cortege brings the presents for the bride. The bridegroom follows, supported by his friends, and surrounded by tiers of candles arranged in a kind of frame-work. He is dressed in gay, red attire, and has a gold chain hanging on his neck. On one side of the room where the ceremony is performed stands a small table covered with a red cloth, and upon it are two gigantic red wax candles. The bride sits behind it attired in a scarlet dress—red being the favorite color with these people—and with a cloud of lace falling over her face and shoulders. The bridegroom approaches; she rises slowly. Placing the palms of his hands together he bows thrice with great gravity and deference. She salutes him in the same manner, except that she does not raise her hands. And now the interesting moment has arrived. She remains standing, and probably tremulous, yet seemingly tranquil, when he steps forward and pulls at the pins that hold fast the veil which screens her charms from his ardent gaze. He very naturally shows some awkwardness in this part of the operation, but a couple of maidens in attendance kindly assist him, and by degrees the countenance of the bride is revealed. He then passes round the table, and both sit down together, while the guests sit quietly until it is time for them to depart and leave the newly-married pair by themselves. This is the way in which the ceremony is performed among the richer classes; it is not probable that the poor are able to put on so much style. These people have doubtless been changed somewhat in their customs by the Mohammedan influence among them, as they have partially embraced that system of religion. They have likewise foolishly adopted the pernicious habit of opium-smoking, which indicates that the Chinese have also been proselyting among them. The shores of this island abound in coral formations of the most remarkable character.

MALAYS AND PAPUANS CONTRASTED.

The islands of the Eastern archipelago are peopled by these two distinct races; the former in the western portion of the islands and the latter in New Guinea and neighboring islands. The Papuan is much the darker in color, of a sooty brown and approaching a black. The hair is frizzled or woolly—not so much so as the African negro, but growing in little tufts, or curls, which keep separate from one another. Some tribes of them cut their hair close to the head. The face is clothed with beard and whiskers, which also grow in frizzly tufts. The breasts and shoulders of the men are frequently covered with a similar growth. The Malay term for crisped hair is rambut pua-pua, and hence the name pua-pua, or Papua, is applied to the entire class. In stature the Papuan is taller then the Malayan and perhaps equals the European; but his legs are long and thin, and his hands and feet are large. The negro characteristics are strong in him; the forehead is depressed, while the brows are prominent; the large nose is broad and high, with the nostrils considerably hidden by the long front tip; the lips are thick and prominent. They often disfigure themselves by gashing the skin in long stripes with sharp knives, then filling the wound with white clay.

Morally the Papuan is said to be equal to the Malay, while his intellect is held to be superior, although the Malay has usually proved the victor in conflict. The Papuan is as impulsive and demonstrative as a warm-blooded Italian, and gives vent to his feelings and passions by shouts of laughter and yells, and by frantic gestures. He is full of energy, and quick of comprehension, with a keen sense of the artistic, which leads him to decorate his house with elaborate carving, as well as his canoe, his implements, weapons, etc. He has a marked antipathy to strangers, or at least to their settling in his neighborhood. This is especially the case on his own soil; when in a foreign country, and especially when in a servile condition, he parts with all this. Mr. Wallace says: "The Malay is of short stature, brown-skinned, straight-haired, beardless, and smooth-bodied. The Papuan is taller, black-skinned, frizzly-haired, bearded, and hairy-bodied. The former is broad-faced, has a small nose, and flat eyebrows; the latter is long-faced, has a large prominent nose, and projecting eyebrows. The Malay is cold, quiet, undemonstrative, boastful; the Papuan, impetuous, excitable, warm-tempered, and noisy. The former grave, dignified, seldom laughs; the latter is merry and laughter-loving; the one conceals, the other displays his emotions."

The Dorians are a tribe which inhabit a part of New Guinea. They are small in stature, about five and a quarter feet high, their color a very dark brown, the hair black and crisp and worn at full length, and not much attention paid to it. The men wear it in a comb consisting of a bamboo stick split at one end into three or four points like a fork, and shaped at the other end into a spike and neatly carved. This strange implement or ornament is stuck obliquely into the hair, and a strip of colored calico, fastened to the upper end, hangs down from it like a streamer. The beard is strongly crisped, but short. The dress of the chiefs is on an ampler scale than usually prevails with the Papuans. They wear the saluer, or short drawers, of the Malays, and the kabaya, or loose coat of calico, with a handkerchief round the head. Men of lower rank restrict themselves to a chawat, or waist-cloth, made of the bark of the fig or the paper mulberry-tree beaten out in the same way as the bark-cloth of the Polynesians. The chief devices used on the bodies of the males are crossed swords and kris-blades. The men hunt, fish, shape their weapons, build houses, and make crosses. The women cultivate the plantations, do the household work, carry wood and water, manufacture earthen vessels, and weave mats and cloth. I believe the women are the most industrious. They are all quite skilful. They are all good swimmers, the women vieing with the men. Their food is principally yams, maize, millet, fish, pork, bananas, cocoanuts, papayas, and rice. They are inveterate smokers of tobacco.

The manners and customs of the Dorians are described as less barbarous than might be looked for from a race so rude and uncivilized. They are of a mild disposition, with strong natural principles, inclining them toward right and justice. They look upon dishonesty as a serious crime, and theft rarely occurs among them; and though they have no locks or fastenings to their houses their property is never, or very seldom, stolen. Would it not be well for some of these pagans to go as missionaries to Europe and America and teach the Christians of those quarters of the world how to be honest? They are rather suspicious of strangers, and they have good cause to be, for they have been badly treated by the strangers who have visited their coasts. They have great reverence for old age, they are faithful to the marriage vow, and are very affectionate toward their children. They prize chastity as highly as any people on earth, and practice it more strictly and honestly than any Christian nation. Breach of chastity is almost unknown among them. They are partial, however, to strong drink, but can hardly be worse in this respect than many Christian nations. They prepare no fermented liquor themselves, and knew nothing about intoxicating drinks until the Christians taught them, and who still supply them with the wretched stuff. Each tribe has its own chief, and each chief is independent of other chiefs, though a nominal allegiance is given to the sultan of Tidore. When a chief dies, one of the relatives of the deceased hastens to communicate the intelligence to the sultan, carrying with him a gift of slaves and birds of paradise as a token of fealty. This person is generally appointed to the chieftainship, and is duly invested with the insignia—a yellow kavaya, or pair of drawers, and a handkerchief. From that time he is bound to pay a tax of one slave annually to the sultan, also to contribute three vessels, or prabus, to the sultan's flotilla, and supply him with provisions when demanded. The authority of the chief is not very extensive. The actual control of the people rests with a council of elders, and the chief's principal prerogative is to lead men to battle. Legislation is extremely simple, for where crimes are few punishments will also be few, and the prevailing principle is that of compensation. If a man burns down another's house he becomes the slave of the person whose house is burnt; if he wounds another wilfully he must give him a slave by way of retribution; if he steals, he must not only restore what he has stolen, but he must add something as a bonus. Capital punishment is never inflicted. Yes, what a fine thing it would be if these people could teach Christians to live as morally as they do. But they are superstitious and believe a great deal that is not true. (Christians are not quite free from similar superstitions.) They carry about with them at all times and places a variety of charms and talismans, such as bits of bone or quartz or carved wood, to which, in consequence of their superstition, a fictitious value is given. Those who are a little tinctured with Mohammedanism use verses of the Koran written on narrow slips of paper by the Moslem priests. But most Dorians are pagans and worship an idol called Karwar, a clumsy figure carved in wood, holding a shield, and having an enormously large head with a sharp nose and a wide mouth. This is kept in every house, and plays the part of a dumb oracle. In every case of trouble or new projects its owner hastens to consult it and implore it, crouching before it and bowing repeatedly with his hands clasped upon his forehead. Should he be seized with any feeling of doubt while in these exercises it is regarded as an unfortunate sign, and the votary abandons whatever purpose he had in his mind to carry out; but when the suppliant is very anxious to carry out some particular desire, he is pretty sure not to have the unfortunate sign, and it will be easy for him to say his god approves. They are able to cite many instances where they have received direct answers to their prayers.

There are priests among the Dorians (all peoples and all religions have these); but their functions are confined to the interpreting of dreams and omens, and to giving advice in case of sickness. They do not sacrifice animals, and few religious ceremonies are necessary. The marriage ceremony is simple and without show. The bride and bridegroom sit down before the Karwar, the bride offers homage to the groom by giving him tobacco and a betel leaf. The two then join hands, rise up, and they are married. When a death occurs the corpse is wrapped in a shroud of white muslin and interred in a pit five feet in depth. It is placed on its side, with its weapons and ornaments around it, and a porcelain dish under its ear. The grave is then filled with earth, and roofed over with atap, after which the Karwar of the deceased is placed on the top, and all is over. The dead man sleeps as quietly as though a long funeral sermon had been pronounced over him.

The Aruans are another tribe or race whose homes are on some of these islands. Some of their customs may be alluded to. They are very inoffensive and peaceful in disposition. This is shown by their treatment to strangers, who have again and again mistreated them and cruelly taken advantage of them in many ways, who cheat them in trading, and who domineer over them. Though uninspired by religious motives, though fearing no future puuishment and hoping for no future reward, they live in the utmost good fellowship. If any disputes arise they submit at once to the decision of the elders, as their forefathers did before them, and for whom they entertain the highest esteem. About the only vice they have is indulgence in strong drink, and this they learned from Christians, and from Christian traders they obtain it. No Aruan can take to himself a wife until he has delivered the marriage present—which consists of cloth, or brass gongs, or elephants' teeth, according to his rank. These are often paid in instalments running over a period of many years.

Very unlike the rule in Ceylon, with this people it is a most fortunate circumstance for a man to have a good family of girls, for the marriage presents or payments which he receives make him rich. It sometimes happens that a young man wishes to marry when he has no offering for the father-in-law. In such case he visits all his friends and acquaintances and solicits something from each, to enable him to at least make the first payment on the damsel he wishes for a wife.

It is unlawful among these people to enter the house of a person during his absence, and whoever transgresses this law is compelled to pay the owner a piece of cloth or something of similar value. This is called pakal dende, and if the offender is unable to pay the fine he must leave the village. On the death of an Aruan his relatives assemble and destroy all the goods he may have collected in his lifetime, breaking even the gongs in pieces, which are carefully thrown away. The body is then laid out on a small mat, and propped up against a ladder for three or four days, after which time the relatives again assemble and cover the decomposed parts with lime for the purpose of checking further decay. Meanwhile the fumes of burning gums fill the hut, and the guests sit in the fumes drinking freely of intoxicating liquor. Thus excited and inflamed they vent their feelings in violent shouts, which mingle with the howlings and wailings of the women and the hoarse discord of several gongs. If they act any worse or drink any more freely than Christian Irish do at their wakes, it is a pity indeed. Food is offered the deceased, and his mouth is even filled with food and drink. One would almost rather not die than to be treated in this manner. The body is then placed on a kind of bier, which is strewn with numerous pieces of cloth, according to the man's rank and wealth; while large dishes of China porcelain are set beneath to catch any moisture that may fall from the corpse. These dishes after this are held in high value. After being removed from the house further attempts are made to induce the corpse to eat. The mouth is again filled with the most choice edibles and drinkables, and the mourners join in a loud chant, calling upon the deceased to tell them if he will not waken from his sleep at the sight of so many of his old friends, and eat with them once more. At last this fooling ends, and the corpse is again placed on the bier, which is then adorned with flags and carried into the forest, where it is placed on the top of four posts. A tree, usually the pavetta indica, is then planted near it. It is stated that at this final ceremony none but nude women are present. This is the sudah buang, and testifies that the body is abandoned to silence and solitude, being no longer able to see, hear, think, or feel. Let him rest in peace.

The Ahetas are a race of small savages, with curly hair and retreating chins, which inhabit the Philippine Islands. They are so uncivilized or ignorant as to know nothing of agriculture, and live by hunting and fishing. They have no religious system, though they are not wholly devoid of religious sentiment. It appears that they have learned from another neighboring tribe the practice of worshiping for a day the trunk of a tree, or a fragment of rock, and in which they trace some fancied resemblance to an animal; then they turn away from it and think no more about gods until they come across some similar object which they can fancy bears some resemblance to something. In fact, their plan of making gods is not widely different from the modes of other people. They cherish a particular veneration for the dead. For several years after a friend or relative dies they continue to visit his grave and deposit thereon a little offering of remembrance, if nothing more than a little tobacco or betel, much as a Christian mourner places a wreath of flowers upon the grave of a loved one. The bows and arrows of the deceased are suspended over his grave on the day of interment, and it is their fond belief that he issues every night from his resting-place to pursue the shadowy hunt in the haunted glades of the forest.

In case of an aged person afflicted with a mortal malady, they don't always wait for him to die before they bury him; but no sooner has the body been deposited in the grave than it becomes necessary, according to their traditions, that his death should be avenged, and accordingly the warriors of the tribe sally forth with lance and arrow to slay the first living creature they encounter, whether man, stag, wild hog, or buffalo. When thus in pursuit of an expiatory victim they take the precaution to break off the young shoots of the shrubs as they pass by and leave the broken ends hanging in the direction of their roots, for the purpose of warning neighbors and travelers to shun the path they are pursuing, for even if one of their own people should fall in their way they would not dare to let him escape. He must suffer for the dead.

This rude people have virtues; they are faithful in marriage, and a man has but one wife. When a young man has selected his future partner, his friends or relatives ask the consent of the girl's parents, and it is always granted. Then the marriage-day is fixed, and in the morning, before sunrise, the maiden is dispatched to the forest, where she conceals herself or not, according as she feels disposed toward her suitor. An hour's grace is allowed, and the young man then goes forth to seek her; and if he succeeds in finding her and bringing her back with him before sunset she is his wife; but if he fails in his search he is required to abandon all further claim to the damsel. It seems it rests largely with the young woman whether she is found or not. If she prefers some other young man to hunt for her all she has to do is to hide thoroughly; but if her suitor is after her mind she will manage to help him find her.

They cherish the greatest respect for old age, and their meetings are always governed by one of the elders. They are remarkable for the agility and address of their movements. They dextrously climb the highest trees, seizing the trunks with both hands and using the soles of the feet as a lever. It is said to be a curious sight to see these children of nature departing on a great hunting expedition; men, women, and children all consort together and issue forth like a troop of ourang-outangs. They are accompanied by one or two small dogs of a peculiar breed, which assist them in following up the prey after it has been wounded.

Among the natural curiosities of the island of Timor is the raised coral reef at Coupong. It rises like a vertical rampart between the beach and the town, and again behind the town to a hight of fully six hundred feet above the sea, spreading over all the adjacent highland and giving it comparatively smooth and level outlines. This coraline limestone, of which this strange elevated track consists, is dark externally, frequently very hard, but white and comparatively soft when broken open. Its surface—both that of the beds and the face of the cliffs—is rugged and porous, having, as coral formations always have, a honey-combed appearance, and, with its imbedded corals and shells, reminding the observer of the great wonders performed by those small animals, which, under the waters of the ocean, work with unceasing industry in building up the large islands which abound in the southern portions of the Indian oceans. All this mighty cliff is the work of this minute form of animal life. The commonest corals here are the beautiful mæandrina, astræa, and porites. Of the shells, those most abundant are the strombus and arca. The great truth taught by this coral reef is that the central mountain chain was once the only part of the island of Timor raised above the waves, and that it was surrounded by a fringing coral reef. As by the action of the coral insect the chain gradually rose, and the neighboring sea consequently became shallower, this fringing reef was extended on all sides, while portions from time to time were brought above the surface of the ocean until the island attained its present condition—three hundred miles long and forty miles wide. Thus are the changes in nature often accomplished.

RETURN TO JAVA.

I think you will admit that I have talked long enough about what I have not seen, but which information I have obtained from other sources, and that, though a volume would scarcely contain all that is interesting and wonderful about this extensive group of islands, I had better return to the island which I am at present visiting and say something more about it. Let me tell you, then, that Java, in shape, may be likened to a parallelogram, of which the larger portion runs east and west, with a slight inclination to the north at this, the western end. It has withal a crescent shape on its northern line. It measures 630 miles in length, and varies from 35 miles to 126 miles in width. Its total area in round numbers is fifty thousand square miles, or nearly as large as the state of New York.

The average hight of its forty-five volcanoes is said to be about nine thousand feet. Many of these volcanoes are still active, so that along the axis of the island a series of five towers seem to be planted like vast burning beacons to throw their lurid, warm light far athwart the rolling billows of the Indian Ocean. These peaks, owing to the fertility of the soil and the humidity of the atmosphere, are green with produce almost to their very summits, so that perhaps it has been justly said that while the mountains of Java are more lovely than those of many other countries, they are not so strikingly grand and picturesque. The form of the volcanoes is even and regular, like a pyramid, but devoid of that wild ruggedness and grandeur often found in mountains of other kinds.

These Javan volcanoes have all names, with the altitude given they severally attain to, as well as the province in which they are located, but they are strange, hard names, and it is hardly worth while to repeat them. I will say, however, that the tallest one is called Slamat, and is 12,300 feet high. These volcanoes display all the phenomena of igneous action except lava streams, which do not occur in Java. The active craters are said to be remarkable for the quantity of sulphur and sulphurous vapors which they discharge. The crater of Taschem contains a lake, about a quarter of a mile in length, from which issues a stream so strongly impregnated with sulphurous acid that no forms of life can exist in it, and even fish cannot live in the sea near its mouth. Near Butar, an extinct volcano, about half a mile in circuit, is known as "the Vale of Poison," or Guevo-Upas. No living creature can enter it with safety, and it is said that the soil is strewn with the carcasses of birds, deer, and other animals killed by the fatal carbonic acid gas which accumulates in the hollow of this deadly valley. So if the deadly "upas-tree" of which we have heard so much proves to be a myth, there is no doubt about the deadly valley being fatal enough to kill any being who penetrates into it.

Michelet has considerable to say about Java. He says it is dowered with fires. "Notwithstanding its limited area, it possesses as many volcanoes as the entire American continent." And to these he says, we must add its liquid volcanoes, its vein of somber azure, which the Javanese call the "Black River." This is the great equatorial current, which in its northerly course warms the Asiatic seas, is remarkable for its muddiness, and tastes salter than human blood. A hot sea, a torrid sun, volcanic fire, volcanic life. Not a day passes but what a tempest breaks out among the Blue Mountains, with lightning so vivid that the eye cannot endure to gaze at it. Torrents of electric rain intoxicate earth and madden vegetation. The very forests, smoking with wreathed vapors in the burning sun, seem as many additional volcanoes situated midway on the mountain slopes. In the loftier regions they are frequently inaccessible, and sometimes so thickly intermingled, so dense, so gloomy, that the traveler who penetrates them must carry torches even at noonday. Nature, without an eye to watch her, celebrates these her 'orgies of vegetation,' and creates her river monsters and colossi. Stemless rhizantheæ seize on the roots of a tree, and gorge themselves with its pith and vitality. Some species measure six feet in circumference. Their splendor, shining in the deep night of the forest, astonishes, nay, almost terrifies the beholder. These children of the darkness owe nothing of their resplendent coloring to the light. Flourishing low down in the warm vapors, and fattened by the breath of the earth, they seem to be its luxurious dreams, its strange eëry phantasies of desire."

Michelet continues: "Java has two faces. The southern wears already the aspect of Oceanica, enjoys a pure air, and is surrounded by rocks all alive with polypus and madrepores. To the north, however, it is still India—India with all it inherits of unhealthiness; a black alluvial soil fermenting with the deadly travail of nature reacting on herself—with the work of combination and decomposition. Its inhabitants have been compelled to abandon the once opulent town of Bantam, which is now a mass of ruins. Superb Batavia is one triumphant cemetery. In less than thirty years—from 1730 to 1752—it swallowed up a million human lives; sixty thousand in a twelve-month (1750)! And though it is not so terrible now, its atmosphere has not been purified to any considerable extent. The animals of the primeval world which live forgotten in its bosom are remarkable, it seems, for their funeral aspect. In the evening enormous hairy bats, such as are found nowhere else, flutter to and fro. By day, and even at noon, the strange flying dragon (a huge flying lizard—draco), that memorial of a remote epoch, when the serpent was endowed with wings, does not hesitate to make its appearance. Numerous black animals exist, which agree in color with the black basalt of the mountains. And black, too, is the tiger, that terrible destroyer, which as late as 1830 devoured annually three hundred lives!

"The double mountain chain which forms the backbone of Java is intersected by numerous internal, concentrated, and sheltered valleys. Hundreds of lateral valleys, running in an opposite direction, vary the spectacle. This diversity of surface insures a corresponding diversity of vegetation. The soil in the lowlands is madreporic, and was once alive. At a higher level it has a foundation of granite, loaded with the fertile ruins and hot debris of the volcanoes. The whole is a vast ascending scale which, from sea to mountain, presents six different climates, rising from the marine flora and the flora of the marshes to the Alpine flora. A superb amphitheater, rich and abundant at every gradation, bearing the dominant plants, and those transitional forms which lead up from one to the other; and lead so ingeniously that, without any lacuna or abrupt leap, we are carried onward, and vainly endeavor to trace between the six climates any rigorous lines of demarcation. In the lowlands, facing India and the boiling caldron of the ocean, the mangrove absorbs the vapor; but towards Oceanica, and the region of the thousand isles, the cocoanut-tree rises, with its foot in the emerald wave, and its crest lightly rocking in the full, fresh breeze. The palm is here of little value. Above its bamboo and resinous trees Java wears a magnificent girdle or zone of forest; a forest wholly composed of teak—the oak of oaks, the finest wood in the world—indestructible teak! It boasts also of a gigantic plane, the superb liquid amber. Here every kind of food and all the provisions of the five worlds superabound. The rice, maize, figs, and bananas of Hindostan, the pears of China, the apples of Japan, flourish in company with the peach, pineapple, and orange of Europe; aye, and even with the strawberry, which extends its growth along the banks of the stream. All this is the innocence of nature. But side by side with it prevails another and more formidable world; that of the higher vegetable energies, the plants of temptation, seductive, yet fatal, which double the pleasures, while shortening the duration of life. At present they reign throughout the earth from pole to pole. They make and they unmake nations. The least of these terrible spirits has wrought a greater change in the globe than any war. They have in man the volcanic fires; and a soul, a violent spirit, which is indefinable, which seems less a human thing than a creature of the planet. They have effected a revolution which, above all, has changed our idea of time. Tobacco kills the hours, and renders them insensible. Coffee shortens them by the stimulus it affords the brain; it convert them into minutes. Foremost among the sources of intoxication to which man unhappily resorts, we must name alcohol. Eight species of the sugar-cane which thrive in Java abundantly supply this agent of delirium and of forcible feebleness. No less abundantly flourishes tobacco, the herb of dreams, which has enshrouded the world in its misty vapors. Fortunately Java also produces immense supplies of its antidote, coffee. It is this which contends against tobacco, and supplies the place of alcohol. The island of Java alone furnishes a fourth of all the coffee drunk by man; and a coffee, too, of fine quality, when it has been dried sufficiently without any fear of reducing its weight. Formerly Java and its neighboring lands were known as "spice islands" only, and as producing freely violent drugs and medicinal poisons. Frightful stories were circulated of its deadly plants, the juice of which was a mortal venom; and of the guevo-upas, which but to touch was death.

"He who would see the East in all the fulness of its magical, voluptuous, and sinister forces, should explore the great bazars of Java. There the curious jewels wrought by the cuuning Indian hand are exposed to the desires of woman, temptation, and the cost of pleasures. There, too, may be seen another seductive agency, the vegetable fury of the burning and scorching plains which is so eagerly sought after, the perfumes of terrible herbs and flowers as yet unnamed. Marvelous and profound the night in its sweet repose, after the violent heats of the day! But be cautious in your enjoyment of it; as it grows old you breathe death! Take note of this: the peculiarity that gives to these brilliant bazars so curious an effect is that all the thronging crowds are dusky with dark complexions, and all the animals are black. The contrast is singular in this land of glowing light. The heat seems to have burned up everything and tinted each object with shadow. The little horses as they gallop past you seem but so many flashes of darkness. The buffaloes, slowly arriving, loaded with fruit and flowers, with the most radiant gifts of life, all wear a livery of bluish black. Beware of this time of night not to wander too far, or to ramble in the higher grounds, lest you should encounter the black panther, whose green eyes illumine the obscurity with a terrific glare! And, who knows?—the splendid tyrant of the forest, the black tiger, may have begun his midnight prowl; that formidable phantom which the Malays of Java believe to be the spirit of death."

From these glowing passages of description the reader cannot fail to gather up such details as will assist him to realize for himself this dazzling, fertile, beautiful, terrible Java—its blazing volcanoes, its rich mountain valleys, its immense forests, and its luxuriant gardens, with all their exuberant abundance of fruits and blossoms.

The population of Java is between two and three millions, the larger portion of whom are Malays and believers in the religion of the prophet, though a portion are Buddhists. There are a good many Chinese on the island, 10,000 being in Batavia alone. There are 5,000 Europeans (chiefly Dutch) in this city, with some more in other parts of the island.

The principal exports are coffee, rice, sugar, nutmegs, mace, cloves, tin, indigo, cinnamon, cochineal, pepper, pimento, tobacco, cocoanuts, cocoanut soap, etc. The total value of these exports amount to some $30,000,000 per year.

NATURAL CURIOSITIES OF JAVA.

Among these are the hot springs or lakes. A noted one is on the mountain Dieng, not a lovely place to look at, so said, but abounding in many interesting features. After reaching the summit of Prau Mountain a descent of a hundred feet has to be made into the dreary valley of the Dieng, a valley measuring about a mile in circumference and shut in by a semicircle of black, jagged, irregular hills. Here on its marshy area, among scattered blocks of stone, lie the ruins of five small temples, built with hewn slabs or stone and sparsely ornamented with rude carvings. A broken causeway in the rear of these shattered memorials of an ancient creed leads to a larger temple on the brow of the hill, and thence the path leads along to the shallow milky basin of the Tologo Lin, a small caldron of water which is eternally seething and bubbling under the influence of volcanic heat and emitting dense clouds of steam. Just beyond, at the extremity of a dark hollow, the earth throws off a considerable amount of carbonic-acid gas. It is usual for the native guide to prove the deleterious quality of this gas at the cost of the lives of two chickens. When thrown into the fatal chasm the head and neck of the victims are suddenly convulsed, and, flapping their wings in agony, they roll over and expire.

It is stated that the Javanese, when in a state of despair, resort there to decide their fate. They lie down near the lake to pass the night, and if they live until morning they take it for granted that a favorable turn in their affairs is just ahead. But if they chance to expire from the effects of the gas through the night the man's death is attributed to the vengeance of Pangooroo, an evil spirit.

Another of these volcanic lakes is Chondero di Mocco. It covers but about twenty feet of space, and is, in fact, a small pool of boiling water, with an outlet into a small rill which winds around like a line of vapor. In the center the water rises in three or four jets about five feet high, and throws around a spray of boiling water. The banks consist of a soft, hot mud, sulphurious deposits, and small blocks of limestone which, in course of time, have been ejected by the restless waters of the boiling pool.

About a mile in an opposite direction beyond Dieng lies the Talogo Warno, a many-colored, reed-fringed lake, at the base of the Brambanan Mountains, and about nine hundred feet in length. Here the waters gleam with all the colors of the rainbow, a bright yellow at one point and an emerald green at another; here a beautiful azure and there a delicate rose; there orange and milky white—all these hues blending and merging into each other as softly and gradually as the tints of a hummingbird's plumage. The cause of this extraordinary phenomenon is not given, but probably it arises from certain qualities in the water or in the soil, as it cannot arise from the atmosphere, as the atmosphere is the same over that spot as all around it.

Another hot, muddy valley is at Kawa Kiwung. Here the water is constantly kept at the boiling heat by the heat below. Everywhere in the vicinity the ground is impregnated with sulphur, and sulphurious gases exude from the same into the air. Boiling springs seethe and hiss in almost every hollow. Under the surface is heard a continuous reverberation, as if the earth were in the throes of mortal agony. Those who believe in the existence of the kingdoms of Old Nick have but to visit this locality to feel pretty sure that they have found it. They will feel as the Dutchman did when he stopped to water his horses at a noted hot springs in our country. He was thunderstruck to find the water was hot, and immediately called out to his son who was driving, "O Shon, Shon, drive on mit all your might, for pe sure, Shon, hell is not one mile from this place."

ANTIQUITIES OF JAVA.

Java, like many of the other countries I have visited, seems to be able to boast of antiquities. At Singha Sari, situated at the threshold of a venerable wood, are the ruins of six principal structures of hewn stone, and also the base of a circular tower. Here are numerous large and small figures, with various fragments of sculpture and statuary scattered around in all directions. Three of these structures are quadrangular temples, rising by successive stages to a topmost shrine, which contains several large statues more or less defaced. The ground plan of the largest temple measures 93x36 feet. They are without piazzas, but along the sides are carved ornamental markings, and niches and pedestals for statues, and some figures in alto-relievo.

Two of the other buildings are in similar style, but smaller in size, and are thought to have been designed for tombs. The sixth structure consists merely of two solid blocks of half-ruined masonry, and were perhaps a part of the gateway opening into the sacred inclosure. On each side stands a colossal figure—one a male and the other a female—of bulky proportions and savage aspect, scantily attired, and each wreathed around with a huge serpent. They kneel on one knee, with the breast and body leaning on the other, while one hand rests on a large square-headed club, elaborately carved. The right hand of the male figure is lifted and turned outward, with two or three fingers erect, as if forbidding the approach of an intruder, or to command silence. Each figure wears a sort of crown. The eyeballs protrude as if in anger; deep frowns with sunken lines mark the forehead, and from each side of the mouth inclines downward a large tusk. The male figure is twelve feet high. Each figure is sculptured out of the solid rock—a close-grained, grey, porphyritic trachyte. The workmanship is admirable, every line being cleanly and smoothly cut, while all the folds of the skin are artistically presented. A beautiful bull is also carved in stone, being about four feet long. Here are human figures with elephants' heads, an admirably wrought fragment of a chariot drawn by several horses abreast, and the figures of Hindoo deities, each three-headed, or four-handed, and with several pairs of arms.

There can be but little doubt that these temples and statues are Hindoo, though it is thought they show a degree of refinement and delicacy which is deficient in many Indian mythologic sculptures. It cannot be told at what date this work was executed, but that they are works of considerable antiquity is admitted; and it is a question what has become of the Hindoos who composed the colony at that time. If they remained here they have become so incorporated with the Malays as to be no longer traceable.

It is justly claimed that the ruling minds which selected the site of these temples must have been inspired by lofty sympathies and have possessed as keen a sense of the beauties of nature as any Hellenic philosopher or priest. The antiquities are remarkable, and so is the scenery by which they are surrounded. They occupy the summit of a knoll, which overlooks the broad plain-valley of Malang. On the right hand, toward the southwest, rises the picturesque group of the Kawi hills, whence a grassy but broken and ragged ridge extends northward to the mighty mass of Mount Arjuno, which, with its peaked summit and wooded declivities, occupies all the northwestern quarter of the horizon. Through a low gap in the north access is obtained to the surf-beaten line of the northern coast, with its populous towns and ample harbors. Toward the east is the gigantic ridge of the Tongger, with all its spires and pinnacles and pyramids, gradually increasing in elevation until it reaches its loftiest points in the noble colossal forms of the Bromo and the Ider-Ider, from which it curves gracefully toward the southeast and the beautiful cone of the Semiru. The chord of this magnificent amphitheater, or the distance from Semiru to the Kawi, cannot be less than forty miles in length, and is formed by low undulating ridges, which shine in the full glory of the tropical sun.

There was undoubtedly a time when the temples were frequented; when Hindoo priests stood there and ministered. All the country round is studded with busy cities, adorned with palaces, echoing with the hum of active life. The vision of a Hindoo kingdom, once powerful and opulent and civilized, which flourished for centuries in this beautiful Java, rises before the beholder. That such a kingdom did exist cannot be doubted; its traces are seen in the ruins scattered over the surface of the Malang valley, in the huge piles of brick now half concealed among the forests, in the ancient causeways still used as the principal roads of the country, and in the remains of the massive walls which stretch from the southern side of Mount Kawi to the sea, fortifying the valley of Kediri, and thus protecting the chief access to the plain of Malang from the west. These structures are far beyond the capabilities of the present native population of Jarva, at least without Eurpean aid, and point unmistakably to the existence of a people here among whom the arts and sciences had made much progress. Yet the history of this people is wholly unknown, as well as the calamities which befell them. This may all have occurred five hundred years ago, a thousand, or more.

Mr. Crawford, in his history of the Indian archipelago, describes the ruins of Java as consisting of temples, images, and inscriptions, and the first-named he divides into four classes: First, large groups of small temples, of hewn stone, each occupied by a statue; second, single temples of great size, of hewn stone, consisting of a series of inclosures, the whole occupying the summit of a hill, and without any concavity or excavation; third, single temples, constructed of brick and mortar, with an excavation similar to the individual temples of the first class; and fourth, rude temples, of hewn stone, of more recent construction than any of the rest. To these particulars may be added a notice of the ruins of Brambanan, which are situated almost in the center of the island, between the native capitals of Djokokerta and Surakerta. Here are found the temples of Loro-Jongran and Chandi-Sewa. The former comprises six large and fourteen small temples. They are now a mass of broken ruins, but it is thought the largest were not less than ninety feet in hight. All were built of solid stone, profusely decorated with carvings and bas reliefs, and adorned with numerous statues, many of which remain entire. The group at Chandi Sewa, or the "one thousand temples," occupies an oblong area measuring six hundred feet in length and five hundred and fifty feet in breadth. This area is covered with five rows of temples; in the outer row, eighty-four; in the second, seventy-six; in the third, sixty-four; in the fourth, forty-four; while the fifth forms an inner parallelogram of twenty-eight temples. Each temple is pyramidal in structure, and consists of large blocks of hewn stone. Each of the smaller ones contained a figure of Buddha, and the chief and central buildings figures of the principal objects of Hindoo worship, all of colossal size and admirable execution.

In reference to these sculptures and decorations, Mr. Crawford remarks that: "First, the scenery, the figures, the faces, and costumes are not native, but those of western India. In the human figures, the faces are characterized by the strongest features of the Hindoo countenance. Many of these are even seen with bushy beards, an ornament of the face denied by nature to all the Indian islanders. The loins are seen girt after the manner now practiced in India, a custom unknown to the Javanese, or any other people of the archipelago. The armor worn is not less characteristic. The spear, the kris, and the blow-pipe for discharging the poisoned arrow, in all ages the weapons of the Indian islanders, are nowhere delineated in the temples; but, instead of them, we have the straight sword and shield, the bow and arrow, and the club. The combatants, when mounted, are conveyed in cars or on elephants—both these modes of conveyance of foreign custom, for the elephant is not a native of Java, and the nature of the country precluded the use of wheeled carriages. Second, there is not a gross, indecent, or licentious representation throughout, and very little, indeed, of what is grotesque or absurd; and third, we discover no very pointed nor very distinct allusion in the scriptures to the more characteristic and unequivocal features of Hindooism."

VOLCANO WORSHIP.

D'Almeida, in "Life in Java," gives an account of the form of worship paid to Bromoke, one of the largest volcanoes on the island. As almost everything else in nature has by some people been worshiped as a god, perhaps there is equally good reasons for worshiping a volcano. It is surely one of the grandest and most imposing of the phenomena in nature, and to those who are worshipfully inclined it may be an appropriate object of adoration. I draw from D'Almeida. This volcano is situated some three miles from the town of Tosari, and forming one of the chain of green wooded hills and mountains among which it rises a barren cone, crowned by volumes of smoke and vapor. Its ascent has been frequently accomplished. The path leads up extensive slopes covered with a tall, yellow grass to the Mungal, an enormous extinct crater, reported to be the largest in the world. Here is easily observed a cluster of mountains something more than two miles away, the foremost of which is Batok—that is, "the Bald," from its barren summit, for its declivities are well clothed with herbage. It is conically shaped, and its sides are marked with deep grooves, showing the course taken by the lava streams in its whilom period of activity. To the right, a little in the rear, extends the sharp-pointed chain of the Dedari and Widadaren, or "dwelling of fairies;" while on the left, wreathed about with smoke-clouds, which partly conceal its bulk, groans the Bromok, a dark and dreary object in a picture of surpassing brightness.

The track now descends into the crater, and crosses its sandy floor; the Dasar—or as it is appropriately called, the "Sandy Sea"—where not a tree or shrub is visible, and the only signs of vegetation are a few patches of dried and scrubby grass. The surface, moreover, is curiously corrugated or ridged, like the sea sand at the ebb of tide, and the whole landscape is as full of gloom as the waters of the African Sahara.

The form of the Bromok is that of a truncated cone. From one of its sides project numerous singular masses, or mounds of mud and sand, incrusted in a baked clay like red lava. Some of these mounds have been wasted by the tropical rains, which have channeled the sandy sea with deep, broad fissures; while others, still supplied with liquid matter from the volcanoes, are encroaching on the Dasar, and covering that portion of it in the immediate neighborhood of the crater. Embodied in these mounds are large blocks of lime and ironstone; also large black stones veined like marble and glittering like granite. These, as well as the scoria, which abound in every direction, are supposed to have been ejected at the last eruption of the volcano.

On ascending to the summit of the ridge, and gazing into the abyss of the crater, one is filled with awe and wonder. The reality before him far surpasses in horror the most frightful of the scenes which Dante has drawn in his Inferno. Terrific sounds like groans and shrieks and yells issue from those depths, while a yawning pit in the center belches out dense volumes of sulphurous smoke. The inner crater forms a large basin about three hundred and fifty feet in diameter, with irregular, broken sides, descending to a depth of two hundred and fifty feet. The sides, as well as the bottom, are sulphurous matter. Such is the Bromok. Let us now join the procession of pilgrims to visit this terrible place of worship.

The scene presented on such an occasion by the Sandy Sea is a striking contrast to its ordinary appearance of desolation. Groups of pilgrims are scattered over its surface; some eating, some praying, others singing, laughing, talking, chaffering. Men are selling and finding a ready sale for amulets, charms, and volcanic stones, which are vouched to be remedies for every human ill. Provisions of all kinds are abundant, and are displayed for sale on roughly constructed stands—a plank or two supported on stout poles. Wodonos and mantries, with their small suite of followers, parade up and down, gaily dressed, their burnished krisses glittering amidst the folds of their sarong. Old men and old women, who have come to pay their last respects to the awful shrine, are moving feebly along. They watch with eyes of delight the frolics of their grandchildren, for there seems no end of juveniles, from the screaming babe in arms to the romping child.

About twenty mats are ranged in a row at one part of the Sandy Sea, and on each a young priest kneels, having before him a box of myrrh, aloes, frankincense, and other spices, which are sold for offerings. At right angles run another row, with the same number of priests, all kneeling in the Arab fashion, their bodies sitting back and resting on the calves of the legs. These are older than the former group, and may be regarded as the patriarchs of their respective villages. Behind each stands a payong-bearer, shading his master from the sun by a large umbrella. Their dress consists of a white gown, worn over the sarong, which is fastened to the waist by a broad red belt. Over the soulders depend two bands of yellow silk, bound with scarlet, with tassels of gold coins flaunting from the ends. A large turban, adorned with gay silken scarfs, forms the headdress. In front of each priest are spread small baskets made of plantain leaves, containing incense, sandalwood chips, and other preparations; wooden censers, throwing forth jets of aromatic smoke, and vessels of plaited rattan for holding water.

At a short distance from the priests gathers the motley crowd, waiting for the consecrated offerings, which have been deposited on bamboo stands. These consist of cocoanuts, plantains, pineapples, mangoes, and other fruit; of baskets of recently fledged chickens; of trays loaded with all kinds of cakes; of strips of silk and calico; and coins of gold, silver, and copper.

Some minutes having been spent in prayer, each priest dips his goupillon or cup into the vessel of water before him, mutters a few unintelligible words, and sprinkles the offerings as they are brought to him. Then all the holy men bow their heads and repeat a prayer in a loud and distinct voice. The oldest rises up, followed in succession by his sacerdotal companions, uttering words sounding like "Ayo, ayo, Bromok," meaning "Forward, forward, to the Bromok." At this signal the whole multitude hastens to the edge of the crater, and he who first gains the ridge believes himself the favorite of fortune and certain to have "good luck." Every now and then some of the older priests come to a halt, spread their mats, and prostrate themselves in prayer for five or ten minutes, thus earning a reputation for special saintliness, and at the same time securing an interval of rest—two pretty good-sized birds brought down with one stone.

The summit of the volcano being gained, the various families and individuals again present their offerings to the priests, who, after mumbling over them a few additional words, tumble them down the crater, each person repeating some prayer or wish; and so the ceremony of worshiping Bromok in concluded. The crowd then descends from the volcano to indulge in a variety of games and pastimes; and towards evening everybody returns home, and the Sea of Sand regains its normal aspect of dreariness and solitude.

MATTERS OF GENERAL INTEREST.

Owing to its mountainous character Java has no navigable rivers; but it is watered by many shallow streams, which carry brightness and fertility along with them in their rapid course. These may be ascended some distance with the boats of the natives; but only the Solo, Kediri, Tjemanock, and Tjearoun are open to vessels of any considerable burthen.

Much of the charm of Javanese landscape of course lies in the extraordinary richness of its vegetation, which clothes every valley side and every mountain hight with masses of diversified foliage. This richness cannot be wondered at when the presence of such quantities of decomposed volcanic rock, with limestone and sandstone, is remembered, and that it is abundantly watered by frequent rains, and that the climate exhibits a remarkable range of temperature. At an elevation of 6,000 feet the thermometer does not rise above sixty degrees; in the plains, during the day, it ascends from eighty-five to ninety-four degrees; and during the night, from seventy-three to eighty degrees. The character of the natural products of the island is necessarily affected by this variation of temperature. On the plains and moist warm valleys the growth of the tropics are profuse, while on breezy mountain hights are the products of the temperate zone. The coast, which in some places is fringed with coral reefs, is generally lined with feathery groves of cocoanut-trees. Inland spread vast fields of rice, extending up the sides of the hills and irrigated by a multitude of artificial water-courses. Two or three crops of this are made per year. Hedges and fences of fruit trees here and there inclose the Javanese villages, in which the huts are built of bamboo, and with their high-pitched roofs and quaint construction. The white buildings and tall chimney of a sugar mill occasionally diversify the prospect; the open fields are skirted by rows of bamboos, and the straight and well-kept roads run through monotonous avenues of tamarind-trees. At each mile is a queer little wooden guard-house where a policeman is stationed, who communicates with his fellow policemen by means of a gong; and the dim of that discordant instrument frequently arouses the echoes of the quiet country. The coffee crops are chiefly cultivated on the moderate hills, not on the plains nor the mountain tops.

At some distance inland are the remains of several deserted cities now given over to the wild bull and tiger, and in the wild recesses of the forest still are found an occasional colossal statue of a god or one of the ancient temples like those already described. Once is found a dome fifty feet in diameter and surrounded by a triple circle of seventy-two towers, covering with its terraced walls the entire slope of a hill. Such magnificent specimens of human industry and of ancient science are seldom crowded together in so small a compass. The building is six hundred and twenty feet square and one hundred feet in hight. The terrace walls are adorned with four hundred niches, each containing a cross-legged figure larger than life, and with a succession of bas-reliefs carved in stone, occupying in all an extent of three miles.

The terrace cultivation practiced here is worthy of notice. The slopes of the valleys and their branches are being everywhere cultivated in terraces, as in Ceylon, up to a considerable hight, which, as they wend round the flanks of the hills, produce all the effect of stately amphitheaters. Hundreds of square miles of country are thus terraced, and, as has been remarked, convey a striking idea of the industry of the people and the antiquity of their civilization. These platforms are annually extended as the population increases, the inhabitants of each village worksing in concert under the direction of their chief; and it is by this system of village-culture that such immense areas of terrace and irrigating canals have been rendered possible.

Let us look a little more at the vegetation of the mountain ranges. Tne bases are covered with vast forests of different species of the fig-tree tribe, some of which seem allied to the Indian banyan. All are interlaced and bound together by creepers and trailing parasites, and are remarkable for their immense hight, "so that their over-arching foliage glimmers like a green mist—their milky sap, their fruit, and their far-spreading branches." At about the same hight above the sea grow noble trees of different families, and with almost unpronounceable names—their boughs embellished with fantastic orchids, and their trunks covered with such parasites as pepper, mistletoe, loroanthus, nepenthes, pothos, etc., while in among the low undergrowth rise grand aborescent ferns of surpassing beauty. Here are found the vaquois-tree, a species of pandanus or screw-pine, but in stature and character resembling the palms. Higher up are the palm-like liquid ambers, their tall and stately stems clasped round by tenacious parasites; also rattans and rubiaceæ, some of the latter, however, offending the air with a noxious, fetid odor. From a hight of five thousand feet is passed through a truly virgin forest, the trees being as tall as the highest masts, and surrounded by a dense growth of herbaceous plants, tree-ferns, and shrubby vegetation. Of the ferns the variety seems inexhaustable, as many as three hundred species having been found on one mountain. Next in course the chestnuts and oaks are reached, rhododendrons, the dammar pine, numerous species of glossy-leaved laurels, sweet-scented myrtles, gorgeous magnolias, melastomas, eugenias, while through the verdurous gloom flashes the silver of a leaping and tumbling brook, and brightness is given to the scene by the splendid foliage of the broad-leaved musaceæ and zingiberaceæ, with their curious and resplendent flowers. The new forms of growth which constantly meet the eye are enough to tire it with their endless variety, and it is impossible to fully appreciate it as it discovers such a wonderful profusion of luxurious vegetation.

At six thousand feet raspberries abound, and thence to the summit of the lofty mountains three species of edible rubus (raspberry and blackberry) are found. At seven thousand feet cypresses appear, and here the forest trees lose somewhat their stateliness of character, and mosses and lichens take the place of the ferns and lycopods. From this point upward they increase rapidly, so that the blocks of rock and scoria that compose the mountain slope are completely hidden by the mossy vegetation. The pretty heaths, especially the white-haired vacciniæ, are also abundant. At eight hundred feet the landscape becomes European or American, and one can see such familiar acquaintances as the honeysuckles, St. John's wort, and Guilder-rose. At nine thousand feet is found the rare and lovely cowslip (primula imperialis), which is peculiar to Java. It has a tall, stout stem, sometimes more than three feet in hight; it bears several whorls of cowslip flowers instead of a terminal cluster like those of Europe. The forest trees, gnarled and dwarfed to the size of mere bushes, creep up to the very rim of the mountain crater, while thickets of shrubbery, artemesias and gnaphaliums, growing six feet high, are abundant. Here also are buttercups, violets, whortleberries, and, not to be omitted, sow-thistles, chickweed, white and yellow crosswort, plantain, and annual grasses.

Mr. Wallace furnishes the following explanation of the extraordinary fact that on lonely mountain peaks in an island close to the equator should bloom a vegetation so closely similar to that of Europe, while in the plains below, and all the lowlands for thousands of miles around, thrives a flower of a totally different character. The violet and the wood sorrel of the English woods adorn the lofty volcano cone, at the base of which flourishes the fig-tree or the cocoanut palm. Thus in the course of a few thousand feet the traveler seems to pass, as it were, from the latitude of the rich tropical islands to that of the soberer European vales and pastures. It is said that the peak of Teneriffe, though it rises to a greater hight and is nearer Europe than any of the Javanese mountains, contains no such Alpine flora; neither do the mountains of Bourbon and Mauritius. The case of the volcanic peaks of Java is, therefore, to a certain extent, exceptional; but, as Prof. Wallace observes, there are several analogous, if not exactly parallel, cases that will assist in obtaining an understanding how the phenomena may have been brought about. For instance, the higher peaks of the Alps, and even of the Pyrenees, contain a number of plants absolutely identical with those of Lapland not to be discovered in the intervening plains. On the summit of the White Mountains, in our own country, every plant is identical with species growing in Labrador.

Now not one of these cases can be explained by a reference to the ordinary methods in which seeds are carried from place to place. Most of the plants yield seeds so heavy that the wind could not possibly transport them such immense distances; and the agency of birds is out of the question when the immense elevation at which the plants are found is remembered. In the face of such difficulties, some naturalists have put forward the theory that these species were all separately created twice over on these distant peaks. This is not a very wild theory, perhaps, if the idea of a special creation is only set aside. The same causes that produce a given result in any one case will produce like results again when all the conditions are the same. So that the causes that produced a certain plant on the White Mountains, under precisely the same conditions would produce the same plant in Labrador. Why not? But another explanation, and perhaps the true one, is found in the existence of the Glacial age—an age when the mountains of Wales and other parts of the globe were covered with those huge ice-rivers called glaciers, and the mountainous parts of Central Europe, and much of America north of the great lakes, were dreary regions of ice and snow, with a climate resembling that of Labrador and Greenland at the present day. In that age all the countries referred to must necessarily have borne an Arctic flora. As the Glacial period passed away, and the ice and snow receded up the mountain slopes, or retired toward the North Pole, the plants also receded, "always clinging as now to the margins of the perpetual snow-line," above which snow never melts. The Glacial period theory hardly shows that plants or their seeds were conveyed from the White Mountains to Labrador, but the fair inference is that a similar climate, in a similar atmosphere—in short, similar causes all around, produced the same result in one place as the other. It is not to be supposed that all vegetable life originated in one germ, or that animal life all sprang from one germ, or that even all plants or animals of the same class, order, genera, or species must necessarily come from one germ or one beginning. Nature is abundantly able to repeat her operations, and there is no reason why the same plant or the same animal should have been brought into existence in hundreds of places. It is absurd to think that the Western hemisphere was dependent for vegetable and animal life upon "seed" obtained from the Eastern hemisphere, or the Southern upon the Northern.

The same causes must, under the same circumstances and the same laws, always produce the same effects. When all the conditions are favorable for inorganic matter to produce low forms of organic life, that result will be sure to take place; and in that view of the case it is no more wonderful for grass to be produced and to grow in Patagonia than in Greenland, and the same with all vegetable and animal forms of life. All are the result of natural causes, acting under favorable conditions; and when those causes and conditions exist they will be very likely to act.

It may be said with respect to the Javanese flora that many of the genera are identical with those of Europe, but not the species. Prof. Wallace explains it in this way: "During the greatest severity of the Glacial age 'temperate forms' of plants will have found their way to the confines of the tropics; but on its departure they would, of course, retreat up the southern mountains in quest of the climatic conditions necessary for their existence. But in such circumstances, and owing to the lapse of time that must have taken place, many of the plants would undergo such modifications as to become distinct species." Darwin also treats the subject in a similar way and at much length in his "Origin of Species."

Another objection, according to Prof. Wallace, may be urged that "a wide expanse of sea between Java and the continent would effectually prevent the immigration of temperate forms of plants during the Glacial epoch." But to this objection the reply is made that the former connection of Java with Asia is proved by abundant evidence. "The most striking proof of such a junction is that the great mammalia of Java, the rhinoceros, the tiger, and the banting, or wild ox, occur also in Siam and Burmah, and these certainly could not have been introduced by man. The Javanese peacock and several other birds are also common in these two countries; but in the majority of cases the species are distinct, though closely allied, indicating that a considerable time (required for such modification) has elapsed since the separation, while it has not been so long as to cause an entire change. Now this exactly corresponds with the time we should require since the temperate forms of plants entered Java. These are almost now distinct species; but the changed conditions under which they are now forced to exist, and the probability of some of them having since died out on the continent of India, sufficiently account for the Javanese species being different."

I have perhaps already said enough about the animals and birds of Java, but I will detain you enough longer to give the names of the most abundant varieties. The number of Javanese mammals is one hundred. Among these are the rhinoceros, tiger-cat, panther, royal tiger, wild hog (two varieties), napa, or musk deer, wild ox, gibbon, and numerous other apes; lemur (two kinds); of bats a great number, the largest of which measure seven feet across the wings, and live principally on fruit; civets (two kinds).

Of the feathered tribes there the Javan peacock, measuring often seven feet in length (including tail, of course), thrushes, flock-birds, jungle-fowls, king-fishers, hornbills, lorikeets, woodpeckers, etc. There seem to be no very fine singers among them, but everything must not be expected of one island.

I will not attempt to give you much of the history of Java, and for two reasons; the first is I do not know very much about it, and the next because I do not suppose you would care very much about it if I did. The Dutch came in possession of it somewhere about the year 1600, not far from the time when they were so busily extending their enterprise and possessions here in the East, and they held it in peace till the time when Holland allied herself with the fortunes of Napoleon, when the English became not only the enemies of France but Holland as well, and during that time took Java from the French and Dutch. But England held the island but six years—from 1810 to 1816, when, after Napoleon was sent to Helena to die, by a treaty Java was given back to the Dutch. She, however, did not return Ceylon nor the cape settlements in the south of Africa, which were originally Dutch settlements. The Transvaal is especially Dutch, and the Boers who recently withstood England so valiantly are the descendants of the Dutch settlers.

Holland has found much profit in Java; the soil is so fertile, and the climate so favorable, that abundant crops are produced. The land is all held by the government, and the natives are required to pay a large rental. The government is heavy upon them in the way of taxation. The larger share of the land is rented out by the government to natives and planters on terms of seventy-five years, during which time the lease for the unexpired time can be transferred. Besides a heavy rent to the government, the Dutch have to pay the taxes, which are by no means light, all amounting to so much that the natives are to some extent precluded from being tillers of the soil; to such extent, at least, as I am informed, that considerable land lies unoccupied. In this way the avarice of the government defeats itself. The government plants a good deal of land in coffee, the work being done, of course, by natives, but the government is hard upon them. When dealers are paying forty guldens (sixteen dollars of our money) per picul for coffee, the natives are compelled to sell it to the government for fourteen guldens. I think one hundred and twenty-five pounds constitute a picul. The government thus produces coffee valued at 42,000,000 guldens annually, while by private planters it amounts to 24,000,000. The other crops exported are as follows: Sugar, 191,000,000 guldens; tobacco, 11,100,000; tea, 2,600,000; indigo, 365,000. I think considerable rice is exported, but I am not sure. It is grown very extensively, but a very large amount is required for home consumption.

The Java government is wholly appointed by the home government of Holland. The governor-general's term is five years, and his salary is 160,000 guldens per year, besides what he can manage to pick up in other ways. The island is divided into twenty-two provinces or districts, and at the head of each is a "resident" who receives from 15,000 to 20,000 guldens per year, with a certain percentage of the revenue collected. Under these officials the natives are employed in various capacities, so that all laws and communications directly to the natives are done through native intermediates. The natives are said to be very faithful in such charges intrusted to them. The annual profits accruing to the government amount to from ten to twenty million guldens, though within the last year or two depressed prices of coffee, etc., has reduced this sum not a little.

The military force on the island is about 15,000, one-third of whom are Europeans, the balance native troops. The Dutch pursue a different course from the English by mixing the Europeans in all the regiments, so there is no regiment but what has about one-third Dutch or Europeans, and in this way danger from mutiny is greatly averted. Had the English pursued this course in India the mutiny of 1857 would hardly have taken place. I think the Dutch place themselves more on an equality with the natives than the English are fond of doing. The English are prouder and more haughty than the Dutch, and though they afford quite as good a government for the natives as do the Dutch they are less loved by the natives.

I was surprised to learn the population of Java is nearly 20,000,000. I did not suppose it contained so many people. The Chinese in the island amount to 206,000; Europeans, 33,000; Arabs, 10,500; scattering, 3,000, while all the rest are Malays, more or less mixed, called Javanese. In Batavia there are 5,000 Europeans, 10,000 Chinese, and probably more than 100,000 Malays, besides Arabs, etc.

The people of Batavia are rather a contented-looking people, and all seem busily occupied in some employment. The Chinese seem to have the largest share of the business in their hands. The few Europeans have the heaviest shipping business to attend to, with some of the better stores, such as book stores, music stores, watchmakers, drug stores, etc., but the Chinese have nearly all the rest. I see here many manufacturing shops similar to what I saw in Penang; furniture is largely manufactured, and I cannot see but what the chairs, tables, wardrobes, book-cases, sofas, etc., made by the Chinese are as well made as they are by the Americans. They are certainly good mechanics. I see the Chinese coolies delivering furniture in all parts of the town. Four of them take a long and large wardrobe on two bamboo poles, or a large bedstead, and transport it two or three miles. I see much furniture thus delivered. The Chinese are the building contractors, doing all the more particular branches of the mechanical work, and hiring the Malays to do the heavier and coarser parts. I notice many Chinese shoe shops, harness makers, tinners, etc. I see here also a great variety of wares being carried about the town on the shoulders, balancing on spring poles. Vegetables, fruit, fish, etc., are largely carried in this way, and mostly by the Malays. I cannot help feeling sorry for them to see them tugging along nearly naked in the hot sun with a load upon their shoulders heavy enough for a horse to draw; but they do not seem to mind it, hundreds of them passing at a good speed in all directions. They have several kinds of fruit thus carried about here that are quite new to me. Several of them seem somewhat like mandrakes in our country, only sweeter and more juicy. One kind, called rambatams, has a red case or rind like an orange, but with soft thorns or spurs, somewhat like a chestnut burr, only so limber as not to prick; this is taken off, and the inside is a sweet, mucilaginous fruit, with a seed inside about the size of a plum stone. Another kind, called mangosteens, has a somewhat similar rind, an eighth of an inch in thickness, but smooth on the exterior. The inside is in separate divisions with a seed in some of the parts. This is very sweet and rich. There are several other kinds still more like mandrakes, but I do not remember their names. I see some oranges, but they are not in season now. I saw a very large fruit somewhat like an orange, but fully four times as large, which is coarser than an orange, but is considerably used. Bananas and pineapples are abundant. Some of the fruit is very cheap, half a peck being sold for a few cents. Here the gulden is divided into a hundred cents, which require two and a half to equal our cents.

The town covers a great deal of ground, being some eight miles from the bund, or landing, to the southern extremity. A tramway, or horse railroad, runs the entire distance, but the cars are heavy and clumsy. The whole town is permeated with canals, supplied from a river from the mountains fifty miles or so away. The streets and canals are side by side, and at all hours of the day, but most in the morning, hundreds of the Malays are to be seen taking their bath in the canals, though it is about the muddiest looking water I have seen. I had thought the Missouri the most turbid of all streams, but it is considerably discounted in turbidness by the water here. The soil is a red, alluvial formation, and imparts great color to the water. At intervals of one or two hundred feet stone steps lead down to the water. On these steps clothes are washed and thrashed. The male bathers have simply a waist-cloth, while the female bathers have a piece of calico some three yards in length, which passes around the body under the arms. They seem very fond of bathing, remaining in half an hour or more and disporting themselves like playful mermaids. The Malays are not nearly so spare as the Hindoos, having sufficient flesh upon their bones and of a much lighter color, though it may be called a brown or copper color.

There are but two or three points in Batavia where business seems to be concentrated. In one part of the town, probably the older part, near the landing where the shipping is attended to, are some very deep stores, say two hundred feet, where heavy wholesale stocks are carried; and in two or three other places the stores and shops are compact and close together, as in other cities; but, as a rule, the stores, like the dwellings, stand apart and back from the street. The dwellings, ealled bungalows, especially of the Europeans, are white cottages of one tall story, with a high Dutch tile-roof, with a wide verandah all around, over which the roof extends, thus affording an abundance of shade. The roof over the verandah is flatter than the other part, giving a curved or concave appearance to the roofs, rather pleasant in appearances. These houses are mainly built of stone, plastered over and white-washed. Some of the residences are fine-looking mansions of imposing hight, with columns in front of the main porch or portico. In the aristocratic parts of the town, and around the King's Plains—a square of some three hundred acres—are some fine-looking public buildings and private residences. The homes of the poor natives are decidedly more humble, and usually constructed of bamboo, which grows abundantly on the island. Many of the Chinese who have made money have fine residences, situated back from the street, with a fine court in front. At night the showy entrances are lighted up by large Chinese lanterns, and might be mistaken for theaters, hotels, or something of the kind.

THE BATAVIA MUSEUM.

I twice visited the museum in Batavia, and found it an interesting study, being a collection of antiquities and curiosities pertaining almost entirely to this part of the world, first of Java, then Sumatra, Borneo, and the neighboring islands. The collection embraces specimens of weapons of war, including spears, swords, knives, bows, and arrows, with guns of ancient pattern, musical instruments of many kinds, some of them pretty rude, including string instruments, drums and, gongs of enormous size; a great number of artistic manufactures, including inlaid work of various kinds, metal-work with inscriptions, wood-work with carvings; articles of domestic use, cloths, garments, styles of houses and boats, coins, thrones, crowns, royal jewelry inlaid with precious stones, and, last but not least, a thousand gods of all sizes and patterns from three inches in length to the size of a man, some made of metal, many of wood, and far more of stone. Some are Hindoo gods, including Brahma, Vishnu, Siva, Ganesha, Christna, Kali, etc. The larger portion are gods which I did not recognize are probably peculiar to these islands. Had I not already met with many thousand gods this lot would have been a decided curiosity; and they were as it was, for the variety is very extensive, and these island gods are in some respects different from those on the main-land. Some of them are crude productions for human beings to get up; but that is a general characteristic of all the gods; come to think of it, there is hardly one among them all that will bear close inspection. When accurately represented they are horrible looking monsters, and their moral character if no better than their external appearance. They are a bad lot altogether.

I saw in the museum some implements of torture

THE TRUTH SEEKER.

D. M. BENNETT, EDITOR.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY AT $3.00 PER YEAR.

The largest and cheapest Radical Journal published in Europe or America, containing seven hundred square inches more reading matter than any other journal of its kind.

NEW YORK SATURDAY, JULY 22, 1882.

Approaching His Journey's End.

As will be seen from the following letters, Mr. Bennett is almost in sight.

DUBUQUE, IOWA, July 11, 1882.

DEAR EUGENE: I had a very pleasant ride from Council Bluffs eastward on the 7th inst., thinking Iowa about the prettiest country, with the most good land to the square mile, that I had seen in the entire circuit of the globe. At 9:40 in the evening I arrived at Cedar Rapids; and though but one person had been notified—and that on the same day—of my approach, some thirty or forty TRUTH SEEKER friends were in waiting for me at the station and gave me a hearty welcome. They escorted me to the Grand Hotel, in the parlors of which a friendly meeting of an hour and a half was kept up. Several expressed the desire that I would stop over one day and speak to them in the evening. My engagements, however, to the north would not admit of it.

On the following morning I took the train on the Burlington road northward to Shell Rock. Friends were in waiting for me at the depot, and escorted me to the residence of Mr. Malcolm Fisher. On the next morning, Sunday, I was conveyed to Waverly, some eight miles distant, where Col. M. E. Billings took charge of me, and in his carriage conveyed me eighteen miles to the residence of one of my early patrons, George Watts, where a regular meeting of the League of northern Iowa was held in a pleasant grove, presided over by its worthy president, M. Farrington. A shower coming up somewhat inopportunely we deemed it best to repair to the neighboring school-house, where the meeting was concluded. Speeches were made by the president, followed by the secretary, M. E. Billings, who introduced your humble servant. I detained them with my desultory remarks over an hour, after which a few others spoke. This is a live, activ League, meeting every two weeks, and in different localities. Some two hundred were present, among whom were quite a number of TRUTH SEEKER patrons, who commenced when the paper started in Paris, Illinois, and hav stood steadfastly by it since through both good and ill report. The meeting was a glad one on all sides. I returned to Waverly, and on the following night spoke in the Opera House, being introduced by Col. M. E. Billings. After the meeting I took train for this point to once more see my highly esteemed friend, D. R. Burt, who has nearly reached his eightieth year. I hav had a good visit with him, and hav seen several Liberal friends. Several urge me to stop over and speak to them, but time will not permit. I must hurry on and fill other engagements. From here I take train this afternoon for Clinton county, Iowa. As I approach home I grow more and more impatient to reach it. I am receiving pressing invitations to visit friends at various points, but I am compelled to decline them. Yours truly, D. M. B.

CHICAGO, ILL., July 15, 1882.

DEAR EUGENE: After leaving Dubuque on the evening of the 11th I proceeded down the river via Clinton, and then west to Grand Mound. Mr. Leroy Dutton and others met me at the station, and Mr. Dutton accompanied me to Wheatland, where I was very kindly received by Mr. Jerome Dutton, his family, and several other friends, with whom I had a most agreeable visit. The following day I passed with Leroy, Flora, Lorenzo, and Charles Dutton, with several other friends of Grand Mound, whom I was glad to meet, and who seemed glad to see me. I hav several invitations to speak at Wheatland, Grand Mound, and Detroit, but as time would hav been required for notices to be duly circulated, I deemed it best to not tarry for the purpose. On yesterday morning I turned my face eastward, passing into Illinois on my homeward way. My friend, Otto Wettstein, of Rochelle, Ill., had by letter pressed me to call upon him, and upon arriving there yesterday afternoon I found him waiting for me with a carriage, in which, with his wife and three of his children, we pleasantly rode for two hours through the town and surrounding country. In the evening some thirty or forty very interesting Liberal friends assembled in the parlors of Mr. and Mrs. Wettstein, giving me a pleasant reception. I gave them a sort of parlor talk upon my travels, answering their various questions about foreign countries, etc. The meeting continued till midnight, and was a very pleasant, social time. The Liberals of Rochelle are alive and intelligent.

Leaving that pleasant town this morning, I arrived here in three hours. I hav met many sympathetic friends, who gave me a cordial greeting. My regular reception takes place tomorrow (Sunday) evening. Please announce that Sunday evening of the 23d I will speak at Jackson, Mich., and on the following Sunday evening, the 30th, at Rochester, N. Y. On Monday, the 31st, I hope to be with you.

Yours truly, D. M. B.

Reforming.

The Chicago Inter-Ocean of July 13th contains the following correction of its previous infamous libel. The editor writes us that he had no intention to be unfair toward anyone, and blames the contributor, who, whatever his name may be, is certainly a rascal.

9525.—D. M. BENNETT.—A CORRECTION.

Undoubtedly the article published in "Our Curiosity Shop" some days ago, in answer to an inquiry about Mr. D. M. Bennett, contained several positiv misstatements. Very few of the answers in this department are contributed; when they are, the form, as a rule, indicates the fact, as in No. 9,465, in the Weekly Inter-Ocean of June 1st. In this case the query was referred to a contributor whose wide range of reading, travel, and observation, and prevailing accuracy are quite noteworthy; and the editor, contrary to his usual practice, adopted the contribution as his own, without careful inspection. Both he and the contributor are convinced that the answer calls for a restatement. No one in any way connected with "Our Curiosity Shop" would willingly, for fear or favor, let a misstatement go into it, or let one go uncorrected that by any means slips past its usually well-guarded portal. Since attention was first called to this case, great pains hav been taken to get at the exact facts; and information has been received from many sources; several of these strongly prejudiced for or against Mr. Bennett. The original inquiry was from Mr. James Bighan, of Oketo, Kan., who asked for "a short history for the last three years, of D. M. Bennett, formerly editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, of New York." The following abstract, compiled for the most part from letters and publications written by Mr. Bennett's friends, and confirmed by official records, may be relied on as a correct answer to Mr. Bighan's request, and wherein it directly differs from the former answer, that one is in error. Sometime in 1878 Mr. D. M. Bennett, editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, an organ of the Freethinkers, in response to a decoy letter mailed to him by Anthony Comstock, author of what is commonly known as the "Comstock law for the suppression of obscene literature," sent through the mails a copy of a certain pamphlet written by E. H. Heywood. Immediately thereafter Bennett was arrested on the complaint of Comstock, tried, and convicted of sending obscene literature in the United States mails, in violation of statute. He was sentenced to thirteen months' imprisonment at hard labor in the penitentiary at Albany. His friends in various ways appealed to the public for sympathy for Mr. Bennett on the ground that the pamphlet, although abhorrent to the moral teachings of the great body of our people, could not be properly classed as an obscene book. Petitions signed, it is claimed, by over two hundred thousand persons were presented to the president, asking him to pardon Bennett. This the president, after much hesitation, declined to do, impelled to this course, some say, by Mrs. Hayes and the church element. Mr. Bennett was compelled to serve out his full time, less the deduction made for good behavior. His friends, including many prominent Freethinkers from all parts of the country, stood ready to welcome him back to New York, where they gave him a grand ovation at Chickering Hall, May 2, 1880. Very soon after this he was sent as a delegate to the International Freethinker's Congress, held in Brussels in 1880. Afterward he visited many parts of Europe, and wrote a book which was so well received by his readers that they made up a purse of several thousand dollars, and sent him on a tour around the world, from which he is just returning. His particular friend, Eugene M. Macdonald, of New York city, writes that when at Bombay Mr. Bennett "met Colonel Olcott and Mme. Blavatsky, but did not travel with them nor giv seances, as he is not gifted that way. He has no connection with the Theosophist." The above seem to be the bare facts of this case, and any statements hitherto made in these columns at variance with them we greatly regret.

The Failure of Methodist Missions.

The Catholic World for June has a very spicy paper on the failure of Methodist missions, and more especially in Catholic countries. The writer is evidently a good Catholic who regards the acts of the Protestants in establishing missions in countries the church has hitherto considered her own as very impudent. It is plain from his tone that he would prefer to see the people relapse into paganism than to be dragged to heaven by any other path than the one he and his friends travel. But his spleen serves a good turn by showing how insignificant are the results of all the fuss the Methodists make to get up missionary funds, begging indiscriminately from Sunday-school babies, young and old. The appropriations for Methodist missions for the present year amount to the respectable sum of $752,262. Of this $327,327 go to foreign missions; the rest to domestic missions of various kinds. The foreign missions are divided up among Africa, Central America, South America, China, Germany and Switzerland, Scandinavia, India, Bulgaria and Turkey, Italy, Mexico, and Japan. Of these respectiv fields for missionary zeal and apostolic work China receives the largest apportionment, amounting to $70,357; India comes next with $62,759; then follows Scandinavia with $45,926; Japan, $38,281; Mexico receives $30,000; Italy, $25,000; Central and South America, $13,250. Thus it will be seen that the Methodists kindly set apart $68,250 for the conversion of the Roman Catholic heathen, which is more than they giv to India, ten times more than they bestow on Africa, and only a little less than they devote to the children of the Celestial Empire. Is it possible that they regard the Catholic countries as more benighted than the heathen? It would seem so, and yet they must recollect that the scarlet woman is their mother.

The result of all this expenditure is shown as follows: The children baptized are 676; the adults, 169. There are 19 day-schools with 193 scholars, and 29 Sabbath-schools to accommodate 934 scholars. The churches are 15, with an estimated value of $9,150. The estimated value of the parsonages is $3,450, and of the schools, hospitals, and other property, $40,200. There was collected for the missionary society $185.96; for other benevolent societies, $22.60; for self-support, $650.46; and for church building and repairs, $317.03. The report from central China is in keeping with this. The members number 46 and the probationers 44. There are three churches, with an estimated value of $5,500, while the four parsonages are set down as worth $12,500, the school, hospital, and other property dwindling away to $2,500, and the collections for self-support amounted to precisely 15.92. North China shows but little better. It boasts of 210 members and 151 probationers, with church property worth $11,700, and parsonages worth $33,000. It will be observed that the parsonages are worth nearly three times the churches. The schools and other property are estimated at $12,700, and $130.02 was collected for church support. Thus after thirty-five years' labor all the Methodists, nativ or foreign, in all China do not number two thousand, and for their benefit an appropriation of over seventy thousand dollars was made for the present year.

The Rev. D. W. Chandler, who is in charge of the Hok-Chiang district, is "able to report a little progress in many departments of work." Of another district (Ing-Chung) he writes that he does not expect that "the statistics will show any material increase in any department of work." Of the entire mission in central China Rev. V. C. Hart, the superintendent, reports: "We found at the beginning of 1881 the whole field as destitute of laborers, yea, more destitute than in 1875, when we first formally asked to take up these cities." The Rev. Mr. Bagnall, superintendent of another district, reports: "As the weather permits we go on the streets and to the water-side to sell books and tell of God's free gift." He reports the baptism of only two men within the year. The Rev. Mr. Lowry, superintendent of the mission in north China, concludes his report by saying: "We feel the need of a fresh baptism of the spirit. We are surrounded by discouragements and annoyed by constant vexations, which combine to rob us of our early enthusiasm and zeal."

It will be seen from this that Methodist missionary enterprise in China has been crowned with anything but success, and an apportionment of over seventy thousand dollars is bestowed on things set down as churches, circuits, and so forth that if all were rolled into one would not constitute a respectable country parish. But if this is true of China, what shall be said of Africa, where Methodist missions commenced as far back as 1833? The Rev. J. S. Payne opens in a most dismal strain: "The report of this first of the foreign missions of the Methodist Episcopal church for the year 1881 cannot but fall far short of the deep interest which the work in this section of the world awakened in former years. The work has not been prosecuted with the vigor of those years." The African race has shown itself especially open to the influence of Methodism; yet in all Africa the church numbers only 2,044 full members, with 141 probationers, after fifty years of labor. The value of church property is $33,434. The comparativly small apportionment set apart by the committee for the conversion of the African heathen seems fully justified by the result. The truth is, Methodism has not touched Africa any more than it has China. Even the savages regard it with disgust.

It seems that the Methodists, in their zeal for making a show and justifying expenditure, hire congregations. They treat them like Hood's negroes. As no quantity of scrubbing-brush, soap, and flannel will wash them white, they gild them. The inducements held out to the Chinese hav been already noticed. Mr. Hollett said to the Liberia conference, convened at Monrovia in January, 1881, that if the conference resolved on pushing the work of conversion it would be well to avoid, among other practices, "the unfortunate custom of some of the early missionaries of hiring the nativs to attend church and school." Mr. Harman, presiding elder of the Cape Palmas district, writes: "The work of our church has been greatly retarded in some places, and at other points virtually stopped," in consequence, as alleged, of "pecuniary embarrassments."

In India the people are not Christians, even of the Methodist stripe, and the report does not represent them as Christians. Tke missionaries employ Hindoo and Mohammedan boys to act as "collectors," paying them "at the rate of one rupee per hundred for the average attendance of the month, and to each pupil is given a scripture-verse ticket." "The masses of the people are as obdurate as ever," writes the Rev. J. E. Scott. "Hindoos are still joined to their idols, Mohammedans still read the Koran and pray four times a day, and that good time when the halo-crowned missionary can sit under a palm-tree, with anxious crowds flocking about him earnestly inquir the way to heaven, in these regions has not yet dawned."

The Mexican missions were set on foot in 1873. Bishop Merrill has Episcopal supervision over them. They hav nine missionaries, with eight assistant missionaries in the shape of eight wives of the missionaries. The Woman's Foreign Missionary Society has five missionaries, all unmarried. There are two ordained nativ preachers and five unordained, with ten local preachers.

After nine years of labor what has been accomplished in Mexico, and what are the prospects? Superintendent Drees considers these important matters in his report. These past nine years he sets down as "the heroic age of Protestantism in Mexico—a time of baptism in fire and blood, of mobs and violence, of fanatical hatred and obloquy." Rather a warm beginning; and Superintendent Drees waxes warmer as he goes on to enumerate some of the obstacles to Methodist and Protestant progress in Mexico, chief among which is what he describes as "the deadening, brutalizing influence of Romish dogma and practice over the mind and conscience of the masses of the people." It would seem that the Catholics of Mexico are a hard lot, for Mr. Drees goes on to speak of "the great prevalence, almost unrestrained, of ignorance and personal and social vices, such as lying, drunkenness, impurity, lack of respect for the marriage tie, and infidelity to the conjugal union."

The Rev. J. W. Butler, in charge of the Mexico city circuit, cautiously admits that "it may seem that the statistics for this circuit do not show a very large increase over those of last year," but he can report "a great improvement in the general stability of the church, as well as increased evidence of true spirituality in our members."

The total number of members in all Mexico is 338; the number of probationers, 398. There are sixteen day-schools with 544 scholars, and one "theological" school with one teacher and six students. There are eight churches, whose estimated value is $51,050, the value of the parsonages being $46,800, and of the schools and other property, $12,665. It is to be hoped, says our Catholic author, that the committee on foreign missions will consider that a cheering exhibit of nine years of evangelical work.

The mission in South America was begun as long ago as 1836. The work is divided between the nativs and the English-speaking immigrants whose children "are nativs, adopt the language of the country, and, unless converted, will sink deep into the prevailing evil ways." The English element is pronounced as, "in the main, the best" of the immigration, though "the vices of Englishmen (especially drunkenness) are considered by the nativs as the ripe and legitimate fruits of Protestantism."

By all this it is clearly seen that as a missionary religion Methodism is a failure. If the vast sum annually collected and wasted on a few savages and Catholics were spent in enlightening the people at home, how much good might be done! The church would be afraid to do it, however, for fear that the more knowledge the people possess the fewer members would there be for the Methodist Episcopal church.

"Leaves of Grass" Not Obscene.

This, from Chainey's This World, would indicate that all the post-office officials hav not lost their senses:

"Last week appearances seemed to indicate that we were on the verge of a conflict with officialdom—a conflict precipitated by the bigotry and fanaticism of a petty instrument of those pretentious purists who hav so long outraged the conscience of republican America. For that conflict—unlooked for though it would hav been—we were so far prepared as to be determined to oppose any and every arbitrary decision contrary to the recognized principles of civil and religious liberty. There is a point where obedience ceases to be a virtue, and where the plainest duty of a good citizen is to resist unjust and arbitrary constructions, or rather misconstructions, of the law. We hav it on the best authority that 'fools rush in where angels fear to tread;' and the following letter from headquarters will demonstrate that, if the postmaster-general and his more immediate subordinates are 'angels' in any sense, there can be no doubt whatever that the Boston postmaster, Tobey, is a fool:

"'WASHINGTON, D. C., June 20, 1882.

"'Postmaster, Boston, Mass.: Your communication in regard to the exclusion of a circular containing an extract from Walt Whitman's "Leaves of Grass" has been received, also a communication from the publisher, addressed to a personal friend, and referred to Hon. Robert Ingersoll. Mr. Ingersoll, in turn, has referred this communication, with his own comments thereon, to this department, and the matter has been submitted to the postmaster-general for his personal examination. You are advised that he does not think the Department would be justified in excluding the mailing of the circular as third-class matter, and therefore you should forward through the mail copies of it prepaid at third-class rates.

"'The Department feels that when it exercises the power of exclusion, under section 225, Postal Laws and Regulations, it should be done under circumstances of strong conviction that the case is within the intent of the statutes. The postmaster-general is unable to reach this clear conviction in this matter. In regard to the attempt to mail the matter as a supplement, he is, however, clear that the former ruling of the Department excluding the circular in the form in which it is issued from being mailed at pound rates as a supplement is correct.

"'Very respectfully, JAMES H. MARR,

"'Acting First Assistant Postmaster-General.'

"Here, then, for the present we leave the matter, though we hope ere long to be able to show up the mean part which the man Tobey consented to play at the bidding of the wire-pullers of Comstockism Now that the embargo has been removed from No. 24 of This World, our subscribers have doubtless received their copies. In reply to many inquiries, however, and to prevent disappointment, we would state that our issue of June 17th is quite exhausted, so that we can supply no copies, should further application be made for any.

"Dropping for a moment the editorial 'we,' I would say that I intend to devote some of my time to lecturing away from home. One subject which I shall take will be 'Leaves of Grass,' and in the course of that lecture I shall freely and fairly discuss the question of Comstockism and free mails."

THE NEW VERSION. Lectures by George Chainey at Paine Hall, Boston. Cloth, $1. For sale by THE TRUTH SEEKER.

We think that Chainey has done a wise thing in thus making the scriptures suggestiv of new thought. The Bible is passing through a vast disintegrating process. It is a complete work, but some of the floating material is good, and Chainey has made it as serviceable as it could be to our present advance. There is much genuin human nature, as well as devil-nature and God-nature, in the Bible. There is romance and poetry in it. It has the crude freshness of the childhood of the race. A bold and skilful writer who is sufficiently iconoclastic as well as sympathetic can remold its form to a natural and beautiful significance. Being no longer a revelation of God, the Bible becomes in a very vital way a revealing of man.

The true method generally to interpret the Bible, to get at the meat, is to take as true the very opposit of what the theologians hav taught. For instance, the "fall of man" was really an evolution onward in the Spencerian sense. It was a breaking up and passing forth to greater difference of thought and feeling, and therefore to an intense life. So perhaps a subtler rendering will make Cain a better man than Abel, and Esau than Jacob.

Chainey's interpretations of the Bible are mainly of this sort, and he thus finds a world of suggestion in its hitherto arid pages. His "New Version" will amply repay reading. While it keeps us vigorously abreast of the times, it unlocks the riches of the remote past, and the continuity of man's life is exhibited, and the eternal material of his progress seen, for man is not simply intellectual, but passionate, and it is by a fusion of thought and emotion that he has progressed. While, therefore, we banish the dogmas of the Bible, we still need to realize the mighty hope and aspiration that throbbed in its personages and through which we are bound forever in one vast humanity.

Chainey has the poet's insight. He touches, heart to heart, the impassioned ages of which the Bible is a fitful and imperfect record. He has gone far beneath the surface and unfolded the living soul. His discourses are a new and remarkable force in Liberal literature. He voices the revolutionary sentiment. With graphic work he pictures not simply the true but the beautiful. He has the earnestness of a prophet. He is essentially constructiv. He deals not with conceptions only, but with ideas. He is a natural idealist and an Agnostic transcendentalist. He is a worshiper, not of theological abstractions, but of the real grandeurs of this world.

IN the North American Review for August the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher writes of "Progress in Religious Thought," pointing out the many influences, social, educational, and scientific, which are by degrees transforming the whole structure of dogmatic belief and teaching. T. V. Powderly, the official head of the Knights of Labor, the strongest union of workingmen in the United States, contributes a temperate article on "The Organization of Labor." The well-known British military correspondent, Archibald Forbes, writes of "The United States Army," dwelling more particularly on those features of our army management which appear to him to be most worthy of imitation by the military governments of Europe. "Woman's Work and Woman's Wages," by Charles W. Elliott, is a forcible statement of one of the most urgent problems of our time. The author sees no advantage to be derived from the employment of woman in man's work, whether of brain or of hand; such employment, he insists, only reduces man's wages, and does not really add to the total resources of the whole class of workers. In a highly-interesting essay on "The Ethics of Gambling," O. B. Frothingham analyzes the passion for play with rare ingenuity. "The Remuneration of Public Servants," by Frank D. Y. Carpenter, gives matter for serious consideration, both to the civil service reformers and their opponents. Finally, there is a paper on "Artesian Wells Upon the Great Plains," by Dr. C. A. White, of the Smithsonian Institution. The Review is sold by booksellers generally.

CHARLES WATTS, the editor of the London Secular Review, is about to make this country a visit, during which he will lecture upon secular and anti-theological subjects. He expects to reach here the first week in September, and is open to engagements to speak from that time on. Letters for him may be addressed in our care for the present.

Mr. Watts is a very able and energetic lecturer, and we trust he will find many opportunities of presenting his thoughts to the American Liberal public.

OWING to the lateness of the harvest, the Western Michigan camp-meeting appointed for the first week in August at Ionia is postponed so as to begin Tuesday, Aug. 15th and close Monday, Aug. 21st.

The Iowa League Convention and Liberal Mass Meeting

Will be held on the Fair Grounds at Tama, Tama county, September 7th, 8th, 9th, and 10th. If thorough preparation, earnest work, good speakers, and fine location can insure success, then the coming Convention will be the best Freethought gathering ever assembled in the Hawkeye state.

There should be a full muster of all divisions of the Liberal army—Spiritualists, Materialists, and reformers generally. There will be three sessions each day. It is probable that one session per day will be sufficient for the transaction of the business of the League. At all other sessions the platform will be free for the presentation of the views of all who may desire to speak, it matters not how radical or conservativ his or her opinions may be. It is the truth of which we are in search, aud the truth can only be ascertained where there is opportunity for the expression of the most divergent ideas. The conference here will be an especially valuable feature of this meeting.

Among the speakers who will be present I can now announce Mrs. H. S. Lake, Dr. Juliet H. Severance, N. F. Peck, and M. Farrington. These women and men need no encomiums of mine to secure for them good audiences. Mr. Peck will hav charge of the musical department, one of the most indispensable adjuncts of our meetings. Those of your readers who hav had the good fortune to listen to him will bear me out in all that I may say anent the originality, enthusiasm, earnestness, pathos, and wit manifested by Mr. Peck.

Dr. A. B. Dobson, of Maquoketa, independent slate-writer and magnetic healer, will be present. Other speakers will probably attend the meeting.

Tama is so situated as to be easily accessible from all parts of the state and the West. It is fifty-one miles west from Cedar Rapids, on the main line of the Chicago and Northwestern Railroad, and is the northern terminal point of the Northern Iowa division of the same road running to Elmore, Minn. It is also an important station on the Chicago, Milwaukee, and St. Paul Railway. These two great roads, with their numerous feeders, giv close connections for Tama with all the other roads of the state.

Full particulars concerning reduced railroad and hotel rates, program of exercises, etc., will appear in subsequent numbers of your paper. Permit me to particularly request all, especially Iowa Liberals, to secure, if possible, the insertion of this or a more condensed notice of the approaching Convention in their local papers. It cannot be advertised too extensivly. Let each woman and man interested in the cause of liberty take hold and do all possible to make this assembling of ourselvs together a complete and glorious success.

Let us lay aside for a few days the heavy burdens of our laborious lives and journey to Tama to consult as to the best means whereby we may carry our struggling race to a higher, happier plane of thought and action. Let us meet at Tama and become better acquainted with each other.

We need to develop the social side of our natures far more than we are inclined to do. Come and bring your children and your friends and their children. We must not forever remain egotistically elect, self-centered icicles, simply because we throw away some of the old superstitions and build upon the bulwarks of individual sovereignty. Do not forget that we hav expenses to meet. The printing must be done, our speakers paid, and then our proceedings should be printed.

I hope the burden of preparing for and conducting this Convention will not fall entirely upon one or two activ workers. For particulars address E. C. WALKER, Sec'y.

The New York Freethinkers' Convention.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I hav been spending a day at Watkins Glen making arrangements for our convention, and am pleased to state that there is a great change in the sentiment of the citizens since we were here four years ago. There are many of the best people in Watkins who are in full sympathy with us. And all who go to Watkins will be well treated. The board of trustees of the village very readily granted us the use of the village park free of charge, in which we can hold our day meetings if the weather is pleasant, and in which our friends who desire can put up tents. I am pleased to learn many parties are coming with tents. And I was surprised to learn that many persons from various parts of the country hav already engaged rooms at the hotels and boarding-houses. I was able to engage the Opera House for the whole time we are to be there at a very reasonable price.

As to the boarding-houses and hotels, the boarding-houses will take boarders for $5 per week, or for $1 per day. The following are the names of the proprietors of some of the most prominent boarding-houses: Mrs. Howard, Mrs. A. J. Graham, Mrs. Mirriott, Mrs. Frur, Mrs. Geo. Frost, and Mrs. J. Malette. Mr. C. S. Frost, the proprietor of the Glen Park Hotel, has very kindly agreed to act as agent in procuring boarding-places for parties who may desire at such rates as they wish to pay. Therefore anyone wishing to engage rooms may write to Mr. Frost.

As to hotel rates, the following communications explain themselvs:

"LAKE SHORE HOUSE, July 12, 1882.

"I agree to keep people attending the Freethinker's Convention for $1.35 per day. M. T. SMITH, Proprietor."

"JEFFERSON HOUSE, July 12, 1882,

"We will keep so many of the people attending the Freethinker's Association in August as we can accommodate for $1.50 per day. ABEL HODGKINS, Proprietor."

"FALL BROOK HOUSE, July 12, 1882.

"We will keep so many of the people attending the Freethinker's Convention in August as we can accommodate for $1.50 per day. H. M. PARKER & SON, Proprietors."

"GLEN PARK HOTEL, July 12, 1882.

"I agree to entertain the people who attend the Freethinker's Convention in August at the rate of $2 per day or $2.50, according to rooms taken, and make a deduction of fifty cents per day to each of the speakers. I will also run a free bus from my house to and from the place of meeting.

"C. S. FROST, Proprietor."

"GLEN MOUNTAIN HOUSE, July 12, 1882.

"We will entertain the people attending the Freethinker's Convention in August for $3 per day, so far as we hav room for them. A. J. MICHNER, Proprietor."

RAILROADS.

All of the great trunk line railroads hav agreed to sell excursion tickets along their lines. People residing on the Lake Shore and Michigan Southern, running from Chicago to Buffalo and on the Northern Central Railroad, will hav to write to me for certificates (inclosing a three-cent stamp) to entitle them to excursion rates. People living west of Chicago should purchase excursion tickets to Chautauqua Lake in the first instance. The arrangements from Boston and New England are not yet completed. By next week I will be able to giv a more full report.

SPEAKERS AND MUSIC.

Some twenty-five of our ablest speakers hav been engaged up to the present. So soon as the list is completed it will be published. Splendid music is engaged.

CASH RECEIPTS.

Twenty-four hav responded to my request for a dollar subscription. Two or three hundred more intended to do so when they read the call, but they forgot it. They are requested to do so now before they again forget it.

Salamanca, N.Y. H. L. GREEN, Secretary.

AMONG the humorous newspapers, of which there are so many good ones, none is better than the New York Judge. The price is ten cents per copy. One number is as good as another, and all are equal to the best. If you want to be amused and instructed, send for it. It is published at 34 and 36 North Moore street, New York.

not very pleasant to meditate upon. One was a huge chair for the punishment of criminals; the seat is composed of six large knives, nearly three feet long, set firmly in the frame, edge upward. The place for the feet to rest upon had three similar knives; the arms were two knives each, and the back four more knives, the edges toward the sitter. On the sides are loops through which bamboo poles pass for carrying the uncomfortable seat. The culprit had to sit naked in this chair, while four or six persons carried him a stipulated number of miles. I think the edges were not designed to be sharp enough to cut far into the flesh, but to cause extreme unpleasantness to the sitter. I thought if I was ever so weary I would not wish to sit in that chair, even for a short time. Another still worse implement is a heavy frame, about fifteen inches in hight, made somewhat in the form of a cross, with blocks five or six inches high fastened upon the upper surface. The condemned man was fastened upon this frame, when, with a heavy maul or beetle (which was also there) the wretch's bones were broken by striking heavy blows upon them between the blocks. Such a death must be horrible in the extreme—worse even than crucifixion. The different pain-causing machines which man has invented to torture his fellow-man are a disgrace to the race. There is no animal so cruel as man. He has not only made all the implements of torture which he could possibly invent, but he has also created all the gods and devils that ever existed, and which have ever been more cruel than the machines.

THE NEW HARBOR WORKS.

I visited the new harbor works seven miles east of Batavia. The town has no harbor, and vessels are compelled to lie at anchor out in the roads, and, during the prevalence of the monsoons, at considerable risk and inconvenience, as loading and unloading cannot be done when high winds prevail. To obviate this difficulty the government is incurring very heavy expense in creating a new harbor at the point indicated. Thirty-five million guldens have been appropriated for the work, and it is thought when done it will amount to double that sum. I found seven large steam dredgers at work and eight pile-drivers. Each dredger is accompanied by a steamer called a "hopper," into which the excavated mud or earth is emptied by the dredger, when it is taken out some three miles into the sea and emptied by means of opening the bottom and letting the earth drop into the water in a minute. The hoppers hold two hundred and fifty tons of earth, requiring from an hour and a half to two hours to fill them. Immense quays or slips about two thousand feet in length are being made beside the main harbor, which is about a thousand feet in width, and dredged to the depth of thirty-two feet. Between the harbor and the quays are heavy walls twelve feet in width and forty feet in hight from the bottom. The harbor will hold a large number or vessels, and by the side of the quays are to be built extensive warehouses and coal sheds, so that any amount of freight can be loaded and unloaded here, and any number of steamers coaled.

The digging for the quays is mainly done by hand, while the main harbor is done by the steam dredgers. In the quays hundreds of Chinamen and Malays are working in the water and mud digging up the clay and coral, which is hoisted in lots of two or three tons by steam and deposited in cars, which take it in the rear to raise the low ground and make it hard. The dredgers also meet with much coral, and each dredger is supplied with a strong horn or hook for breaking the coral, so that the buckets can take it up with the earth. A vast amount of coral has been taken out here and used for walls and for paving the sloping sides of the canals. I should think I saw five hundred tons of coral that has been taken out here, and among it are many very curious specimens of cunning workmanship which the industrious insects get up in such immense quantities, making large reefs and even islands where before was deep water. These coral insects have been very busy about Java, and seem to have done much toward changing the nature of the shore all along the coast. Besides the coral I saw hundreds, and perhaps thousands, of large sea shells, scolloped and regular, but otherwise somewhat like an oyster-shell, but three feet in length, and weighing one hundred pounds or more. It certainly was no very small insect that once inhabited these shells. These former habitations for marine animals are now used for constructing walls, and seem to be as hard as ordinary limestone, they being of the same material—a carbonate of line. How long ago these shells were alive, or formed the homes for large shellfish, is not known; but it was probably before the coral insects helped to make this place semi-solid, and may have been thousands of years ago.

For pumping the water out of these deep channels or quays that are being dug pumps of different kinds are used, principally the centrifugal and pulsometer. With the first the suction is produced by a fan, or wheel, with wings, which exhausts the air and produces a steady and large stream of water; the second is done by two currents of steam rushing through conical chambers and uniting, producing a vacuum, which raises a large stream of water, but in pulsations about two seconds apart. This pump was entirely new to me, and I am not certain that I describe it correctly; but it seems to work very successfully, and is not liable to get out of order. The steam escapes with the water, making it nearly blood-warm. A large amount of water has to be raised to keep it out of the way of the diggers, who certainly have a nasty, wet time of it. Over a thousand men are at work here, and as it is difficult to get men to go down in those deep channels and dig clay and coral in the water, several hundred prisoners are sent down from the city for the purpose, for which the sum of two cents each prisoner is paid per day, and this in Java currency. The gulden, worth forty cents of our money, is divided into a hundred cents. It takes two and a half Java cents to equal one of ours, so that less than one of our cents is paid per day for each of those prisoners. As I looked down upon them, knee-deep in the mud and water, I thought I would not like to work at the business for the same money; but their clothing is only a clout, and they can easily wash off at night and go back to their prison as clean as ever, and with their blue shirts on, which is their full dress.

The piles used here in large numbers are American pitch pine from Nova Scotia. They are a foot square and forty feet in length; the lower end is sharpened, and the heavy weight, raised rapidly by steam, drives them through the soft earth at pretty good speed till they strike a bank of coral, which retards their progress seriously. Those piles are for the foundations of the warehouses between the slips. For the outer walls large concrete blocks are made of Portland cement, sand, and pebbles half as large as one's fist, which are brought from the mountains several miles from the city. The Chinese are principally employed at this concrete business, and seem to work dextrously at it; the three ingredients are mixed with water in a bed and carried in tubs by means of poles resting on their shoulders, and emptied into boxes forming molds, which, when the mixture hardens, are raised by a crane. The blocks weigh about a ton each, and make a very permanent and handsome wall.

A floating dry dock for repairing ships in has also been constructed. The ground being low, and water standing in almost a stagnant state, renders the place unhealthy. Many of the Europeans have died of fever; but as the soft ground is made hard, and the water drained off, the locality grows healthier. The work has been in progress nearly four years, and two more will be required to complete it, but it will be a great achievement when finished. One of the engineers who has been at work here for three months was kind enough to go round the works with me. A large machine shop is on the premises for repairing machinery and putting work together. The shop is well supplied with heavy lathes, planers, etc. The machinery used in this work is principally of English manufacture, and from the establishment of Appleby Brothers, London.

A TRIP INLAND.

I have not seen as much of the interior of Java as I would have liked, but went out on the railroad as far as it is constructed—a distance of some eighty miles. I visited Builenzorg, some forty miles from Batavia, and a most romantic place, partly surrounded by mountains, raising their peaks in great grandeur. Here the governor-general resides the most of the time, though Batavia is the capital; and here he has splendid botanical gardens, containing an abundance of the most beautiful tropical trees, plants, and flowers. I do not know as I have seen anything finer in the way of gardens. One cannot behold them without being impressed with the great variety of the trees, shrubs, and flowering plants of Java. Many of them are perfectly magnificent. I also visited the following villages: Masseng, Gombong, Tji Tjoerock, Parong Koe La Tjibadak, Karang, Tenjah, Tjisart, and Soekaboemi. Some of these are but small villages, but the first and last are towns of considerable size, the latter having some twenty-five thousand inhabitants, nearly all Malays or Javanese, with some Chinese, who are the principal merchants of the town. I spent some time in strolling over the place looking at the customs of the natives, walking through the gardens, groves, etc., but the great difficulty was I could find nobody to talk with who could understand English; and that, by the bye, is the great difficulty I find here in Batavia. There are comparatively few who speak English.

Soekaboemi is the farthest east of any place in Java I have visited; it is up pretty well among the volcanoes, but I cannot say that I really saw any of the burning mountains, for the mists and clouds persisted in obscuring them from my view. I saw numerous mountain peaks, but cannot say that any of them were really smoking. I wished to visit some of the volcanoes, but found several difficulties in the way. 1. They are at considerable distance from the railroad, and there is no regular conveyance to them. 2. There are no guides to go with one and show him the way, etc. 3. The ascents are represented as being very difficult, and at this season of the year it rains hard nearly every day among the mountains, and I would find a day spent on the top of them anything but pleasant. 4. I could find no one to talk with or learn the facts from. I think the volcanoes are not much visited, for I could find no one who seemed to know much about them or could give me much information concerning them. At the Hotel de L'Europe, where I stopped in Batavia, the proprietor speaks some English, but he knows very little about volcanoes, and seemed scarcely aware that Java possesses volcanoes. I visited a bookseller a few times who speaks English tolerably well, and is a man of intelligence. He discourages me about visiting the volcanoes, assuring me I would find no regular means of reaching them, that there are no regular guides, and that I would be almost sure to encounter heavy rains.

I can bear witness to the frequency of rains in Java; I have passed twelve days here, and it has rained about every day, and some of the rains have been the most profuse I have seen in years. I think the annual rain-fall is some one hundred and fifty inches. By taking a cruise along the north coast of the island for a hundred miles or so there are volcanoes to be seen from the sea, but I was not fortunate enough to learn of any boats or steamers making that journey which I could take.

My trip in the country was a pleasant one; I saw much beautiful country and scenery. The mountains and plains are interesting, but perhaps not as highly so as I had expected. The mountains are picturesque, but not as precipitous and grand as the Himalayas; the valleys are lovely, but rather uneven in surface; the farming portion of the counrry is more cut up with gulleys and ravines than almost any country I have seen. A good deal of the surface for agricultural purposes is in this way lost. I did not get into the best of the coffee districts, though I saw some. I saw more of tea. Rice fields I saw in abundance, and in all the different stages of growth, from the plowing of the ground to the harvesting of the crop. It is all under water. The ground is stirred up by what may be called a plow by a pair of buffaloes, the water being nearly a foot in depth, so that the soil is scarcely seen at all. It looks a little out of the way of our style of farming to see the plow under water, the cattle knee-deep in mud and water, and the plowman jogging along behind with nothing on but a rag around the middle, and up to his knees in water from morning till night. The next process is to transplant the rice, which is started in beds very compactly sown. The plants are about six inches in hight, and men and women having a small armful of the plants go along in gangs or companies and insert them in rows about six inches apart. The transplanting is a very simple process, the root of the plant simply being pushed down into the mud, where it soon takes root and goes to growing. Rice is decidedly a water plant, water being constantly kept upon the beds—if beds they may be called—where it grows. These are small inclosures, with a bank of earth or turf around them as a dam to hold the water from running away. The ground is terraced with great care, one bed being a little higher than another, so that the same water runs from one bed to another, thus serving often twenty beds. The higher beds are supplied from the rivers and streams, and in several places I noticed the water being conveyed over the railroad and other roads in iron conductors a foot or more square. In a country where rains are so frequent the high grounds as well as the low are well supplied with water. I think the only cultivation the rice fields require is for the weeds to be pulled up occasionally. When partially grown it bears considerable resemblance to wheat, but when it heads out it looks much more like oats. When ripe enough it is cut short with sickles and tied up in small bundles, in which form I have seen it being transported to market in wagons and cars. I think the threshing is a simple process, though I do not know that I have seen it done. The pounding off the hulls I have seen, which is done by a heavy pounder, manipulated by the natives, in the form of a large lever, three of them standing on the top, stepping out toward the reverse end, raising the hammer, and then letting it fall suddenly upon the grain, keeping this up until cleaned from the hull. There are machines which perform this work rapidly and well, but the natives are much opposed to them, and many have been broken by them, as they look upon these machines as their enemies, performing the labor which of right belongs to them. The yield of rice must be double the amount per acre as with wheat. It is kept in every little store where provisions are sold, and three or four grades seem to be made of it. It is the great staple of food all through Asia. Without their "paddy" the orientals could hardly make life a success. When they have plenty of that they are happy; without it, most miserable.

I had a good opportunity for seeing the different growths of Java, and could not help being struck with the great amount of parasitic plants upon forest trees. It is very common for large trees to be completely covered with this very neighborly and familiar kind of vegetation, several varieties of parasites often being seen on the same tree, some climbing plants finding their way to the very tops of the trees, and some that have not the faculty of climbing, but manage to propagate themselves largely and to pick up a very good living without having any roots in the earth or any where else. I have seen varieties of cactus of pretty large growth thoroughly covering large trees with their abundant life. I saw also, while outside, what is here called sweet potatoes; it is a clean-looking plant, six feet in hight, but I am able to say nothing of its botanical character or of the quality of its tubers, as I have not eaten of them as I am aware. The roads in the country are good. The railroad is being gradually extended along the length of the island, running between the two ranges of mountains. The station-houses are large and well built.

I met in Batavia a Captain Bursely, whose home was once in New York city, and whose forefathers lived at Cape Cod, in Massachusetts, and were all sailors. The captain has long been sailing in these eastern waters, particularly among the Archipelago islands, and has seen much of the natives upon them; but he is now about quitting the ocean, as he has taken from the Java government Princess Island (between Java and Sumatra) for a period of seventy-five years. It contains 15,000 acres of fertile land, but is now covered with primitive forests of teak, and sandalwood, which are valuable for building purposes, furniture, etc. His purpose is to at once set one or two hundred Malay choppers at work to fell the timber, saw it with a steam saw-mill, and throw it into the market without delay. He says there is a good demand for lumber and timber and that he will be able to realize a hundred thousand dollars from the timber alone. The teak of this country is dark in color, and when made into furniture it looks about as well as mahogany or black walnut. It is also very pleasant to work. As fast as he gets his land cleared he proposes to set out cocoanut-trees, principally, which are a continual source of profit after the few first years, and require but little experience in cultivating. With ordinary luck he ought to be able to make a success of his enterprise. He seems to be a man of energy and practical talent sufficient to carry out his project, though I do not think I envy him his pleasure in establishing a home on an island inhabited only by tigers and other animals. The price he is to pay for the land is one gulden per year per acre, the first two years being no rent.

I miss here the cattle of India with the lumps upon their shoulders, which I have seen in several of the countries I have visited; the only cattle I have seen in Java are the buffaloes, and they only in the country. The only beasts of burden in Batavia are a race of small horses, not half the size of the horses in our country. They are a tough, hardy breed, but seem too small to haul carriages and heavy loads. They are disposed to be contrary. Hiring a dosedo (a two-wheeled carriage with two seats, one facing the front and the other the rear) to take me to the Noordwijk station, the little horse took a notion not to go, and the Malayan stepped down and gave him such a severe beating as to change his mind. I felt like asking him to spare those blows and let me go on foot the rest of the way. At another time I patronized the tramway, riding its whole distance of eight miles; three of these small horses are made to haul a heavy, clumsy car, containing forty passengers. Coming to a curve and a slight ascent over a bridge the little horses got discouraged, and refused to go further. It was almost amusing to see the Malay driver and conductor use their efforts to induce those small specimens of the horse tribe to leave that locality, though the freedom with which the whip was applied to the poor little fellows destroyed all the charm of the situation; whipping enough was done to move a car a hundred miles, and the stolid little ponies seemed to pay no more attention to it than they would to blows for brushing off the flies; and it was not till the passengers got out and pushed the car along that the little fellows made much effort to move. The drivers here have a very different way of talking to their horses from what our drivers use; instead of saying "go along," or "get away," they apply the whip very freely, and cry "ugh," as though they were feeling the pain of the whip instead of the horses. In this respect the drivers here remind me of those I saw last year at Naples, who made similar painful ejaculations. As a rule the Javanese do not feed their horses very well, and depend too much upon the whip.

An Italian opera company is performing in Batavia, and by way of variety and to while away the time I went one night to listen to them and see the manners of the place. The theater is a new and rather tasteful building. It was well filled, principally with the Dutch residents, with a fair sprinkling of the wealthier Malays and Chinese. The performance was very good, and the singing excellent, but being in Italian I could not understand a word. The opera was "Don Pasquale," in which was a lover and sweetheart, of course, who were pledged to each other, but the father of the fair damsel was in great distress for want of money, and when a rich old nabob offered him a large sum for the hand of his daughter, the needy father listened to the old man and promised his daughter to him. He had something of a struggle to obtain the daughter's consent, for she loved her Ernesto very much and cared nothing for the decrepit old man who wished to pay for her in gold; but in obedience to her parent's wishes and to help him out of his deep trouble she consented to give up the one she loved and to become the wife of one she did not love at all. The marriage papers were made out, and the time for the nuptials was set; but the two that loved each other had an interview, and their former passion was renewed. The girl did not think she could wed the old fellow, and he came upon them and could not fail to see the love they bore each other. It made him very uneasy, and a good deal of singing had to be done about it; he complained to the father, and the father sang very sternly to the girl, but still she loved the young chap and could not like the old fellow. By degrees the old man saw the truth of the matter and became convinced that the girl could not love him, as her heart had gone out to the young man, and he had the good sense to give her up, and unite the hands of the two young ones with his blessing and a very handsome dower, which he gave to Norina. So everything ended very happily.

THE MALAY WOMEN.

I have perhaps said enough about the natives here, but I have not reported what I hear from several, that the women are not as virtuous as they should be. There is said to be no trouble for the Dutch soldiers to find Malay women to live with them as wives of convenience for one, two, or three years as desired; and what seems equally bad, mothers will sell their daughters for money. The sum of one hundred guldens is said to buy a nice young Malay girl; for that sum a Malay mother will part with her daughter for the purposes indicated. It is hard to believe this statement, for the women look like a modest, virtuous, well-disposed class of people, showing as little wantonness and looseness of character in their demeanor as any people anywhere. But the number of half-bloods or half-castes one sees reminds him that soldiers or missionaries have been around. It is certain that males must assist in this mixing business.

I must say of these women, however, that they follow to excess the vile habit of chewing the betelnut, a mixture so common in all these Asiatic countries. The betelnut grows on what is called the areca palm, the prettiest of the palm family, the trees growing very erect, trim, and graceful. The nuts are somewhat larger than hickory-nuts, and have a rather agreeable, astringent taste. They are broken up in fragments, interspersed with gum-catechu and some spices, and these constitute the betel, which these people chew constantly, especially the women. The practice is fully as filthy as tobacco-chewing, though perhaps not so deleterious, and it seems to have become a passion with these people. If it may be regarded as more innocent than tobacco-chewing, I must pronounce it more filthy. It gives the saliva a deeper color, and makes the mouth and lips look nasty and extremely unkissable. Every woman seems to be addicted to the filthy habit, and every mouth looks nasty, and the lips and tongues and teeth of all are made dark with the vile stuff which they seem so fond of.

I should perhaps mention to you that Batavia is supplied with drinking water from numerous artesian wells put down in various parts of the city. The filthy water of the river was used until a few years ago, when it was found that by going down from sixty to seventy-five feet an abundance of excellent water can be obtained—a discovery of very great value.

It occurs to me that while I am here at Batavia you and I are at antipodes. You are on one side of the globe, and I almost directly opposite. This point is about one hundred and eighty degrees of longitude from New York, whether you go east or west. I am nearer the equator on the south than you are on the north, otherwise we are very nearly opposite. It is hard to realize that I am eight thousand miles beneath your feet, or you eight thousand miles beneath mine, but that is about the fact in the case; and, if the learned men are correct, that eight thousand miles is made up of fused and seething metals, rocks, and earths, with a thin crust to prevent us coming in contact with the super-heated mass. I am now at the point farthest from you that I will be while absent. To reach you I will have nearly fifteen thousand miles yet to travel, but from this time forward every hundred miles I travel will place me that much nearer to you. Another cheering reflection is that if nothing befalls me I shall make the last half of my journey in less than half the time it took me to make the first half. The reflection is cheering, because I am wearying somewhat with travel; and however much I have been pleased to see foreign lands, I am more anxious to see my own land once more, for notwithstanding the fine and beautiful countries I have seen, I like America better than any of them, particularly because there is my home and there are the friends I love. Let me say here that much of the historical past of my description of Java is drawn from "The Eastern Archipelago," by W. H. D. Davis. T. Nelson & Sons, London.

DEPARTURE FROM JAVA.

Friday, March 24th.—I expected to depart from Batavia on the 21st inst., as that was the regular time for leaving, and that would admit of my getting to Singapore in time for the steamer for Hong Kong, whose time for leaving Singapore is the 24th; but for some reason word was sent on here to defer the leaving till to day. This change in the programme has disturbed me not a little, as I fear it will bring me too late at Singapore to go on east by the next P. & O. steamer, by which line I have a ticket to Yokohama, but they told me here that the time of the boats had been changed, and that I would be in time. I, however, have had misgivings upon this subject, as by missing my steamer I will be detained two weeks, which is far from a pleasant thought.

At 7 A.M. I was at the landing and took the steamer for the Bromo, lying three miles out in the roads, the rain gently falling to remind me in leaving that it sometimes rains in Java. Two or three dozen steamers or ships are lying at anchor in the roads, and among them three or four men of war—two of them Russians recently arrived. At 9 o'clock we weighed anchor, and were making our way northward. The number of passengers is not as great as when coming down; particularly the natives or deck passengers are considerably less numerous, but there are several Malays, Chinese, and Arabs, some going through to Singapore, and some to stop at the intermediate points. A goodly number of them are Mohammedans, and three or four times per day they get together on the deck, and taking their bearings as nearly as possible, with their faces toward Mecca, they go through the praying process of bowing, kneeling, placing their faces to the floor, and muttering their stereotyped prayers. It requires some ten or fifteen minutes to go through the formula. There are no more persistent pray-ers than the Mohammedans, and their prayers probably do as much good as anybody's, but I don't believe that a thousand of them amount to a cent in value for all the effect they have upon any being beside themselves; prayers may effect to a slight degree those who pray, but that they have any effect upon any being above the clouds I do not believe.

I got acquainted somewhat with the chief engineer, an intelligent Englishman, and was interested by his narration of his experiences at Acheen, at the northern part of the island of Sumatra, where the Dutch prosecuted their expensive war with the natives of that locality, and where they have only been able to get control of a few miles from the coast. The natives are rather warlike and retreat to the fastnesses of the mountains, from which they descend to make forays and attacks upon the Dutch forces, throwing them into much confusion and loss. The Dutch suffered much loss of life from the great unhealthiness of the locality, where there is much marsh ground and consequent miasma from stagnant water, decaying vegetation, etc. He described the burying-ground of the natives nine miles in extent, the names of the dead being inscribed upon the tombstones as in civilized countries. Two of the monuments are of brass, or bronze, and mark the graves of the kings; in the inscriptions the letters are left up and the face of the metal cut away, which he considered a piece of great labor and skill to be performed by the natives. The Acheen war was very expensive upon the Dutch, and was far from being remunerative.

Sunday, March 26th.—We had a pleasant trip up to Singapore, making stoppages at the same two points we did in going south—Muntok and Riouer—and also saw the same multitude of islands off the Sumatra coast. The weather was pretty oppressive, as it had good reason to be under the equator and close to it.

We arrived here in Singapore at 5 P.M., being two days and a half making the run. I found upon arrival that my worst fears were realized, that the steamer I wished to meet had gone on to Hong the day before, and that there was no way for me to do but to patiently wait here for twelve days for another steamer. This is greatly to be regretted, when I feel so impatient to be making as good time as possible. There is, however, no other way but to be resigned to the situation, and to wait for the time to pass by.

The town and island of Singapore, the small islands in the vicinity, and the steamers and ships in the harbor looked very interesting as we steamed up; and as we neared the dock I was not a little interested in seeing native boys which were all around our steamers, in boats, dive down and catch copper coins thrown into the water by passengers. They showed themselves very expert, being able in almost every instance to catch the coin before it reached the bottom, and sometimes securing two coins before coming up, and allowing none to be lost.

This letter is long enough, and I will say good-bye.

Sincerely yours, D. M. B.

THE TRUTH SEEKER will be sent to new subscribers three months for half a dollar. Let those who are interested in the spread of Freethought induce their friends to become trial subscribers.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $7—$5 for "A Truth Seeker Around the World," $2 for balance of subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. It is refreshing to know that there are some who dare say what they believe to be the truth. It is a step further than to say I don't know, which is all I dare say of the supposed spirit life. If there is any who do know they should be able to explain how they know, that others may arrive at the same knowledge.

Yours truly, L. PREDMORE.

WAS CHARLES J. GUITEAU INSANE?

ADRIAN, MICH., July 8, 282.

MR. EDITOR: This seems to be an open question with the people at large, one class claiming that he was insane, and the other that he was a sane man, and must be hung. On this side the government has put itself by hanging him, though the testimony of his nigh relativs and other witnesses was that he was insane on the subject of religion and had been for a number of years—that is, as we understand them to mean, the Christian religion as founded on the Bible. Now, this brings us to the question, What is Christianity, and why should meditating upon it tend to the derangement of the brain?

1. Christianity, as defined by its own records, consists, first, in the belief in one personal God, and that he made everything out of nothing; then out of the dust of the earth he made a man in his own likeness, and that this man being lonely, this God had him to go to sleep, and while he was asleep God took a rib from his side and of it he made a woman for the man, put them in a garden under certain instructions, but they disobeyed and fell from their first state of innocence and simplicity, and thus plunged the whole human race in sin.

2. Now, through the agency of the Holy Ghost in the overshadowing business, this God had a son that was named Jesus by an angel before he had a parentage. This Jesus was to act as a mediator between this God and his sin-begotten children. And now all these children who were willing to giv themselvs up to Jesus and acknowledge him as their savior should be saved, and those who turned their backs on this Jesus should be damned eternally and forever lost. Now, this being the bed-rock on which the Christian religion rests, the next question is, How does meditating on this tend to mental derangement? We will answer it in this way: That as this religion rests on the supernatural, and the brain belonging to the natural, there cannot be a harmonious blending between the two, and that the moment the natural begins to meditate and ruminate on the supernatural, something that has no existence inside of the natural universe, the tendency is toward mental derangement, because there is no base in nature to rest the mind upon, and so this effort of the brain is all wasted, and indeed worse than wasted—it is a feeder of a morbid condition of the brain, and leads directly toward mental derangement.

Cases of mental insanity from this source are getting quite common all around us. In noticing one of these cases a correspondent of the Adrian Times makes these very sensible remarks: "It occurred to us while writing the above that it would be well for our legislatures, while protecting the various religious denominations, to seriously contemplate the importance of also protecting the people against these abuses. Cases of insanity through religious excitement are quite numerous, probably double those from all other sources, saying nothing about those partially wicked becoming loony, silly, or extremists."

MEDICINE LODGE, July 5, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find $5, which you will add to the Round-the-World fund, and please annex my name in the second volume if you can at so late a date, and send me the books of Bennett's travels around the world, which I think are far superior to any history of any man's travels around the globe. I love the venerable old traveler because he was the first to open up the Liberal artillery and go into a successful battle in defense against the superstitious and oppressiv creeds, dogmas, and religions of our country; and I esteem the noble traveler above all because he had the nerve to put on a bold front and an outspoken mouthpiece, and leave the American shores sounding his bugle of Freethought and liberty aloud to every nation, superstitious creed, and religion of the world, which had the effect to set fire to the dormant thoughts of many unthinking, superstitious nations, which I hope may continue to burn until superstition is utterly consumed. We should feel grateful to know that the sounding alone of the large Bennett gun in India had the effect to put to flight the American orthodox fleet sent there under the command of radical Cook. The many impressions left with many peoples and nations by the Rev. Bennett, in my opinion, will be long lasting and will grow into monuments of reverence and be fresh in history thousands of years hence. Please allow me yet to return the noble writer my heartiest thanks for the most excellent letters penned by his Liberal hand to the Liberal truth seekers of America.

Ever yours, B. F. BRATTAM, M.D.

BIGGS, CAL., June 29, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose you $3 for THE TRUTH SEEKER from January. My friend, you can scarcely imagin what true satisfaction it is to me to enjoy the privilege of reading so excellent a paper as you conduct in the interest of mental freedom. I look for its arrival every week with much more solicitude than the return of the Sabbath. I liv very close to a church, and while they are thundering their anathemas upon the heads of those who dare think for themselvs I sit complacently beneath my old shade-tree and peruse the contents of your valuable paper, and am not afraid of the hell they hav already consigned me to.

The Rev. Broadcloth came into my blacksmith shop when he first came here and introduced himself by asking me if I was a praying man. I answered, "No, sir, I am not; why should I pray?" He replied, "You should endeavor to make your peace with God." I told him, "If there is any such person in the universe I hav no evidence of his existence. I certainly never quarreled with him, and I could not discover how I could become reconciled with one with whom I was not at variance and was not sure that he lived." I asked him to explain the philosophy of prayer—perhaps he could make it plain. He then quoted very profusely from his holy Bible, all which I answered in rotation to the complete discomfiture of the reverend representativ of the meek and lowly Jesus. I asked him in conclusion if he prayed. "Oh, certainly," he arrogantly replied. "Well, then," I said, "you are certainly offering insult to your God every time you pray, and if he heeded it you would suffer the inconvenience of having your mouth closed." "Why do I insult him?" he furiously asked. "Because," I answered, "you claim he is the omniscient ruler of all things, knows all things from beginning to end, and is equal to all emergencies. Now, holding God in the light that you do, is it not an insult when you stand up and dictate to him and suggest what he should do? You miserable, short-sighted, ignorant, sinful worm of the earth, that cannot see one moment ahead, how dare you substitute your wisdom for infinit wisdom? Are you not afraid that God will become indignant at your repeat insults?" His only reply was, "You will suffer for all this."

I am yours for truth, JOHN D. STANLEY.

BATTLE CREEK, MICH., July 6, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: It is due to you for me to say that for many years I hav given much thought on the Bible and Testament as to the truth of the vast assertions in those books, either in a historical or a divine record of past events. So glaring and unnatural are the thousands of passages in the Bible that to me it is strange how a religion could be founded on such a record of inconsistencies. Your travels and account of what is termed the Holy Land hav thrown more light on our minds than has ever been by all travelers preceding you. Your unbiased mind and determination to seek and investigate, and untrammeled by that enemy of man, old theology, could view things as they are and giv us what I deem the most correct history ever written of that land, for if such a God did act the part which is recorded in those books, and on which Christianity is founded, then such a god is and ever has been a most atrocious being. But I look on all the illusions in those books as myths, and used by tyrants and priests in order the better to enslave the masses and hold sway over their minds, bodies, and souls. Religion caused millions of poor beings to suffer untold misery. The Christians of to-day, giv them the power, and you, instead of that mock trial and eleven months' imprisonment, would hav been burnt at the stake. No doubt that arch fiend and king of all hypocrits would hav been glad to hav piled the fagots, applied the torch, and danced around your quivering flesh and sing "Glory, hallelujah!" and all for Christ's sake. I repeat that such no doubt would hav been your fate had that wretch Comstock, the miserable fool of a judge, and the twelve jurymen the power to hav inflicted such punishments. I repeat that no people on earth are so inconsistent as the bigoted Christian who makes his long prayers, calls on God, and actually tells God what he must or ought to do, and all for Christ's sake. Not a living being on earth has any actual knowledge of what is termed god; it is wholly imaginary. As to the existence of a being, a something that rules the universe, I say it is all an imagination. Your record of that miserable land of Palestine should convince all that if the Lord did bring the Jews from the rich lands of Egypt he made a poor choice to put them on a tract of land so poor, so miserable, and so forbidding, and then to chime in and sanction the most hideous crimes known on earth, and to cap the climax in overshadowing a young girl, as the book says, and causing her to bring forth a son, thus cheating the poor carpenter and making him a step-father, to work and toil to support a baby in whose birth he had no part or interest. If such a God was to perform such an act in this day, Comstock would be a fit subject for a midwife, and then he could hav some stock in his Jesus and go forth to practice his infamy in persecuting those he might deem heretics or guilty of obscenity. What a miserable fool he and President Hayes must be to be duped by such a pack of hypocrits, when any number of passages in the Bible are so indecent that they would not dare to read them to a respectable audience. I repeat that no book would be permitted to be circulated containing the mean, dirty passages that are in the Bible, and the lies recorded there, and all the word of God, so the Christian asserts. It is putting a low estimate on Mother Nature to charge such infamies on her, when reason teaches the reflectiv mind to believe that no defects in divine nature exist, and that no particle of natural law can, or ever has, or ever will, be suspended for any or all the prayers ever uttered on earth. Hence I view that system as a catch-penny in duping the devotees of the religions, while love, charity, and good will to all are repudiated. Such is the craftiness of priestcraft and a greed for power, for ease and selfishness, while humanity is unheeded and sneered at, and all for Christ's sake.

Truly yours, H. WILLIS.

PHILADELPHIA, PA, July 6, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose $1 for a continuance of the paper. I enjoy reading your paper very much, although I cannot say that I accept all its doctrins, exept so much as is implied by its title. I cheerfully lend the little support I can giv to antagonize the idea of suppression of the press under pretended religious dictation.

Permit me to correct what I conceive to be an error on page 406 of your issue of the 1st inst., twenty-three lines from the bottom of the second column. Mr. Bennett says, "Chocolate, cocoa, and broma are prepared from them," meaning cocoanuts. The "Catechism of Familiar Things," published by Lindsay & Blokiston, on page 27, tells of what chocolate is made—that it is a kind of paste, made of the kernel of the cacaonut, a very different thing from the cocoanut. Webster also differs from Mr. Bennett. I think it a bad thing to make such a mistake.

R. M. ROBINSON.

RUSSELLVILLE, July 7, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Much has been said of late about spending enormous amounts of money and labor erecting mammoth buildings, the most costly and magnificent in the world, for the use of the gods and their special favorits. And it has been shown to my mind most conclusivly that all this money and labor might hav been used more judiciously; used so as to hav dispensed more general happiness and good of all kind to the human race. All men and all women who hav not shut their eyes to all truth and all light, except that which comes through orthodox mediums, must see this at a glance if they will but throw open the doors and windows of their understandings, and all such must easily see that oceans of evil of the worst kind has flowed out of all this sacred folly. But this does not bring me to the conclusion that we really want no houses of worship whatever, or that it is wrong to hav any. True, I don't believe in any of the man-made gods, Jehovah not excepted; even if I were to believe there is no God, I would still believe that houses of worship, built in the bounds of reason and common sense, are indispensable. This is just what we Liberals want, and just what we must hav. If we may expect to become a people of any available influence and power in the world without these, it is perfectly plain we can do no good whatever. We must hav organization and all that ncessarily pertains to organization, and that organization must be framed so as to be most effectual in accomplishing the ends desired; call it a church if you please, the name is nothing to me. If this is what Mr. James Parton meant by "supplanting the old by building up a new religion," I am with him heart and hand; he of course meant to use no force but the force of reason. If we can build up the best organization of this kind that ever was built up, lets do it—it will be worth building. If not, let it sink. Improvement, progress, the amelioration of mankind, are what we must effect.

These old church buildings in themselvs are as harmless as the hills, were it not that the word lie is written all over them in symbolical characters, and it is the purposes they serve which make them contemptible. False creeds, bolstered up by the most corrupt organizations, hav been fed and sheltered in them until they hav become fat and powerful; better no organization than corrupt ones. Rid these buildings of all corruption, superstition, and priestly humbug; take away from them the last feature of superstition's haggard visage, and turn them to the use of humanity; then I can even greatly rejoice that they are in the world. Several times when reading the letters from friends in THE TRUTH SEEKER I hav met with the questions: "How long, oh! how long, will men and women continue to cling to ridiculous old superstitions? How long will they consent to be duped by a hypocritical priesthood?"

My judgment is until we Liberals hav a goodly number of superior institutions of learning and magnificent meeting-houses, embellished so as to be attractiv to the young. The naked truth is good enough for old philosophers, but the young want it decorated and adorned with the pleasures, the flowers, the fruits of life; they, generally speaking, prefer beautiful and sublimated error and superstition to plain unvarnished truth. Liberal Leagues, books, papers, and lectures are all very good so far as they go, but these alone can never effect the desired reform. We want all the usefuls, and we want them in the highest state of perfection.

I need not say I am rejoiced on account of Mr. Bennett's safe arrival back to his nativ country, all true Liberals are, and it is my highest ambition to act so as to be worthy of a place among that class of men. Yours, in all friendship and brotherly love,

WM. L. WORLEY.

CONCORD, KY., July 10, 282.

MR. EDITOR: If misery loves company, so too does happiness, and it is upon this principle that we indite this "special" to THE TRUTH SEEKER. In accordance with Liberal ideas we hav had a Sunday picnic. Should any of the friends wish to know how we went, tell them we walked. By pre-arrangement, a party of twelve, your correspondent included, spent last Sunday in the woods dedicating God's first temples to a happy present and pleasant memories. A few of us who had the pleasure of knowing, through the medium of the pen, the Walkers, the Lelands, the Kelsos, felt that a lecture from one or more of them was required to render the felicities complete, and we inwardly confessed to a pang of envy that other sections could be regaled by the eloquence of Freethought oratory, while we who so much need it should be denied. But when that lecture bureau proposed by Mr. Green becomes a bona-fide existence we too will share the enjoyment. As Mr. Leland says, "you see if we don't." We first repaired to a sulphur spring some miles distant, the medicinal qualities of which will hereafter enjoy some celebrity if never before. The day was delightful, and the walk, the woods, and the water conspired to realize our most sanguin hopes. A few of our party were Liberal in principle, the remainder in disposition; and it was by no means difficult for the two elements to blend harmoniously. Our sweet friend Miss Louise Schulte discoursed with warm partiality upon that important science, phrenology, and the good-natured arguments arising in consequence only imparted a flavor to the conversation. Having in our lengthy walk reached one of those lofty points common to the Ohio River hills, we attained a view of the quaint old town of West Union. The enchanting effect of glistening spires and shiny domes elicited a proposal to pursue our march until reaching the glittering goal; but others who felt that their pedestrian capacities were limited, interposed objections. Leaving some to rest under the shady boughs, a detatchment made an informal call at what was once appropriately known as the Bandits' Cottage. We found it invested with many attractions. Nestling as it does amid dense foliage of trees and shubbery, the visitor is upon it almost before he is aware, but when once within its charmed precints it does not require an extravagant fancy to conjure a miniature paradise. However lacking in honor its architects were, their taste at least could not be questioned, and we half regretted the interference of the law, which, it is said, rendered their future plans of improving and beautifying abortiv. The surrounding scenery is wild, rugged, and picturesque. The steep cliffs, dark glens, and trickling cascades, shadowed by huge forest giants, which in their turn are mantled by clinging vines and wild flowers kissing their monarchs' feet, cause the beholder to feel that he is indeed in the realms of romanee.

A thousand thanks to the friends, both abroad and at home, who hav lavished such loads of kindness upon Mr. Bennett. Surely his enemies should know by this time that persecution only makes his friends more obedient to the immortal bard's injunction by grappling him to their souls with hooks of steel. The cruel wrongs he suffered we felt were in a measure ours as well; in the honors conferred we must ever rejoice. VIRGINIA E. VANCE.

UNION CITY, MICH., July 10, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $2.40, which please apply as herein directed: 75 cents for Keeler's "Short History of the Bible," 15 cents for "Self-Contradictions of the Bible," which please send me, and $1,50 to apply to my subscription for the highly-prized TRUTH SEEKER, which is my Bible, Concordance, and Commentary.

Thanks to your many noble and intelligent contributors who are dispelling the fogs of superstition and establishing rationality. But for your noble and talented workers, W. F. Jamieson and the dear and logical TRUTH SEEKER, probably I should still be plodding along with a weak and sickly faith (for I could never firmly believe in the God of the Bible), in the absurd and antiquated Christian dogmas. Thanks to those aids in lifting me from the quagmire of delusion to the plain and scientific truth. Long had I longed for indubitable evidence of the falsity of the current Christian theology, on account of its inconsistency. That evidence I am now confident I hav found. My motto is, Let us all be truth seekers, and if we find we are indulging a delusion, and though the same seem desirable, let it be dispelled, abandoned; let the truth come out and prevail, though the heavens fall. Thanks to our letter-writing friends; their letters are interesting and not unfrequently instructiv. It is, I think, good to compare notes and interchange views.

My special thanks to Bro. T. Winter, of Cincinnati, O., for his bold, clear, pointed, and logical letters. They are so identically expressiv of my own views on the same subjects. His under date of April 15th in THE TRUTH SEEKER of April 29th, will, I think, pay reperusal and consideration.

One word more and I am done. I am glad to learn that that remarkable and highly-respected man, champion of truth and freedom, after a successful tour around the world, D. M. Bennett, is nearing home in health and good spirits; that his truthful history will prove a great blessing to the present and coming generations I hav do doubt.

Yours fraternally, M. BURLINGAME.

A REPLY TO A WORKINGMAN.

LA CROSSE, WIS., July 10, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of the 1st inst., I saw an article from a workingman who says he does not relish an article of mine which appeared in your paper of the 28th ult., headed "A Talk With the Workingmen." I stated in that article, "I should make it so plain that they would understand it without the aid of a dictionary." But it appears I was mistaken on his part. He adds in the first place, it is "disinterested effort on my part." I am sorry, for that. I did not intend to make it so. He says I put the brand of fool on every workingman. I think he is mistaken in that, for in the article I said, "Select some of the workingmen whose lives hav been in sympathy with you and your wants, vote for them, and elect them." He adds, "I infer that you are not a working man." Yes, I am a working man, and hav worked hard for fifty years, and am now working from ten to twelve hours a day in a market garden, but that is no reason why I should not speak what appears to me to be the truth.

You ask further, "Is it not possible that a few of the Greenback organizations possess a Petty in the amount of information on the subject of finance?" etc. Yes, I acknowledge the corn. You ask, "Did I ever realize that every material and luxury that I enjoy I am indebted to the workingmen for them?" What a simple question to ask. I will tell you what it is, the workingmen are giants in the arts and mechanics, but mere babes and pigmies in religion, to their discredit. You add, "What is most needed is organization." Yes; there is the rub. What prevents organization? Is it intelligence or is it ignorance? If you say intelligence, then the more ignorance a man possesses the better he is off. You add, "We are simply a mob," but say, "We must become welded together into one solid phalanx." Will ignorance do that? "If Patrick Ford," you add, "of the Irish World, had no religion, I should be apt to fall down and worship him." Does that bespeak liberty or man-worship? I think you would not answer for a standard bearer, for you would be looking out for man-worship instead of liberty. I believe, with Macdonald, if ever the workingmen are liberated they will hav to stop praying and go to thinking for themselvs, for he adds, "Neither Congress nor the church will help them, for one robs them of their money for the benefit of the rich, the other of their mind for the glory of God." I am with all due respect, Your well wisher,

J. PETTY.

CANTON, DAK., 10, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $1.50, for which send M. Faraday's papers on "The Process of Mental Action," Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 4. For the rest of the money you may send me copies of Col. Ingersoll's "Decoration Oration," delivered in New York. I would like some more books and papers, but I cannot spare the money to buy them just now. I hope Mr. Bennett has had a pleasant time since his arrival in the "land of the free."

There are many Liberals in this section, but they are not organized, and it is hard work to fight a powerful enemy unless organized for the purpose. The great trouble I find here is that the Liberals take very little interest in the subject of liberty. They say, "I think and act for myself, and others can do the same." This is not right. If the Liberals of this country would work as zealously for their cause as do the church people, we would soon be able to demand a hearing in all matters of importance in legislation, for the legislatures of the country are the mouth-pieces of the church, and so long as they are run in the interest of the church we may expect to hav to liv under and be subject to obnoxious laws.

Bro. E. C. Walker is laboring in this vicinity, and I hear from him once in a while. I endeavored to get up some lectures here for him, but the rest of my Liberal friends did not care to take any part in the work, so I could not shoulder the whole responsibilities of getting him here, and had to let him go by unheard. This is a community in which a good lecture goes begging, and a minstrel troupe will draw a full house. The only excuse I can offer for this is that the greater majority of the people are Christians.

You will hear from me again soon. With best wishes for the good cause, I remain, Yours truly, C. W. MCCRONE.

BUFORD, OHIO, June 27, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: You will doubtless be surprised to receive a letter from me at this place. I am here on a visit to the old home, and notwithstanding my determination not to bring on any religious discussion, yet I find that here away in the backwoods some stray rays of light hav penetrated. I had resolved not to say anything upon these factions for the sake of peace—for the sake of having quiet and rest—for the sake of avoiding giving pain to gentle, generous, loving mother, who is old and feeble, and it would do us no good to controvert or argue with her, and would only cause needless pain. I hav, however, found truth seekers here, anxious truth seekers who asked me for some books and tracts, and when I told of our grand old TRUTH SEEKER, and showed a copy of it an interest was aroused at once, and it may be the nucleus of a number of subscribers. I inclose an order for some books and one copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I may be able to do something more here in a quiet way. I came here more for rest than work, but it seems hard to associate with people long without telling them of the progress of Freethought. I tell you the air is full of it. It seems that there is an influence permeating the atmosphere which causes the old wheel-horses in religion to balk. We hav reason to rejoice and be exceeding glad; for great is our jollification.

I hav been so unfortunate as not to get my paper since coming here, so that I am a little behind in TRUTH SEEKER news, but I trust our pilgrim is doing grand service in the cause, as he always has done. I wish he could stop at Cincinnati as he goes east. I am only forty miles east of there.

I am, as ever, yours in the cause of truth,

L. E. HUGGINS.

ORANGE, N. J., July 8, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I hav just been reading friend Bennett's address to the people of Ceylon, as reported in THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 8th, and I want some sort of hieroglyphic to represent all the emphasis and astonishment that one can condense into one entire line of Oh's! and exclamation points. O-o-o-h! What a masterly iconoclast he is in the use of pure, simple, Anglo-Saxon language! What crushing sledge-hammer blows he does strike with his little pen! Oh, oh! What powerful blows a little man can strike if he only has the weapon of eternal truth to wield, with only one hand. Good heavens! I find myself exclaiming in my own private dwelling. Is it possible that I hav made such a donkey of myself for fifty years past by clinging with a death-like grasp to a system of unmitigated falsehoods! I really wish a copy of your paper for July 8th could be put into the hands of every person in the country. Every sentence is as full of immortal truth as a mad porcupine is of quills. Truth is mighty and must ultimately prevail.

Yours, SERENO EDWARDS TODD, SR.

KANSAS CITY, MO., June 30, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: The germs from the East are in dream-land for the present; when they awake into beauty my pen shall send fragrant tattle to you. Accept my thanks. Times are changed somewhat with you since I used to write to Albany. Would it not hav been better for Francis Abbot had he taken the bull by the tail at that time? You are the resurrection while your enimies are dying. Brother Underwood found a wide-a-Wakeman as he was in the act of blasting Liberalism, and so things go on from bad to worse with them.

You hav had a great benefit and bestowed the same on all your friends in your interesting letters from everywhere. I never knew such industry as yours. LIZZIE ADAMS.

RICHMOND, ILL., July 4, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: If there is any possible chance to make a libel suit stick against the Inter-Ocean, I hope you will commence suit at once. I will giv my mite to help to put it through. I take the only copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER that is taken here. I showed it to two parties, and they agreed to do likewise. I hav no hesitation in saying you can rely on fifteen or twenty dollars from this place to help put him through, so I hope you will let him know that as much of a beast he may think you are, that you can find plenty of friends, and money too, to make Inter-Ocean hide his beastly head. I hav no doubt but you will find plenty of friends to assist with the needful if you will commence a suit. I hope you will. JOHN WEST.

SCOTLAND NECK, N. C., July 10, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to urge upon all Liberals of the South the necessity of sending good representativ men to the Watkins Convention, to be held August 23d. The present preparations and indications are that it will be the largest Liberal gathering in the world. Speakers of known ability and talent will be there. Low rates over all railroads and at the hotels will be made. Further information will be given by the secretary, H. L. Green, Salamanca, N. Y. I hope the papers of the country will be as Liberal as we who represent the cause and giv us notice through the press.

A Gleam of a World That's to Be.

BY ALBERT LANDON.

As a diver looks down for a beautiful gem
That is lost in the sands of the sea,
So I look down in the river of time
For a gleam of a world that's to be.

Oh, where shall I look for the wonderful key
That will open the portal I seek?
Is it sunk in the sands of a fathomless sea
Or hid in rocks of some mountainous peak?

I'v heard of a land far away in the East,
Where visions of heaven abound;
I'v searched in the words of prophet and priest,
Yet no way to that land hav I found.

But like bubbles that float on the face of a stream,
Or stars that are seen in a river,
For a moment only in beauty they gleam,
Then are lost to my vision forever.

Is there a proof I can safely trust,
Or is it all a child of the brain,
That the children of men who sleep in the dust
Shall awake from their slumbers again?

With the wonderful thought no more I'm content,
But search for the wisest, liv for the best;
Be just to my neighbor, true to my friend,
Let the gods and prophets provide for the rest.

Gods and Names of Gods.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Your visit to Egypt greatly interested me, for I had myself for many years been investigating Ægyptology. It seems to me to be true that the modern name Copt is the same as the old name Ægypt. The ancient Greek for Ægypt is Aiguptos, Latin Ægyptus, the "g" in the latter being hard, but now-a-days used by us with the soft sound. The first syllable Ai or Æ is the old Greek prefix, serving the purpose of a species of what modern grammarians call "article." Often in such cases where this prefix had been incorporated long ago with the word another or a newer form of article is superadded. Thus in classic Greek we hav "Hee Aiguptos" (feminin) for Egypt as a country, and "Ho Aiguptos" (masculin), the term used by Homer for the river Nile (see Odyssey iv, 447, etc.). It appears that the country was called Egypt by the Greeks and those nations which were of kindred origin with them, but that the true name was Ham or Cham. A comparison philological of these terms Ham and Egypt has furnished me with what I consider as the true origin of the latter of the two. It is well known that Ammon, Hamon, or Amen meant the Great Hidden, the unknown God. The affix on or en expressed the manifestation of the Ham, Oum, or Am, so that possibly the name of the manifestation or personification was at some time substituted for the name of the original Great Hidden.

We find this very same thing at any rate taking place where Brahma or Brahman stands from the impersonal Brahm itself. I conceive that the term Egypt is an Aryan rendering of the name Ham. A root which we may write as kob, kub, kyb, or kib was widely diffused through some of the Aryan languages, the meaning being secreting, covering, hence cup, kophin, or coffin, kibotos (the ark); but the same or a similar root at the same time supplies words meaning head, skull, etc., which fact, however, does not present impenetrable intricacy. It is rather striking that we should find in the fables a personage by the name of Ægyptus, said to hav been a king of Egypt. He was the son of Belus (but according to others, son of Neptune; and what is the difference?) and brother of Danaus Quere. Was not that king the same as Ammon himself? Was he not called son of Belus to show that the ultimate occult God of the Egyptians was taken from an Aryan source? and was he not called brother of Danaus to show that the older Greek population had their system similar, and about the same epoch had derived from the same Aryan source? This point seems to me to be worth pursuing further, and indeed it may be found in the end that Ham is a translation of an Aryan theological name into Egyptian instead of the vice versa I suggested above; or again, that it was not an Egyptian word at all, but a word borrowed along with the theology attached to it. Solomon is Saul (or Sol) Ammon; Bethlehem is Beth-el-Ham; Chemosh is a form of the name, and so is Milcom (Melek-om, or Ham the king). Ham is the origin of all force, and Hamon is the operation of it in the visible creation, both good and evil, the operation of the complete divinity, while Osiris was a more special manifestation as an advocate of man, and champion against the Typhon.

Let us inquire whether other ancient peoples had gods similar to Ham in character, that is, gods after whom they called themselvs. The Kelts had their Keli, or the great Hidden or Unseen and Incomprehensible, who has come down to our day by the Druidic inheritance. The root of his name is found in the Kymmric verb kelu, to hide or conceal, and the Latin kelo or celo, meaning the same. Keli and Belus are supposed to be the same name originally, K and P or B being exceedingly interchangeable between certain Aryan nations, as for instance, at the beginning of a word such as Philip and Pascha, the Gaels cannot for their life pronounce the P, though its sound is abundantly found in their language. Therefore we find them saying Keasg, while the Kymmry of Wales say Pasg (from pascha, the passover); and the Isle of Man Gaels say Killep instead of Philip. Again you may depend upon it that the words Belgians and Gauls or Gaels were originally one and the same word. The Kelts had their ultimate hidden deity, the great Keli, and their name as Kelts is after him, and a variation of his name was Beli and Belin, from which we get Plennydh, the chief of the Druidic trinity, and this Plennydh stands in the same relation to Keli or Beli as Brahma stands to Brahm.

Next take the Gothic race. What is their ultimate hidden divinity? It was Got or God, and they were called after his name, or he after theirs. This name is the very same as Khoda, the ark-hidden divinity of some of the Himalaya tribes. Scot is same as Goth, the letter s being the old prefix or article. I doubt much that god and good convey the same idea (as some assert). God is akin to hide or hyde, to cover, and hide or hyde, skin, which, by the way, is identical with the Latin cutis, skin, and the Latin cutis is allowed by all good etymologists to be of the same origin as the Greek word Keutho, to hide or cover; but the root is still more intelligible in the Kymmric verb, cudhio, to secrete. There is a strong suspicion that the English word good is of different origin and signification, namely, cognate with wood, wit, and wise, etc., and descriptiv of the productivness of nature's life.

Shem, Ham, and Japheth were a trinity of gods, and identical with the Druidic trinity, Plennydh, Alawn, and Gooron, only the order is different, for the Hebrews put Japheth last instead of second. Shem is the sun, same as Shemesh, and also of same root as Ha-Shamayin, the heavens. Shem answers to El the ultimate God of the Semitic race. His worshipers say they were descended from the man Shem, and nearly all other nations say that they had descended from their gods. Shem was probably a manifestation of El, just as Japheth or Jupiter was a manifestation of the hidden god of the Kelts and other Aryans. Japheth or Jupiter was simply IAO—father of the equinoctial, and he was a favorit manifestation of the Great Keli (or hidden) among the Druids, and his worship extended from Britain to Arabia and the Himalayas. This personage in a corrupt form displaced El or Allah at least in one case, and was known as Yahweh, Jehovah, or Jhavoh concerning which encroachment of this divinity upon the property (in worshipers) of another we shall speak again. It has been a question whether El of the Chaldees was the same name as Keli of the Kelts. El again is identified with Bel and Belus, and we know that Belus and Keli were the same. Query, whether the Chaldeans were so called after their god El? It has been maintained by some that the gods were heroes deified. Of course some heroes were canonized, but they never became real gods, the distinction being as clear as now between the Roman Catholic God and his canonized saints. The reverse was the fact, viz., that the gods were humanified or made to become men, or underwent anthropomorphism. Since nations represented themselvs as descended from their gods, by means of the intermediate divinities or manifestations, they found it necessary, when they made a change in their god, to turn the cat in the pan, and put their old gods upon a lower shelf and call them heroes and ancestors. And this anthropomorphism, no doubt, took place also under other circumstances. Jehovah is a different divinity from El, that is, of a different order, just as Osiris differed from Ammon. The real IAO, or Jehovah, was the God of the Manifestation, and the word Jesus (later) is the same word. He was the deity of the Jebusites, and their Melchisedec his priest. The Druids could never see the Keli at all, but the IAO (same as Ichavoh) they could see in the works of creation, the seasons of the year, the budding of spring, the glory of summer, the bounties of autumn, and the retrograde in winter. When the Chaldean family who in Abraham are said to hav paid some homage to Melchisedec, set their eyes on possessing the country, they adopted the god of the country, and finally the most important and powerful of their tribes was called after the name of their adopted god, namely, Judah. Thus Jebusites and Jews, though quite different peoples, carry the same identical name, with a slight variation. Finally the whole of the Hebrews were called by outsiders after this god, namely, Judæ, or Jews. But let it be remembered that the Hebrews changed the character of the divinity IAO so utterly as to render him to all practical purposes a different god. They, after all, worshiped El the Terrible under a new name, only abjuring certain streaks of astral devotions connected with him in other lands. The Biblical account affords us a good reliable clue to an ethnological truth and solid data in religious development, even though we may doubt whether Abraham and Melchisedec are strictly historical persons.

"The Most Ven'nd Myvyr Morganwg positivly denies that Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob are to be regarded as historical characters. It would be too much of a task in this short note to giv his interpretation of this triad. These are identical with Brahma, Vishnu, and Siva. Yo may ask how the two triads tally, forasmuch as the Indian three stand forth as if side by side, as like three men, while the Hebrew one come one after another by way of successiv generations. Bardism alone has the key to this mystery—Plennydh, Alawn, and Gooran, although as a triad we place them as the sublime three, side by side, still do come one after another in their physical development in the revolution of the year. The lameness of Jacob is not without mythic significance, and the whole story of the three as laid down in the Old Testament is as full of mythologic points as the most enthusiastic mythologistic theorist could desire."

At some remote period the worship of the IAO, which was certainly connected with the introduction of letters or alphabet (non-hieroglyphic), invaded Asia Minor and Arabia, and encroached on the nativ Sabean system with its El, Elohim, and Allah (all same) and the Druidic circles and cromlechs of these regions testify to the fact.

It would be interesting to explain the character called Melchisedec, which is so ridiculously misunderstood by all Judæ-Christian commentators. CORAVAR AMERIG.

A TRUTH SEEKER

Around the World.

Illustrated with forty cuts, and with a steel plate engraving of the author

BY D. M. BENNETT,

Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, author of "A Truth Seeker in Europe," "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," "Champions of the Church," etc., etc.

THREE VOLUMES FOR $5.00.

The Most Instruction for the Least Money of any Book of Travels yet Written.

In 1880 the Freethinkers of the world held an International Congress at Brussels, to which Mr. Bennett was sent as a delegate. He took the occasion to make the tour of Europe, and his observations were embodied in "A Truth Seeker in Europe" (price, $1.50). The letters were also published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and the readers were so well pleased with them that the proposition was made that he make the journey around the world, and giv the world the benefit of a Freethinker's observations. The proposition was accepted if the ones desiring such a work would advance five dollars each, the volumes to be dedicated to them. On July 30, 1881, Mr. Bennett began the journey, sending letters back to be published. The work will make

THREE VOLUMES OF NEARLY 900 PAGES EACH.

Those sending in five dollars before the completion of he work will hav their NAMES INSCRIBED IN THE DEDICATION OF THE VOLUMES.

The first volume describes Scotland, Ireland, England, including also an account of the Freethinkers' International Congress at London, in 1881, Holland, the Netherlands, Germany, Austria, Greece, Turkey. Smyrna, Ephesus, Rhodes, Cyprus, Beyrout, Baalbec to Damascus. There hav been many books of travel printed but none like this. IT IS THE ONLY ONE OF ITS KIND.

Mr. Bennett has a shrewd habit of seeing everything going on, and in his book he has faithfully chronicled the habits and customs of the different people of many places he visited. The every-day life of [illegible] laid before the reader by one who has them and beheld them with his own eyes. We feel sure this work is greatly superior to any account of a journey around the world we now hav.

ALL THE VOLUMES WILL BE ILLUSTRATED

Which adds greatly to the interest of the work, and with the close description will present Old-World places in a very familiar light.

The volumes separately will be $2. Those sending $5 now will get the first volume by return mail and the other two as soon as issued, which will be in a few months, or just as soon as they can be got ready. Those sending the $5 will hav their names in the dedication of the second volume.

Vol. I. mailed on receipt of $2.

Being an Account of the Formation and Development of the Canon.

By BRONSON C. KEELER.

Price, cloth, 75 cents. Paper, 50 cents.

This book should be read by every clergyman, layman, scholar, and Liberal.

I hav read Mr. Keeler's book with great pleasure and profit. He gives, in my opinion, a clear and intelligent account of the growth of the Bible. He shows why books were received as inspired, and why they were rejected. He does not deal in opinions, but in facts; and for the correctness of his facts. he refers to the highest authorities. He has shown exactly who the Christian fathers were, and the weight that their evidence is entitled to. The first centuries of Christianity are filled with shadow; most histories of that period simply tell us what did not happen, and even the statements of what did not happen are contradictory The falsehoods do not agree. Mr. Keeler must hav spent a great deal of time in the examination of a vast number of volumes, and the amount of information contained in his book could not be collected in years. Every minister, every college professor, and every man who really wishes to know something about the origin and growth of the Bible should read this book.—R. G. Ingersoll.

CONSULT!

VINELAND, N. J.

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES.

Spermatorrhea and Impotency,

as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excesses in mature years, or other causes, and producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, &c., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an

which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case. Some of them were in a terribly shattered condition—had been in the Insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness, Fits; others upon the verge of Consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

SYPHILIS positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system; GONORRHŒA, GLEET, Stricture, Orchitis, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

Middle-Aged and Old Men.

There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuation of the bladder, often accompanied by a slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen, will appear, or the color will be of a thin or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and torpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the organs.

☞ Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable and correspondence strictly confidential.

PRIVATE COUNSELOR.

Sent to any address securely sealed for two three-cent stamps, treating on Spermatorrhea or Seminal Weakness, giving its causes, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, followed by strong testimonials, backed by an affidavit as to their genuineness. Should be read by all. ☞ Remember no medicine is given. Address DR. R. P. FELLOWS, Vineland, New Jersey. Be sure and state in what paper you saw this.

[From the House and Home, N. Y.]

Among the successful physicians who hav departed from the narrow beaten track of orthodoxy, we may rank Dr. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J. His principles are true, his system based upon scientific fact.'

[From the (Mo.) Liberal.

The reputation of Dr. Fellows is sufficient to warran any one in reposing confidence in his skill and ability These in need of his aid should not fail to consult him at once. Procrastination is the thief of time and often costs the life of a human being."

Gems of Thought.

WHAT would justly be called flattery when offered to the powerful is a debt of humanity to the fallen.—Macaulay.

THAT Christianity should encourage a disposition to asceticism, which even Judaism could not check, was no more than might be expected from the language and conduct of its founder and his early disciples. Christ never married, and probably lived in complete chastity. Paul goes so far as to compare marriage unfavorably with celibacy. James upholds poverty as preferable to riches in the eyes of God. The whole of the New Testament abounds with passages in which present misery is declared to be the forerunner of future happiness and present prosperity of future suffering. This is the very spirit of monasticism, and it is not surprising that from such a root such fruits hav sprung. From a very early age devout Christians hav felt that in renouncing individual property, marriage, personal freedom, and the various other joys which life in the world offers, they were fulfilling the dictates of their religion and preparing themselvs for heaven.—Amberley's Analysis.

ALTHOUGH I be the basest of mankind,
From scalp to sole one slough and crust of sin,
Unfit for earth, unfit for heaven, scarce meet
For troops of devils, mad with blasphemy,
I will not cease to grasp the hope I hold
Of saintdom and to clamor, mourn, and sob,
Battering the gates of heaven with storms of prayer,
Hav mercy, Lord, and take away my sin.

Patient in this tall pillar, I hav borne
Rain, wind, frost, heat, hail, damp, and sleet, and snow;
And I had hoped that ere this period closed,
Thou wouldst hav caught me up into thy rest,
Denying not these weather-beaten limbs
The mead of saints, the white robe and the palm.
O take the meaning, Lord: I do not breathe,
Nor whisper, any murmur of complaint.
—Tennyson's Simeon Stylites.

MANY hav been drawn by the inevitable spell of asceticism to flee from opposing parents and unsympathizing friends in order to embrace it; others hav been destined from their infancy, like the Mexican and Peruvian youth, to wear the cowl and take the veil. But throughout the history of every order there has been the same fundamental idea sustaining its existence; the ideas, namely, that in becoming an ascetic, the person was consecrated to God, and became by that consecration purer, holier, and better than those who continued to pursue the ordinary avocations of secular life.—Amberley's Analysis.

IF a God of infinit power and boundless goodness permits injustice and suffering here, why not there? If it is said that that shocks our sense of justice and our feelings of humanity, and that we must not suppose God will do anything wrong or cruel, I reply that we, with our disposition, would not, if we had the power to prevent it, allow sufferings and wrong here. Perfect justice in some other state cannot be logically inferred from inequality, injustice, and wrong in this state.—Underwood.

O REMEMBER that my life is wind; mine eye shall no more see good. The eye of him that hath seen me shall see me no more: thine eyes are upon me and I am not. As the cloud is consumed and vanisheth away, so he that goeth down to the grave shall come up no more.—Job vii, 7-10.

"AY, but to die, and go," alas!
Where all hav gone and all must go!
To be the nothing that I was
Ere born to life and living woe.

Count o'er the joys thine hours hav seen,
Count o'er thy days from anguish free,
And know, whatever thou hast been,
'Tis something better, not to be. —Byron.

MANY are the expedients which men of corrupt minds hav invented to deceive themselvs. Some satisfy themselvs with the zeal they express for the profession of the true religion, though they dishonor that profession by unrighteous works. Others expect to obtain salvation by the strength of their faith, utterly mistaking the very meaning of the word "faith," apprehending it to signify credulity instead of fidelity, and that they should be accepted for being confident instead of faithful servants. Some depend upon certain things that can be done for them by others, as if anything could, in the religious sense, be of advantage to any man, which does not at all make him a better man. Others rely upon the merits of Christ, deceiving themselvs with an expectation that Christ will rescue them from punishment, though they reject all the motivs by which his gospel proposes to rescue them from sin. These and all other expedients of the like nature—all expedients whatsoever, intended to supply the want of the one thing necessary—a virtuous life—are false and hollow.—Dr. Samuel Clarke.

WHAT is noble?—that which places
Truth in its enfranchised will,
Leaving steps, like angel's traces,
That mankind may follow still!

E'en though scorn's malignant glances
Prove him poorest of his clan.
He's the Noble who advances
Freedom and the cause of man!
—Charles Swain.

To teach woman to claim what is her inalienable birthright is the first great step toward lifting the whole human race upon a higher plane; to raise the mother and to educate the children; for only free, independent, educated, self-supporting mothers can bear and rear noble, grand, beautiful, and perfect children. Take right hold then, my sisters, and do what you find to do and do it now. Begin to-day; fear not public criticism. If you can drive a team, haul wood, plow the land, or fill any professional position, do so, regardless of the fear of being thought out of your sphere. Is it more degrading to carry home a sack of flour from the mill than to scour a floor? or is it more unwomanly to plow a furrow than to stand at the wash-tub? or is it any more laborious?—Elmina D. Slenker.

Odds and Ends.

ALL San Francisco is clamoring for brass bands in churches. Extreme measures must be taken to keep San Francisco people awake, evidently.—Cleveland Voice.

It makes very little difference what the weather may be in the other parts of the country in April and May, they always hav Hot Springs in Arkansas.—Detroit Free Press.

A VERMONT man took a bean-pole and stirred up a skunk to see what the animal would do. He found out, and then went to a lonely place in the woods to decide what to do with himself.

THE correspondence of the actress Rachel is about to be published in Paris. She has been dead so long that probably not more than three or four old gentlemen are now living who will be seriously annoyed by the publication.—Somerville Journal.

THE New York Young Men's Christian Association, which tried to get the remains of Guiteau to exhibit, are now trying to secure Blanche Douglass it is alleged. It was hoped Miss Douglass would halt in her downward career, but maybe she is past redemption, and will engage with the association.—Peck's Sun.

A CERTAIN young man brought his affianced down from the country to see the sights. One day while they were passing the confectioners the swain noticed in the window a placard bearing the announcement, "Ice-cream, $1 per gal." "Well," said the young man as he walked into the saloon, "that's a pretty steep price to charge for one gal, but, Maria, I'll see you through, no matter what it costs. Here's a dollar, waiter; ice-cream for this gal."

A NEW YORKER who had business in one of the mountain villages, last week, was followed to the depot, when ready to take the train, by a nativ, who continually inquired:

"Are you an undertaker?"

"Oh, no."

"Didn't know but you was an undertaker, looking for an opening here, and I'd like to pool with you. I own the graveyard here, and we could run the business to suit ourselvs. Are you a doctor?"

"No."

"Didn't know but you was. I hav got the best place in town for a drug store, and I'd furnish the medicins and you do the doctoring, and we'd pool. Maybe you're a lawyer?"

"No, my friend."

"I thought if you was we could fix it all right, one of my brothers being the justice of the peace and the other the constable, and I'd be the silent partner and sue every man in town to make business. Likely enough you are a preacher?"

'Wrong again."

"Well, I'm sorry. I'v got a mortgage on the best church building here, and if you was only the right kind of a preacher we'd pool in, and in less'n three months we'd hav the dead wood on every soul worth saving."

"ARE you traveling alone?" asked a tall, agricultural-looking gentleman, approaching a lady who occupied two seats in a crowded car.

"No, sir," she replied.

"May I ask, Who's with you?" asked the man, looking around vainly for some other place to store himself.

"My husband," snapped the lady, with flashing eyes. "My husband is traveling with me."

"Oh! ah! excuse me," and the tall man straightened up and prepared to take a standing ride.

"Is that seat engaged?" asked a dashing, well-dressed young fellow of the lady five minutes later.

"No, sir," she replied, and down he plumped.

"I say, ma'am!" protested the tall man, "is that your husband?"

"No, it isn't, and you needn't ask any more questions!" retorted the woman.

"But you said you were traveling with him," persisted the tall man.

"So I am," snorted the lady.

"Where is he?" insisted the tall man.

"He's in the baggage car in a coffin," replied the lady.

"I beg your pardon, ma'am," said the tall man, humbly; "I honestly beg pardon. I won't ask if he's dead, but you'll excuse me for thinking that if you and he hav been married long he's deuced smart to travel around screwed up in a box, if you are on the same trip and it's likely to last long."

WHERE I DRAW THE LINE.

I used to think that I should like to go to heaven, but I hav changed my mind lately. I suppose it is a very pleasant place, well lighted and ventilated, and all that sort of thing, but I could not stand the inhabitants. I am not over particular about my associates, not exactly squeamish, you know, but I really must draw the line somewhere.

It would be anything but a pleasure to hav to see Henry Ward Beecher forever sitting round on rosy clouds, folding his wings in fat contentment and winking at the female angels, or Talmage dancing an everlasting loose-jointed jig of exultation over the actors and other professionals who were being roasted for running opposition to his Brooklyn show; and I don't think that the long rows of smug deacons and lank elders, all bursting with gratified conceit, and congratulating each other on having worked the salvation racket successfully, would hav a soothing influence on my feelings, and yet these would be the very aristocracy of heaven, so to speak.

I should also hav to associate with all the glorified negro murderers from the South, and holy bank defaulters from the East, with the psalm-singing, prayer-shouting criminals from all sections, and last, but not least, I should hav to meet that inspired Christian gentleman, Charles J. Guiteau; and there's where I draw the line.

No; send me to hades with Spinoza and Paine and Bob Ingersoll, and all the good-hearted, honest fellows that I myself hav known, who didn't care a rap for any church that ever was built. I prefer good company to good lodgings any day, and when it comes to Guiteau I weaken.—George Kyle in the Judge.

PRICE, $3.00 per annum; single copies, seven cents. Specimen copies sent on receipt of a two-cent stamp to pay postage.

The Investigator is devoted to the Liberal cause in religion; or in other words, to universal mental liberty. Independent in all its discussions, discarding superstitious theories of what never can be known, it devotes its columns to things of this world alone, and leaves the next, if there be one, to those who hav entered its unknown shores. Believing that it is the duty of mortals to work for the interests of this world, it confines itself to the things of this life entirely. It has arrived at the age of fifty-one years, and asks for a support from those who are fond of sound reasoning, good reading, reliable news, anecdotes, science, art, and a useful family journal. THE

BIBLE—WHENCE AND WHAT?

BY

Richard B. Westbrook, D.D., LL.B.,

A theologian of high degree, and a counsellor learned in the law, on the origin and character of the Bible.

The author, though possessing all the prerogativs of a clergyman, repudiates the title "Rev." as a relic of Brahmanical caste and Roman sacerdotalism. He is entirely independent of ecclesiastical supervision and censure.

The questions, Where did the books of the Bible come from? What is their authority? and, What is the real source of dogmatic theology? are treated fearlessly in the light of history, philosophy, and comparativ religions. It is impossible to giv even a condensed statement of what is itself a marvelous condensation.

WHOLE LIBRARIES ARE HERE CONCENTRATED INTO ONE LITTLE BOOK.

The author's conclusions are, of course, against the supernatural origin and infallibility of the Bible, while the dogmas of the dominant theology are shown to be priestly perversions of the ancient mythologies.

The principles of natural religion are ably stated, and the claims of true morality are warmly adqocated.

The strong commendations of the secular prass show that is just the book for these times of agitation and "revision."

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Vol. 9. No. 30. { PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY D. M. BENNETT. } New York, Saturday, July 29, 1882. { SCIENCE HALL, 141 8th St., NEAR BROADWAY. } $3 per year.

Notes and Clippings.

THE boy was not far out of the way who, when asked what Sunday was made for, said, "To go on an excursion." The hotel-keepers are of the same mind.

FELIX ADLER has given the striking freight handlers some good advice—and one hundred dollars. He resigned from the Free Religious Association some time ago.

THE pope has begged several leading cardinals who are anxious to escape from Rome not to leave him, as from one moment to another he may require their presence. "Beg" is a very good word to use in connection with the pope.

IT is reported that King Humbert of Italy is a skeptic in religious matters, if not a Freethinker. That probably accounts for his honesty and patriotism in paying his father's debts out of his own pocket instead of allowing them to be saddled on the state.

THE revised New Testament meets with so little favor in the Methodist church South that it is not used even for Sunday-school lessons. Would it not be a good idea to get the Lord to rewrite the Bible in the presence of reliable witnesses? Ministers to be debarred, of course, as they would object to such passages as do not suit their different denominations.

OF the shareholders of the Bank of New Zealand ninety-four are parsons. Lay up your treasures, brethren, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt. We who are your pastors will toil among you and be satisfied with a mortgage or two upon this sinful earth. Shell out your threepennies regularly, dearly beloved, and Jehovah will provide the rest.

THE war in Egypt has been carefully studied by the World's Crisis, the organ of the Adventists in America. It admits the difficulty of interpreting prophecy by military movements, but believes that the saints ought to watch the course of events with Bible in hand. It is quite sure that the European Conference is "another united effort of the revelator's four angels to hold the four winds."

IN Kentucky the legislature has expressly provided that no religious test shall be applied to a witness in any civil action, but there is no statute governing the question in criminal cases. In a recent murder trial the objection was raised to one of the witnesses that he was an Athei and therefore that his evidence was not admissible. The question went to the Court of Appeals, which decides that in criminal as well as civil cases no inquiry can be made into the religious belief of any witness.

MISS GREYSON, who had for many years been bedridden with spinal disease, at Erie, Pa., believed that she could be cured by prayer. She talked with the attending physician about it, and he said that he would arrange for a meeting of devout persons at the house of a neighbor, when her recovery should be earnestly implored. At the appointed time she sprang from her couch and declared herself miraculously recovered. But the doctor had called no meeting, and no praying had been done.

BARNES, the Kentucky evangelist, believes in the entire efficacy of repentance. In a recent exhortation he said: "A man can confess Jesus better when he is drunk than when he is sober, for he can just come and throw himself limber, like a rag, into the arms of Jesus. Suppose a man comes here limber drunk and confesses Christ, and then goes out and puts another quart of whisky under his belt, and, going home, he falls off his horse and breaks his neck, that man will go straight to heaven as sure as God is God; and if he don't I would be willing to go to hell for him." If heaven is full of "limber drunks," we will buy a ticket for the other place. What with hanged and unhanged murderers and "limber drunks," the population of heaven must be a rather scaly lot.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Bradford (Eng.) Telegraph tries to make out that Garibaldi, while "despising the ecclesiastical system, still revered the Bible." As matter of fact, the general was an extreme Freethinker for many years before his death He grew sick of religion altogether. He became president of an Atheistic society, and in 1880 he wrote thus: "Man has created God, not God man. Yours ever, Garibaldi." More statements to the same purpose will be found in Bent's "Life of Garibaldi," where they are very much deplored.

A TOTAL abstinence society's committee urged Mayor King of Philadelphia to order the police to obtain evidence against rumsellers who violate the Sunday law. "So you want me to turn the police into spies?" he replied. Then he explained his idea of police duty in that matter to be that patrolmen should compel a closing of front doors and windows, but never enter a barroom except to quell a disturbance. "If you desire to convict these violators of the Sunday law," he added, "you must get the requisit evidence yourselvs. That is not the proper work of the police." Mayor King evidently has some regard for the Constitution.

A HOT fight is going on in Milwaukee over the question of Sunday observance. The city has a large German Element, and the theaters and beer gardens hav been open on Sundays. A petition was recently circulated for closing the theaters, and it was signed by many merchants. This brought out the resentment of the Germans, and, under the direction of the brewers, a system of boycotting has been employed against all tradesmen whose signatures appear on the petition. The brewers are the prime movers, because they know that the closing of the theaters would be followed by an attack on the beer gardens and saloons. Much bitterness has been engendered.

FEW problems, says the Sun, hav puzzled archæologists more than the origin of the splendid ruins in Cambodia. For the further examination of these ruins the French government sent out a mission under M. Delaporte at the end of last year. After a careful examination of the remains at Angkor, M. Delaporte comes to the conclusion that these ancient Khmer temples were dedicated to Brahmanism. Buddhism and serpent worship hav been proposed as solutions of the problem; but it has not been before conjectured that the ruins had any connection with Brahma. M. Delaporte professes to find in the rich sculpture records of the exploits of Rama and the glories of Vishnu, as well as emblems of other of the gods and heroes of Brahmanism.

EVERY Sunday a clergyman of some denomination goes to the state prison at Carsons, and treats the prisoners to a sermon. Recently the reverend gentleman who had been taking his turn at the theological wheel accosted an intelligent-looking convict in the yard with, "I never see you at divine service?" "No," answered the prisoner (in for an unsuccessful stock speculation). "No, my work out here in the yard makes it impossible for me to attend." "Ah, sorry to hear it. We've just had a very pleasant time—services and choir singing and everything the same as in our church. The only difference (this quizzically) was in the congregation." "Yes," returned the convict, calmly, "this congregation has been caught." His reverence gazes afield and silently admires the beauties of nature.

RELIGION has a very softening influence upon men. We hav observed that deacons are always tender toward the brute creation, and that whom a deacon loveth he chasteneth if he can. This softening influence was recently shown in Oxford, England, in a striking manner. Some jackdaws confidingly built their nests upon the chapel walls of New College in that town, and because their noise interfered with the Christian service within the authorities had the birds bricked up. The congregation, we are told, "heard the cries of these unfortunate creatures daily grow less till, on the fifty day, death came to their release." And he who heeds the falling of sparrows could probably better hear the prayers of Christians after the jackdaws were bricked up. We hope the jackdaws were converted before they died. To the tender mercies of Christian pietists, O Lord, we commend our enemy!

THE congress assembled at Madrid toward the end of last month to discuss the best mode of furthering the cause of education has broken up after holding a great number of sittings and passing several resolutions, the most important of which was that primary education should be gratuitous and compulsory, and that manual labor should be taught in all primary schools. The Froebel method of teaching was recommended for use in all infant schools; but a resolution in favor of allowing women to become candidates as teachers in the higher schools was rejected. Spain is still a long way behind most other European countries in regard to education, but it appears from some statistics referred to during the congress that the number of primary schools has increased from 24,000 to 29,000 within the last twenty-two years. The teachers are badly and unpunctually paid, and the consequence is that they are, as a rule, very unfit for their posts. Spain is pre-eminently a Christian country.

IT is pleasant to read in the Jewish Messenger that in various parts of Russia Christians exerted themselvs most activly to assist Jews. In the government Cherson Christian neighbors erected a barricade around a Jew's brewery and watched throughout the night. At another place Christians put out the flames consuming Jewish property, and a lady of rank, living at a distance, came over to distribute aid, and took off some of her own clothes to clothe a nearly naked Jewess. Many similar cases are cited.—Sun. It would be pleasanter reading were it not for the fact that the persecutions were likewise the work of Christians. There were Christians on the other side of that barricade, willing and anxious to tear down the brewery; it was Christians who kindled the flames, the other Christians put out, and Christians first stripped the Jewish maiden the other Christian relieved. And the destroying Christians were undoubtedly more orthodox than the saving ones. It has always been so, and probably always will be.

IN a controversy between the Roman Catholic bishop of Vincennes and a priest at Brownsburg, the Supreme Court of Indiana has recently decided an important question touching church property, which is said to hav been adjudicated in this case for the first time in this country. It appears that when Father O'Donovan, the pastor of the Catholic congregation at Brownsburg, was removed from that position by Bishop Chatard he refused to surrender the premises which he had been occupying as a parsonage and using as a church. His successor was thereby prevented from taking possession and entering upon the performance of his duties. The bishop thereupon brought suit to oust the priest in possession and to recover the property. In the lower court it was held that the relation between bishop and priest was that of landlord and tenant; that in this case the tenancy was a yearly one, and that the tenant could not be dispossessed without a three-months' notice. As this notice had not been received by Father O'Donovan the court refused to disturb him. This judgment is reversed by the Supreme Court, which holds that a priest cannot be considered as the tenant of his bishop, but that the relation existing between them is more like that of master and servant. While the priest is not the hired servant of the bishop, he is, under the laws of the church, appointed to his position by the bishop, and by him may be removed from it, and when so removed he has no claim to the church property, and is entitled to no notice to quit. He must surrender the premises with his office. What kind of a precedent is this to be established in a country in which there is supposed to be no connection between the church and state?

A Truth Seeker Around the World

Singapore City and Island.

SINGAPORE, April 5, 1882.

DEAR FRIENDS AT HOME: Time has hung heavily on my hands in Java, and here more than any other point I have visited. To sit down and wait twelve days for a steamer in a sweltering climate, and when the whole place and its surroundings can be seen in two days, and when withal one is particularly anxious to be getting on toward home, is very tedious indeed; but I saw no help for it but patience. I have a ticket paid for to Yokohama, and it would cost more than double as much to buy another ticket to Hong Kong by some other line as my board here will cost; so I have been looking around the city and the island on which it stands, visiting the museum and library, reading some, writing some, and passing the time as best I could. Of course I must tell you something about this flourishing city and country.

Singapore, originally from the Sanskrit Singhapura, means the lion city, though others claim that it means the touching-place, because it is a point where all vessels between India and China have to pass and stop. It is situated on the southern part of an island by the same name, twenty-seven miles long and fourteen wide, and separated from the southern part of the Malayan peninsula by a narrow strait, in places but about half a mile in width. Within a compass of nine or ten miles south are some thirty small islands or islets, formerly principally occupied by fishermen and pirates, but now some of them are partially cultivated by natives. It is one hundred miles around them.

The island of Singapore was ceded to England by one of the Malayan kings or maharajahs or sultans in 1819. The population of the island at that time was one hundred and fifty natives; now the city alone has 140,000, and is a place of commercial importance, being a point from whence much of the produce of the surrounding country is shipped, and where a large amount of goods from other countries is transhipped in various directions. Great numbers of sailing vessels call here, and with several lines of steamers it is a regular stopping-place. Here they all coal on their way, going east and west, north and south. Very extensive coal sheds are located next to the wharves, containing 100,000 tons; this of course comes from England. The docks and wharves are of a good character, and the warehouses for merchandise are very extensive, holding immense quantities.

The city of Singapore is as level as a floor, and has wide, smooth streets, that are kept clean and orderly. The island is gently undulating, with several slight hills, and profusely dotted with plantations and cheerful-looking bungalows, occupied by the English and Chinese. As it is but seventy-five miles from the equator, it of course luxuriates in all the tropical productions. The fan palms are numerous, their beautiful tops spreading with such regularity as to add greatly to the loveliness of the landscape. Cocoanut-trees and bananas are extensively grown. Coffee and tea plantations are increasing in numbers.

Singapore, including the island, the city, the neighboring islets, Malacca and the island of Penang, form what is called the Straits Settlements, and are united in one colonial government, of which Singapore is the capital. Penang I have before partially described—an island fifteen miles long and nine broad, lying near the west side of the Malay peninsula, at the northern entrance of the straits of Malacca. On the main-land, opposite the island, is what is called the province of Wellesley, a strip of the coast, forty-five miles in length, and averaging eight miles in width. This belongs to the English, and forms a part of the Settlements, the same lying between the fifth and sixth degrees of north latitude.

Malacca is also on the west coast of the peninsula, about one hundred and twenty miles from Singapore, being a strip of country forty-two miles in length and varying from eight to twenty-four miles in width. The principal town is Malacca, containing 74,000 inhabitants, 50 of whom are Europeans, 48,000 Malays, 14,000 Chinese, and 3,000 natives of India.

Malacca is one of the oldest European settlements in the East, having been taken possession of by the Portuguese in 1511 and held by them till 1641, when the Dutch, after repeated attempts, succeeded in driving them out. The Dutch held it till 1795, when it was seized by the English and held by them till 1818, at which date it was restored to the Dutch; but in the treaty of 1824 it was again restored to the English in exchange for the East India Company's settlement, Bencoolen, on the west coast of Sumatra. Malacca was formerly a place of much commercial importance, being the grand center for the trade of the Malay peninsula as well as of Sumatra; but Penang, first, and then Siagapore, have taken all this trade away, and now it is only the center of a great undeveloped agricultural district. The English have also taken possession of a portion of the west coast of the peninsula between Penang and Malacca, in extent twenty miles in length and ten in width. Upon one pretext and another they will undoubtedly seize and annex one portion after another until they have the whole of the peninsula under their power.

The duty on the export of tin forms the largest item of the Straits Settlements, this valuable metal being largely produced in various parts of the peninsula. The country is also very rich in the principal tropical productions, to which the growing of coffee, tea, and cinchona are steadily being added on the high lands, rice being the great crop of the low lands.

The Straits ports are all wholly free from duties on imports or exports, nor are tonnage duties levied for general purposes; and the only tax to which shipping entering this port is liable consists of a very moderate one of three cents per registered ton for the support of the lighthouses at the entrances of the Straits.

Besides tin, the exports comprise sugar, pepper, nutmegs, mace, sago, tapioca, rice, buffalo hides and horns, rattans, gutta percha, India rubber, gambier, gums, coffee, dye stuffs, tobacco, etc. The united exports and imports of the three colonies are as follows: Singapore, $121,124,060; Penang, $46,137,050; Malacca, $5,831,495; total, $173,092,605.

I will remark that the currency is the same in denomination and value as our own, dollars and cents, which is pleasant to meet with. The coins are dollars, twenty cents, ten cents, and five cents, in silver, and one cent in copper.

The number and tonnage of vessels arriving at the Straits Settlements during four years were as follows: 1876, number, 10,166; tonnage, 2,548,722. 1877, number, 9,761; tonnage, 2,495,539. 1878, number-12,473; tonnage, 3,360,638. 1879, number, 11,879; tonnage, 2,785,843.

The government of the Straits consists of a governor, aided by an executive and legislative council, the latter body being composed of eleven official members and six unofficial, but all Europeans. The natives have no voice in the government.

The military force consists of half a battery of artillery and one battalion of an infantry regiment, of which one company is stationed at Malacca, two and a portion of the artillery at Penang, and the remainder at Singapore.

In population the Malay race predominates in Penang and Wellesly, the Chinese coming next. In Malacca the proportion of Malays is still larger; while in Singapore the Chinese have considerable of a majority. According to a census of 1871 the races were as follows: Singapore, Europeans, 904; Malays, 19;250; Chinese, 54,120; natives of India, etc., 13,300. Penang, Europeans, 513; Malays, 20,110; Chinese, 22,720; natives of India, etc., 7,100. Wellesley, Europeans, 96; Malays, 51,100; Chinese, 14,000; natives of India, etc., 10,000. Malacca, Europeans, 47; Malays, 57,474; Chinese, 13,456; natives of India, etc., 3,000.

Singapore, according to census of one year ago, presents the following: Europeans, Americans, etc., 2,769; Armenians, 88; Jews, 172; Eurasians (of European half parentage), 3,094; Chinese, 86,766; Malays, 22,155; other nationalities, 24,175. Total, 139,208.

The sources from which the revenue is raised are alike in all parts of the straits. They consist chiefly of a stamp duty, the monopolies of preparing and retailing opium for smoking, and the sale of spirits and other excisable commodities, which are farmed out to private individuals, generally to the Chinese. Those articles which produce intoxication chiefly pay the expenses of the government, and this body licenses those death-dealing articles to secure their own life. The land revenue comprises the proceeds of sales of public lands, quit rents, tithes, and fees on transfer; judicial fines and fees, the post-office, the light dues, and a few miscellaneous items make up the remaining sources of revenue.

Schools have been established with characteristic English generosity. The Raffles Institution is for both boys and girls, and has some fifteen teachers. There is also a Malay college, with one English and fourteen Malay teachers. The missionaries and churches have also established some schools.

The Raffles Museum and Library is a very creditable institution, occupying the same commodious and imposing-looking building with the Raffles Educational Institution, located near the shore of the bay, and commanding a beautiful view of the harbor and shipping, with the adjacent pleasure grounds, etc. The museum contains an interesting collection in natural history pertaining to this colony and the neighboring islands. The assortment of stuffed birds and animals, snakes, coral formations, etc., is very fine, and is excelled in but few museums, especially where a specialty is made of this part of the world. From the representations made this must be a perfect heaven for snakes, for the variety of stuffed and preserved snakes is large and varied. One of the pythons, the skin of which is carefully stuffed and the skeleton neatly prepared, is twenty feet in length and four or five inches through. It was killed in this locality. Some of the snakes are really beautiful in color, spots, and variegations. The display of butterflies, beetles, etc., is particularly fine. The largest of the butterflies are seven inches across. The bugs and beetles are very brilliant. The collection of sea shells is very large, and embraces very many beautiful varieties. The specimens of the botanical productions of the country, including woods, plants, seeds, grain, etc., are numerous, as are also the minerals, ores, stones, etc. The collection of native manufactures, including cloths, domestic articles, weapons of war, musical instruments, native houses, boats, etc., is large and curious. But I missed the gods here, which usually form a large share of museum collections. This is probably not a godly locality.

The library contains some ten thousand volumes for lending to members, with a department for reference, and London papers and periodicals. It is an interesting place to pass a few days, especially to one who has seen little of the news of the world for many weeks. I spent some of my leisure time here, and read with regret of the heavy floods in the Mississippi valley and the great loss in consequence. I read with more pleasure of Mr. Bradlaugh's re-election from Northampton. If this third decision of the people of that borough that Mr. Bradlaugh shall represent them in the House of Commons could influence the Christian bigots and flunkies to accord him justice, it would be very acceptable to hundreds of thousands of the lovers of the right, but perhaps that is hardly to be expected, but a repetition of the wrongs that have so often been perpetrated. It is Christian policy to exercise power to suppress justice and crush unbelievers whenever they possess it. It is their day now, but it is hoped that the day for reason and justice will come after awhile.

I visited the botanical gardens, located some three miles from the city, and found them extensive and well laid-out grounds, containing over one hundred acres and a great variety of tropical trees and plants. There are also several houses for birds of different kinds, and within the grounds is a pleasant lake in which white and black swans were gracefully swimming around. I also visited a Chinese private garden, about as far out in another direction, owned by by a rich Chinaman—the one, by the by, who entertained General Grant when here—which contains many varieties of curious plants not in the botanical garden. Among them were some twenty plants of the magnificent Victoria Regia, one of the most splendid water plants in existence. The leaves, fully five feet in diameter, and round, lie as flat upon the water as a vast platter, with two inches of the edge turned up like the copper bottom of a large boiler. The flower is a beautiful white, large in size, and in keeping with the plant. There are other fine water plants growing here with beautiful flowers, but I did not learn their names. I was much interested in a style of trained plants I saw there; they seemed like a hardy, slow-growing species of shrub, with small glossy leaves, growing compactly together, somewhat like dwarf box. They are trained in the forms of ships, pagodas, houses, lions, bears, dragons, fish, and even men and women; in the latter cases artificial heads are supplied, as eyes are in the case of animals, fishes, etc. One would hardly believe that a shrub could be trained to present so many shapes and to look so nearly like animals, temples, ships, etc. In the same grounds are many rare plants and curious specimens of Chinese skill. The summer house contains a large bronze image of Buddha, with numerous animals and large birds also in bronze.

CHINESE CUSTOMS.

Many of the Chinese are wealthy and have fine residences, with very imposing entrances, which are often decorated with landscapes and fine views. Only a small portion of the Chinese, however, are wealthy; as with other nationalities the large proportion are toilers and poor. All the heavy work is done by Chinese coolies; they load and unload vessels carrying the freight to and from the warehouses on their shoulders by means of carrying-poles, or in heavy carts drawn by Chinese power when the distance amounts to considerable. They run many thousands of the small boats, called sampans. They carry around the city all sorts of merchandise upon their shoulders with their spring-balancing sticks. I often see them with heavy loads of vegetables of various kinds weighing two or three hundred pounds; and I have several times seen them carrying on their shoulders in this way, in covered tubs, manure (night soil) for three or four miles out into the country to their gardens. A people that will thus carry manure on their backs for miles to enrich the ground must be set down as industrious and deserving.

It is interesting to see them eating in front of their eating shops on the streets. A table, say ten feet long, is set out with their dishes of queer-looking eatables, everything chopped up much like mincemeat, only not quite so fine, so they can handle it with their chopsticks. There are benches around these tables, much as we have, but they do not sit on them as we do, but squat on them with their feet, as is the universal custom in this oriental world, where they busily apply themselves and their chopsticks in transferring their various kinds of chopped food (mostly vegetables) to their mouths. Each one has a small cup of salt water, or brine, before him, with which he salts his viands to suit his taste; he also applies his curry and chilli (pepper) in the same way. It is curious to see how expertly they use their slender chopsticks in taking up small mouthfuls of these various dishes, dip them into the brine, or into the curry or other dressing, as they desire. I don't suppose their style of food or of serving it up would suit the taste of a European or an American, but they seem to enjoy it hugely and attend to putting it out of sight without regard to who may choose to watch them. But I wonder why they do not sit on their benches as people ought to instead of squatting on their haunches, with their knees sticking up above their mouths. The Chinese who thus eat at their street restaurants are coolies, and have no clothing, as a rule, save their waist-cloths; and it looks funny to see their yellow bodies, knees, and shanks closely huddled around these long tables, perhaps as many as a dozen in the distance of a square, for they seem to have their different kinds of business separated and in localities by themselves. Thus one square is occupied almost entirely by blacksmiths, another by carpenters, another by cabinet makers; another locality by jewelers and goldsmiths, another by shoemakers, another by tailors, and so on. It is an interesting study to walk through the streets where their busy shops are located and see how industriously they are applying themselves to the various avocations they are pursuing; and it is easy to see that they are an ingenious and industrious people. They do not sit on their haunches while at their work so much as practiced by the Hindoos, but stand more like Europeans and Americans. But I am satisfied that at many kinds of work they do not accomplish so much in the same time as an English or American mechanic would do. I noticed two men sawing off a stick of timber eight inches square, and used a fine whip saw for the purpose, one on each side, working away as leisurely as though if they got it off any time during the day it would answer every purpose, whereas a single American carpenter would easily saw off twenty such sticks to their one. A great fault in the matter is the inferior quality of the tools they work with; their saws, planes, etc., are inferior to those our mechanics use. If they adopt American tools they get along much faster, but they are slow to adopt western notions and styles; they are partial to the ways and customs they are familiar with from their childhood, and they will even break up labor-saving machines, regarding them as their enemies. Every machine which tends to render their labor unnecessary they consider calculated to take labor and food from them. Thus, when American plows have been introduced here, although the Chinese farmers and gardners admire the manner in which these improved implements turn up the soil, they look upon them with very unfriendly eyes, deeming them direct enemies to them because they perform the labor it would require twenty Chinamen to accomplish with their heavy hoes.

There are hundreds of retail stores in Singapore where Chinamen sell hardware, varieties, fancy goods, etc., some brought from their own country, but more from England, some even from America. Such American goods—more particularly cotton manufactures—as find their way here come by way of England, and are entered as English goods, America getting little credit for them. The Hindoos, here called Klings, also have stores of curiosities and oriental manufactures of sandal-wood, camphor-wood, shell-work, jewelry, etc., which they are very glad to sell at large profits. These also act as money-changers and small bankers and money-lenders. If an English engineer or other mechanic wishes to borrow from one to three hundred dollars to buy a horse and buggy, to furnish a house, or something of that kind, about his only chance is to apply to one of these Klings, or Chinese bankers, called chitties, who will lend the sum to him at such enormous interest as will amount to one hundred per cent by the time it is paid, and he (the chittie) is seen to take all the security he can get, and keeps close watch of the mechanic and looks strictly after his money. If the mechanic attempts to leave the place without paying the chittie the latter is after him with a legal writ, which stops him promptly. The chitties, of course, sometimes lose, but they exact such enormous interest that their profits in the aggregate are very large. There are cheap Chinese eating-places at the corners of the streets, where a bowl of soup, a cup of tea, or some queer-looking dish can be had for two or three cents, and which are pretty largely patronized. As I said before, the Chinamen here are of various grades, some wealthy, some in moderate circumstances, and many in the more humble condition of boatmen, carriers, stevedores, etc. I see a good many Chinese women here, and they are a tidy, good-looking portion of humanity. The larger share of the Chinamen are good-looking, well-developed, with good heads and faces, but the women look better than the men, and they are better dressed. Their garments are usually of dark-blue glazed muslin or cambric, and are of such pattern as my friends Mary Tillotson and Dr. Mary Walker could not fail to approve. They consist of a pair of rather loose pants, a loose dress or frock reaching to the knees, close around the neck, with an undergarment somewhat like a short chemise, but which I will not undertake to describe. There is no band or belt about the waist save that attached to the pants. There is but little weight to the entire dress, and that chiefly rests upon the shoulders, and the entire body is free and unencumbered. I must say I like it better than any native female dress I have met with in Asia, and it looks appropriate and well. It is so sensible a style of dress that I would be very willing to see our American women adopt it with such prudent modifications as they see fit to make. I am confident that a dress of this kind is far more harmless than tight corsets, tight lacing, with a heavy weight of skirts constantly dragging down upon the hips and preventing the wearers obtaining a full, free breath. The dress of the better portion of the Chinamen is not dissimilar to that of the women, looking like a pair of drawers, with a shirt worn outside. As the men are beardless, and they have a somewhat effeminate look, so it is sometimes slightly difficult at first sight to determine the sex; but the women do not shave their heads; they have no pigtails, and usually wear small rings in their ears. Besides, they are better looking. The small-footed grandees seen in China do not emigrate, and are not seen except in the parent country. But they generally have small feet.

ICE MANUFACTURE.

There are two ice factories in Singapore, one of which I visited, where ice is manufactured at the rate of five or ten tons per day by the atmospheric process, and without the use of any chemicals. The plan pursued is to create a vacuum in the chamber where the water to be frozen is, by pumping out the air as nearly as possible, by which the temperature is reduced below the freezing point. Stirrers are constantly in motion to keep the cooling water uniform in temperature. When completed it comes out in cakes some eight inches square, and three feet in length. For shipment it is simply covered with sawdust, and is sold by wholesale at half a cent per pound, and by retail at one cent per pound. It takes a large amount to supply the hotels and the numerous steamers which call here; and as it is always summer here, the demand is steady all the year around. The other factory uses ether, the evaporation of which carries off the heat and produces a freezing atmosphere, but I do not understand the process well enough to give an explanation of it. I hear of an American firm which is putting up ice machines in other Asiatic cities, by which ice is manufactured at an expense of one-tenth of a cent per pound; but I do not fully understand the process. By all the processes steam power is requisite, and it seems almost a self-contradiction that heat and steam are essential in making ice. In the factory I visited an engine of thirty or forty horse power is employed day and night at pumping out air. In Java ice imported from America or Norway is principally used. I think there are no ice factories in operation there. When I saw the sign, "American ice" sticking out I was impelled to step in and have a look at it

FORT CANNING

Stands on a pleasant hill in the rear part of the city, overlooking the city and harbor most beautifully, and here is a tall signal staff where the colors of all the steamers and ships are elevated as they arrive, telling at once to the citizens of the town every such arrival that takes place. And here is also given the signals of the various mail steamers about to depart, so that by this all can tell when to mail their letters. The guns on the embankment around the fort have full command of the city and the harbor in front. If a mutiny should break out, or an enemy should approach the town, John Bull will be ready for the emergency, and prepared to send shot and shell by guns and mortars where he chooses to direct them. He knows how to keep the upper hand wherever he plants his boots. The fort is neatly kept, and its commodious buildings for the soldiers, the stores of ammunition and other supplies, its shells, etc., with its many acres of green grass between, all look very pleasant. There is hardly ever a time but what two or more men-of-war or war steamers are lying in the harbor, at a distance of a mile or two from the shore. Among those here now are two Russian war steamers, and the admiral was obliging enough to let his band come on shore one evening and discourse very pleasant music on the esplanade of some thirty acres, next to the harbor, where thousands of Europeans and natives assembled to listen to the sweet strains of the "Last Rose of Summer," "Captain Jinks," and twenty other beautiful tunes. The band consists of some twenty-five performers, chiefly on wind instruments, and they acquitted themselvs very finely. Hardly a day passes but what salutes are fired from Fort Hill for some fresh arrival.

A VISIT TO THE TEMPLES.

As it would not become one of my religious turn of mind to neglect the temples in any town I visit, I could not do less than visit the different places of worship in Singapore. One of the most imposing of these structures, after St. Andrew's cathedral, is the Hindoo temple, standing on the corner of two principal streets. A solid wall some fifteen feet in hight occupies the two fronts, and upon the top of it are some twenty figures of the sacred bull, about life size, and in a natural recumbent position, with their big eyes sticking out as though very good natured and wishing some friendly notice. These figures are of stone or clay, and painted. To the left of the entrance stands a high tower, somewhat like a pagoda, with five or six stories, painted in brilliant colors and profusely ornamented with figures of many of the Hindoo gods in bas-relief upon the walls, some painted black, some red, and some of assorted colors, but all brilliant and strong. Upon entering the capacious yard and making known my wishes by pantomime that I wished to see the gods, I was taken to some chapels or shrines in a low building on the left side of the grounds, and in rear of the tall tower, where I found shrines to Kali, to Siva, to Christna, and other gods, the rooms of each being about ten feet square, the idol being opposite the door, with an oil lamp or two burning on either side. The idols are not very prepossessing in appearance, looking rather gross and unlovely in appearance. The thought came into my head that if I had to worship anything that I would prefer something that looked more comely and attractive; but it at once occurred to me that I should not expect too much of the gods as a class, for all of them, not omitting Yahweh of the Jews, which is the god worshiped at St. Andrew's cathedral, and Allah, which is worshiped at the mosque hard by the temple, and Joss in the Chinese Joss-house are all hard-looking monsters according to the description given of them. Yahweh, particularly, with smoke pouring out of his eyes, fire out of his nostrils, a two-edged sword out of his mouth, his head like wool, his feet of brass, etc., must be a bad looking customer, and not highly calculated to arouse much of a worshipful feeling in one who admires real beauty, grandeur, and loveliness.

From the shrines I was conducted to the temple proper, where there is a larger room, and where the gods are rather more imposing and of larger size, where more lights are kept burning, and where the worship must be of a higher grade, otherwise there is but little difference between the two places. If the chapel is the "holy place" this is perhaps the "holy of holies." A few priests is wandering around each place, and one was ready to take a few cents from me for showing me the gods.

From here I went into the mosque across the way, where two tall square towers rise in place of the ordinary minarets. Of course there were no gods to be seen here, though several of the faithful were here in prayer to one they could not see. After visiting a temple where there are numerous gods a mosque looks like an empty void, and as though the imagination had much more to do to create the god prayed to than where the figures stand out boldly before you. In this respect the mosques and churches are very much alike. Which is the most empty and which has the most of nothing in it is very hard to decide. Those who pay their money can take their choice, and they can turn their faces toward Mecca, or toward Jerusalem or Rome, as they prefer.

I next wandered into what I took to be a Joss-house, though Joss himself appeared to be not at home. There was an altar there with a light or two burning in the rear of it; a place where Joss might have been, but no Joss could I see. He may have adopted the fashion of Yahweh and Allah and not show himself to ordinary mortals, thinking they will believe the more in him when they see the least. At all events he was invisible to my eyes, and I could only see him with the eye of faith, and the eye of that kind which I have does not see first-rate; I cannot boast of it at all. There were several Chinamen in waiting at what seemed like refreshment tables, next to the outer walls. I spoke to them, and made some inquiries about Joss; but they understood not my language, and gave me no information. I am sorry I am as yet unable to tell you much about Joss.

Not to treat the gods with partiality I also called at the cathedral conducted in the name of St. Andrew. It belongs to the Church of England and not of Rome, and hence is bare and plain. It has a pulpit, an altar, an organ, and many pews, but little more. It is larger and more expensive than the temple, the mosque, and the Joss-house; it cost far more money than the whole of them put together; and here Yahweh and his son are grandly worshiped by the rich sons and daughters of Albion, who sojourn here in Singapore. The place is so aristocratic that a poor man would have very little business there. I do not think that the god who is worshiped there would take any notice of an ordinary poor man. While the elect are inside worshiping, a heathen with a dark skin is outside pulling and swinging the punkas which fan the faithful and give them air while they are worshiping; but you cannot prove it to me that there is really any more god in the vast and vaulted cathedral than there is in the mosque, the Joss-house, or the temple of Siva. To me they all seem much alike—better adapted to men of superstitious minds than for men really bent upon studying the great and glorious truths of nature.

The Catholics, the Armenians, and the Presbyterians have churches here, but I did not visit them for two reasons; first, they are locked up during the day, and second, because I knew I would see nothing to interest me if I went there.

A EUROPEAN CIRCUS COMPANY.

The same circus company which I saw in Calcutta, the tents of which I also saw in Penang, has been here in Singapore, and a portion of the company have been boarding at the same hotel where I am stopping; and to help while away the tedium of the time I have been compelled to spend here, and becoming partially acquainted with a portion of the members of the company, I have twice been to see them perform; and I am constrained to say they are very good performers, about as good as I have ever seen. The whole company, including lackeys and helpers, amounts to over eighty persons. It is called Charaina's Italian Circus, though a majority of those I have become acquainted with are English. A Frenchman and his German wife perform on the trapeze, and she is rather better on the trapeze than any woman performer I have ever seen. She climbs the rope to the horizontal bar, fifteen feet from the ground, where she goes through several startling evolutions, standing on one foot on the small bar without touching anything at all, also sitting in a chair balanced upon the bar and without touching anything. When the husband and wife are up together he holds her up by one hand, which grasps the belt around her waist, and holds her over his head while he stands on the rod, touching nothing else. They have a bright little daughter four years old which they sometimes take up with them, holding her in various fearful positions, and the little thing seems to know nothing of fear. They have sat next to me at table, and little Lizzie has often visited my room and chatted with me. Young as she is, she speaks five languages —French, German, English, Russian, and Bengali. I almost begrudged her ability in aquiring languages. Here I will make the circuit of the whole world and come in contact with people speaking many different languages, and will scarcely learn a hundred words of them all. Little Lizzie excels me altogether; she seems to breathe in language with her very breath, while with me the learning of different tongues is attended with great difficulty. In fact, I stop so short a time in a place that it is not worth while for me to try to learn the language of each; for what I learn in one place is knocked out of my mind by what I hear in another. I do not try to learn the languages I come in contact with.

The riding and other feats by other members of the company are very good, but I need not describe them. I will only mention a marrying incident which took place among them here. A young Englishman, by the name of Stoodly, and his two young sisters are members of the company, and are very good riders, having learned in their father's circus, long popular in England. But Emma, the elder sister, fell in love with a young man by the name of Stewart, one of the clowns of the circus, who loved her in return, and so they got married a few days ago, at which the brother took offense, and chose to be displeased thereat, though young Stewart seems like a worthy companion for the young lady. It seems also that Charaina, the proprietor, did not like it that the couple had presumed to get married, and at the instance of young Stoodly he discharged Stewart and his brother, hoping, I presume, that Emma would leave Stewart and adhere to her brother Charles and sister Ida; but she remained true to her husband and stays with him, while Charles and Ida have gone off with the company to Manilla, in the Philippine Islands. The two Stewarts, with Emma, and with Hayes and his wife and three children, who were also discharged from the same company, are trying to organize another company, if they can obtain horses, and have a circus of their own. But it requires a large amount of money to organize and conduct a circus, and though they are all good performers, their success is a matter of much doubt.

While the company were embarking on a steamer which is taking them to Manilla, an accident occurred which might have been serious. As the carriage containing the three performing tigers was passing from the dock onto the gangway leading to the steamer it dropped down a jog of some eight or ten inches, which so wrenched the cage that the doors sprang open and one of the tigers jumped out among the hundreds of people who were standing around. Of course the crowd scattered in all directions, and the tiger seemed to be about as much frightened as the people; it went quietly over the gangway upon the steamer and crouched under one of the carriages, while the man who enters the cage with the tigers and Charaini secured him with a rope and got it back in the cage again without any harm being done. One of the two young elephants also made strong objections to going upon the boat, but by whipping him and adopting other persuasive means of the kind he was finally induced to embark for Manilla, and the company left without further trouble, save that the boat was not large enough to take all, and a carriage containing a very large tiger, and another containing some fifty monkeys, had to be left behind to follow on another steamer. I may remark that the circus has been well patronized here, as in other places in the East; the Europeans, the soldiers, the Chinese, the Klings, and the Arabs freely part with their dollars, their half dollars, and their quarters to witness the gay attractions of the arena.

THE AMERICAN CONSUL.

I called twice upon our consul, Major Studer, of Des Moines, Iowa, who was appointed by General Grant, and has been here over ten years. He is a Swiss by birth, but went to America when quite young. He served very creditably in the war of the Rebellion, and though not a politician was offered this position in consideration of the good services he had performed. I found him very genial and friendly and quite willing to impart to me any information respecting this locality, of which he possesses much. He informed me that there are but five or six Americans in Singapore, and some of them talk against the Yankees and try to pass themselves off as Englishmen. Such Americans are only worthy of contempt. There are not very many American goods coming here, and such as do, find their way through English houses. He thinks our agricultural implements, or at least some of them, might be sent here to advantage, as well as canned goods generally. He says the natives generally entertain a very friendly feeling toward America, and representatives from more than one of the neighboring islands have applied to him, implying they would be glad to place themselves under the rule and protection of the United States; but he has told them that it was not our policy to have colonies, that we have abundant territory in our own country, and do not wish to encumber ourselves with colonies. He thinks it might be to our advantage to own some of these rich tropical islands, especially some of them rich in tin and other valuable products.

He spoke of his visit to Java, and of the suspicion with which the government there watch all European and American visitors, bespeaking a narrow and ignoble policy. He said of all people in the world the Dutch have less to fear from the United States than any other country, a government which has no colonizing ambition or aspirations, still they watch Americans as closely as though they thought their valuable island was about to be stolen from them. He has known American visitors to be watched and followed by spies as long as they were in Java, and even he himself had been similarly watched while there. He regards this as a very small trait in the Dutch, that they should seem to fear the natives whom they cruelly oppress may be induced to revolt against their oppressors. I was able to assure him that I had seen no indications of spies after me while in Java, that nobody seemed to be suspicious that I was about to steal their island, or to incite the natives to rise against them. The major seems to anticipate that General Arthur will soon recall him to confer the place as a reward upon some one more of a politician; but I told him I could not see any such danger. The salary is but $2,500 per year, and he could make that much in other capacities. The salary is but about half what is paid by other governments similarly represented here. Should a change be made he would perhaps engage in merchantile or commercial business here in Singapore, as his long residence here and the acquaintance he has built up would give him many advantages. I feel sure he has done much toward looking after the interests of American sailors in distress, and of all American citizens, from whom he often receives applications. He is a very wealthy and creditable representative of American interests, and it would not seem that anything would be gained by making a change.

A VISIT TO THE KINGDOM OF JOHORE.

One day I spent in paying a visit to the dominions of the maharajah of Johore, situated on the southern point of the Malayan peninsula and the most southern part of the main-land of the Asiatic continent. I was accompanied by a Mr. Fitzgerald, an Englishman, stopping at the same hotel. We took the stage across the island of Singapore, some fourteen miles, to the Straits, three-fourths of a mile wide, which separate it from the main-land. The ride across the island is a very pleasant one, affording a fine view of the country residences and plantations with which the island is more or less covered—plantations of the indigo plant, of coffee, tea, and cinchona in some places, to say nothing of the ever-present cocoanut, aracannut, and banana-trees which abound in all these tropical countries. A considerable portion of the island, however, seems to have too poor a soil to justify cultivation, and it lies waste and unused. The soil, or what may be called by that name, appears a hard red clay with iron mixed with it; but in places it is dark and rich and productive. The groves of mangoe-trees, to be seen along the excellent smooth road, look very thrifty. The climate is so warm and forcing, and the rains so frequent, that where the soil has any fertility in it, vegetation cannot help being profuse. The roads, after being made very smooth, are given a coat or course of what looks like a low grade of iron ore pounded up fine, which gives a hard surface, not liable to become muddy. The earth is so red that when it rains the streams are very much colored and turbid. The Missouri river cannot compare with these streams. Though the island is but twenty-seven by fourteen miles, the rains are so abundant that it has quite a river, which empties into the sea at the city, and its mouth makes a good harbor for hundreds of small craft—Malay boats, lighters, etc., capable of carrying twenty or thirty tons each. On our return we were favored with a copious shower, which gave us a good opportunity for seeing what tropical rains are. The moisture is by no means stinted. As I said before, the surface of the island is undulating, nowhere rising but a few hundred feet above the sea level.

When we had crossed the island we of course came to the beautiful Straits which separate it from the main-land, and right before us, on the opposite side, peered up the maharajah's palace and the town of New Johore, a town of some five thousand, consisting of Chinese and Malays. I may remark that our fellow-passengers, some dozen in number, were mostly Chinese; but as they were second-class passengers and we first we did not sit in the same compartment, though in sight and hearing. We changed horses three times going out, and the same on our return, and found, as I have before, that it is the rule in this eastern country for the horses to balk and run back awhile before they make up their minds to go forward, as good horses should. It is not a little amusing to see the natives manage their fiery steeds, crying "ugh!" applying the lash, etc., to induce the contrary equines to become progressive in their dispositions. I hardly award to them the meed of being first-class horse trainers.

At the Straits we found several Chinese, with their sampans, ready to take us across to the town for the low price of ten cents for the passage. We were not long in engaging a plump, cheerful-looking young celestial to transport us to the town and kingdom of Johore, a mile away, in the angling direction we had to pursue, and in view of the distance, the sum of five cents each seemed decidedly reasonable. When we reached the opposite shore, which, with its background of elevated hills, clad in the rich tropical verdure, ornamented with the bright scarlet flowers so common in this latitude, looked so inviting, we passed along near the Malay houses at the water's edge, which houses, according to their invariable custom, are built on poles or small piles driven into the earth beneath the water, giving them a space of several feet between the floors of the houses and the water at high tide, thus obviating any bad effects that might arise from contiguity with the abundant aqueous element, and retaining all the advantages of the ceaseless tide to bear away all offal and surplus matter, with the convenience of having the family boat always near at hand, which is reached by descending a rude flight of steps. We landed at a series of stone steps opposite the market-house of the Malayan and Chinese city, and were made glad to see how much good it did the young Chinaman to transpose that ten-cent coin to his own leathern fob. We intimated to him that we would cheerfully patronize him again, and tried, with our imperfect knowledge of the Celestial language, to give him to understand that we would accept his services again in about three or four hours; but he probably found other customers equally as remunerative, for when we returned we found another Chinaman in waiting for us with his sampan.

We looked through the town and saw that most of the little stores are kept by the representatives from the Flowery Kingdom, and that they are more than a majority of the population of the primitive city. Fruits and eatables, such as the natives use, are exposed in the little shops; but nothing looked attractive save the bananas and small oranges on sale.

We called into an open building, much like a large shed, where were some thirty or forty Chinamen playing cards and other games for money. The sums risked were perhaps not large, but they seemed very intent upon their sport, and to exhibit a striking contrast to their brethren, who were outside industriously plying their various avocations, by which to add to their silver and copper coins. Some few of these Chinamen in this shed were lying upon rude tables, and from their cadaverous and shriveled appearance I judged them to be the slaves of opium, and that they had been indulging in a pernicious smoke.

We early bent our way to the large saw mills of James Meldrum, a stolid old Scotchman from Edinburgh, who has been many years running this mill, and has sawed many millions of feet of lumber. This mill stands a little out of the town, on the bank of the Straits. The logs are conveyed to it in rafts, and, after being sawed, the lumber is taken by steamers and sailing vessels to Singapore, to Java, Penang, and to the various towns on the neighboring islands, where it finds a pretty ready market. The mill is a large one, the building being nearly a hundred feet square, having some half a dozen gangs of saws, with numerous circular saws for sawing small logs, edging, etc. The engine is of some two hundred horse-power, and is capable of doing far more work than is performed. I have visited many of the saw mills of Michigan, and am sure there are many mills in the pine regions of that pine state, each of which saw per day ten times the lumber turned out at this Johore mill. True, the Michigan timber is soft pine, while this of Johore is mainly hard and heavy. Besides this, Chinamen and Malays cannot manipulate lumber with our Western men, and the Scotch cannot compare with Americans in lumber-making.

Meldrum has been running this mill more than ten years, and while the logs were near at hand, and but little expense was required to get them to the mill, he made large profits and went back to Edinburgh with his piles, but when the mill went into the hands of the maharajah it did not pay expenses, and soon ran into debt. Then Meldrum was again importuned to come out and take the mill once more, and he consented to do so, and is now running it in connection with the brother of the maharajah; but I think the business is not now proving very profitable. The timber within ten miles or more of the mill is cut up, and it is so expensive getting to the mill, and is conducted so badly by the natives, that it is proving unsuccessful. Much of the timber is so heavy that it sinks in water, and rafts of bamboo and light wood have to be constructed on which to float the heavy timber, and this is attended with extra cost. The American plan would probably be to follow up the timber with portable mills, sawing in flat boats on the small streams where the lumber is abundant, thus obviating the necessity of conveying the logs long distances. But if this course were to be suggested to the old fogy Scotchman he would undoubtedly spurn it as a "Yankee plan," which he would despise too much to adopt. So they will doubtless continue to work to great disadvantage and make no profit at the business. The kinds of lumber sawed are teak of several varieties, Johore cedar, camphor-wood, sandal-wood, mahogany, rosewood, chungal, maraboo, kangree, etc. I think the finer of these woods are not very plentiful, the greater bulk being teak, cedar, etc. Though the business is not paying very well, a second mill of about the same size is being fitted up from an old building, and will ere long be set at work. The engineer is a Scotchman, recently imported, but he is much dissatisfied with the country, the business, and all that belongs thereto; he prefers old Scotia, with all her dull mists and biting frosts, to this land of perpetual summer, with the pests entailed to it. The lumber sawed at this mill is largely used for building purposes and furniture manufacture.

We visited the maharajah's armory, where is a meager assortment of arms and small cannons, sufficient to arm a company or two of infantry and a park or two of artillery, but it looked like a small affair for the armory of a kingdom. We then walked down the foot-paths through the woods, where we saw pineapples growing wild, and where the cobra and other poisonous serpents greatly abound. Here, as in many other places I have visited, a profusion of tall fern-trees, the foliage of which is much like the finest ferns, are seen on every hand. Here the soil is not very good, but I am told that farther away it is better. In the interior the terra japonica, the vine-plant which yields the gambier, is largely cultivated. An extract is made of the plant by way of decoction, which is evaporated by boiling, and reduced to a stiff extract suitable for shipping in coarse sacking of palm leaf and grass. This is the gambier of commerce, and is largely used as an astringent in tanning leather, somewhat in medicine, and largely by brewers for checking the fermentation of the beer, and for imparting a rich color. There is nothing harmful in the nature of it, save its astringency. It is rather exhaustive to this weak soil, and succeeds but a few years on the same ground, when a new locality has to be taken. The Chinese cultivate this plant largely, and it is not uncommon for them to be picked off from the fields by the tigers which are growling about. The skin of a large tiger was shown us in the armory which had made way with nine Chinamen.

We paid our respects to the maharajah by calling at his palace, a commodious but rather plain-looking building, some two hundred feet in length, principally of brick, and erected on a plateau some fifty feet above the water of the straits, and fronting on that beautiful arm of the sea. The maharajah had gone to Singapore, but his butler or steward in charge very politely showed us over the extensive building, which is kept in excellent order, and as clean as a new bandbox. In the lower story is a balcony nearly the whole length of the palace, with rooms for various purposes immediately in the rear. The entrance to the drawing-room, the reception-room, the ball-room, the royal bed-rooms, reading-rooms, writing-rooms, the ladies-rooms, etc., is reached by a wide staircase, at the end of which on the wall is a full-length, life-size portrait in oil of Gladstone, which is an excellent likeness. The drawing-room is large and magnificent, richly ornamented with paintings of the royal family of Great Britain, including the Prince of Wales and wife, the Duke of Edinburgh and wife, and others of Victoria's favored offspring, with herself in the foreground, of course, with paintings of George III. and George IV. There are numerous Japanese vases in many of the rooms and in the drawing-room some very rich crystal chandeliers and vases, some eight or ten feet in hight, and which had recently been received from England. The rooms are all very capacious, and grand enough for any potentate in the world. The polished marble floors of a part of the rooms are of the finest quality, and present a very rich appearance. The large flat tile which was used for the balcony and some of the lower rooms is to give place to the polished marble which has been ordered for the purpose.

We were also shown to the large dining-room on the first floor, where a hundred or two persons can sit down to the table and have ample room. We were shown into the plate-room, where the gold and silver dishes and implements amount to many thousands of dollars. Here also are many of the presents of value which have been made to the maharajah, with the emblems and paraphernalia of royalty. This climate is so damp, however, that this ware has to be rubbed up every day to keep it bright and shining. Some forty or fifty servants are employed in the palace to keep things in order; and it must be admitted that they accomplish the task well.

After being requested to enroll our names with the illustrious visitors who have called at the Malayan palace, some brandy was produced, which, with due respect to the maharajah and his polite representative, we could not do less than permit to touch our lips, and it is barely possible that a teaspoonful or two slippped down our throats, because on such a noted occasion it would hardly answer to do less. Of one thing, however, I am sure, that enough was not imbibed to do any harm. We were also shown over the well laid-out grounds surrounding the palace, including the music house beside the water, where the maharajah's band discourses sweet music. His "majesty," being a Mohammedan, uses the privilege which that religion allows him, and is not content with one wife, but can boast of three. The wives of course were not on exhibition with the palace. It is to be presumed those are kept for his special use.

From the paintings, etc., in the palace it is not hard to perceive that the English are held in great favor by this Johorian maharajah; in fact, he is said to be a usurper of the place he holds and is merely a puppet in the power of the English, and has ceded to them considerable portions of the Malayan peninsula to which he has no right. The kindom of Johore extends nearly to Malacca—some one hundred and fifty miles north and south and the width of the peninsula, which in the widest place in the lower part is some sixty miles. He has no heir, and when he shuffles off this "mortal coil" it is expected the British will attempt to take possession of the entire peninsula; but I learn that considerable portions of it belong to the king of Siam, and as Siam is in friendly treaty with the United States and several other powers, there possibly may be some trouble before the entire the peninsula is allowed to pass into the possession of the English. It is extremely rich in tin as well as other minerals in which other nations besides the English feel a lively interest, and it is possible some of them might object to England's clasping it to her greedy bosom. But all that is further along. At the present the great maharajah of Johore is deeply in debt; England is the principal creditor, and there is not much likelihood of the debt being wiped out.

SOME DRAWBACKS.

With all the delights which may justly be claimed for Singapore and its surroundings, there are some drawbacks, which more or less detract from the perfect Elysium which it might otherwise be. The continual hot weather is one of these drawbacks to Europeans and Americans. However delightful it may be to feel the breath of perpetual summer, one inevitably wearies of being in a state of constant perspiration day and night from week to week and from month to month. No bed-clothing is used over the body at night. Hotel keepers no more think of furnishing sheets and blankets for beds than they do of furnishing overcoats and muffiers. I have found it more comfortable to remove every vestige of clothing at night than to retain any to swelter in. But even this becomes tiresome in time.

Another drawback is the continuous attack of certain insects and pests. There is a great abundance of fleas, musketoes, ants, spiders, tarantulas, scorpions, centipedes, lizards, to say no more of the serpents which are everywhere plentiful. The ants are one of the greatest pests here; they are everywhere and into everything. The white ants are the kind which labor so industriously at destroying timber and wood of all kinds. They eat their way into the hardest timber, finding their way any number of feet, and when the exterior may to all appearance be sound the inside may be all honey-combed with these mischievous pests. In this way bridges and house timbers are utterly ruined by them and made unsafe. There is a red ant which is said to absolutely eat iron, but this is hardly to be credited.

The lizards of this eastern country are very plentiful; I have seen them everywhere in great numbers since I reached Syria, but I believe I have not mentioned them. They are a sprightly, active little reptile and entirely harmless, but their shape is so like the alligator and large lizards that is more or less repulsive. They run up walls and ceilings as easily as flies, and go everwhere with agility and perfect impunity. In Batavia I have seen them on the dinner table and nobody seemed to regard them with aversion. They are usually from two and a half to five inches in length. They usually seem anxious to get away from man, and do so with marvelous expedition, but withal they are very tame, and are around in the houses as though they consider they have an unquestioned right there. I would suppose this would be the paradise for bed-bugs, but I have seen but few of them. Bats attains great size in these warm countries, and those called flying foxes often measure two or three feet from the point of one wing to the other. They do not very much harm, though they seem unclean. I do not think rats and mice are worse here than in our country.

CHINESE COFFINS AND CEMETERIES.

Where there are so many Chinamen there must necessarily be a good many coffins and somewhat extensive cemeteries. The coffin is a heavy, clumsy affair, and speaks not so highly for the taste and ingenuity of the people as some other of the articles they manufacture. The article is made of what might be said to be four pieces of a log of suitable length and size, each piece being about the third part of the log. These are put together with a heavy head and foot piece fitted in, and the inside is somewhat dug out to receive the body; but the whole affair seems very clumsy and awkward. These, with the corpse inside, are carried upon bamboo poles, something as is the custom with us, though with less order in the procession. The tom-tom and other Chinese rude musical instruments are played at the house of the corpse before starting for the grave, and very often along the way to it. With us music is used in times of rejoicing; with them it is used in times of mourning. We use black as a color for mourning, whereas they use white. Their cemeteries are usually on the side of a gently sloping hill, and their tombs are partly in a circular form like miniature vaults, only they are of small size and without any appearance of ostentation.

A FEW UNMENTIONED ITEMS.

Perhaps Singapore is hardly as noted for its fruits as Java, for here I have seen none of the rambotans, none of the mangosteens, and several other kinds of fruit so abundant in Batavia, but pineapples and bananas seem quite as abundant here as there, and I have seen one kind of fruit here that I did not meet with there, and that is the custard apple, a very rich and luscious fruit about the size of a cocoanut, with a sweet, rich pulp, bearing some resemblance to custard, and some to our paw-paws, but superior. They have black seeds, somewhat like watermelons; they grow on small-sized trees. But with all they have of rich fruit in this part of the world there is nothing that equals American apples and peaches. I will be most glad when I can again have my fill of those luscious fruits.

I have not mentioned the hand-carts here, which are used for transporting persons about from place to place instead of carriages drawn by horses. They are after the Japanese style, and are called jimspickshas, and are hauled by the Chinamen. They have two wheels, like a cart, with a short shaft on each side and a cross-bar in front, where the Chinaman places himself, and trots along on these smooth streets about as fast as a horse. The carriages are made light and neat, and as they have springs and are neatly cushioned, they are quite pleasant to ride in; and at the rate of ten cents an hour they are not expensive. I tried them on one occasion, and can recommend them to those of you who may journey this way. There are said to be a thousand of them in the city, so it will be easy for many to be accommodated.

I may remark that the houses in Singapore are of good quality, even those occupied by the Chinese. They are one, two, and three stories high, built strongly of stone, plastered over and whitewashed, so they look clean and healthy. There is said to be some cholera here, though I cannot think the fatality is great. The houses occupied by the Malays are usually of their peculiar style, sitting on poles, with siding and roof of palm-leaf, being of a frail character, but answering very well for warm climates. The most of the other houses are covered with tile, and are quite permanent.

I have parted with my birds. I found I was a trifle mistaken as to what they are. I bought them, supposing them to be parrots, but found they were parrakeets, a small variety of birds of the parrot family, but which do not learn to talk, and illy endure cold climates, and are pretty sure to die early in northern latitudes. They seemed quite unreconciled, as they became older, to their imprisonment; and though I had purposed to take them to America with me, though I had brought them from India and Ceylon, and had taken them with me to Java, I opened their cage-door one morning here and gave them their liberty, which they seemed to enjoy in the garden adjoining the hotel. They did not fly far away, but have taken up their home among the shrubs in this pleasant garden. I leave them, here with the best of wishes that the cat will not catch them, and that they may escape the many troubles incident to birds.

DEPARTURE FROM SINGAPORE.

All periods of waiting are sure to terminate sooner or later, and my waiting at this equatorial city is no exception to the rule. On Thursday, April 6th, the P. & O. steamer Gwalior, on which I am to be conveyed to Hong Kong, was signaled at about 10:30 A. M., and so announced at Fort Hill, and as it was to spend the day here, I did not bid good-bye to Singapore and repair to it till about 5 P. M. The steamer is lying at the wharf of the company, three miles from the hotel. I found a good room waiting for me in the second cabin, where I find genial traveling companions, conspicuous among whom is the Rev. T. F. Clark, of Syracuse, N. Y., who is also on a tour around the world. He and I do not quite agree on theological subjects, but I like him as a man, and find him a genial, intelligent, pleasant traveling companion. He has considerably more faith in the supernatural than I am able to boast of, but think we shall manage to travel together without trying to tear out each other's eyes. I would much prefer to help him to open his eyes the better to see the truths of nature and the fallacies of theology; but I shall not weary him with my heterodox views. He is a sincere follower of Wesley, and I shall easily respect the good qualities which he possesses.

JOE COOK, THE SLANDERER.

I learn, also, that on this same steamer is the notorious, the false, and the slanderous Joseph Cook, who has taken pleasure in calumniating myself and the Liberals of America. I have little respect for the falsifier and slanderer, and cannot esteem such a man as he. I had not heard of him since in India, and had I never have heard of him further I should not have greatly mourned. His wife is traveling with him. They go on to Shanghai and Yokohama, after which they go to Australia and New Zealand, returning by the Sandwich Islands to San Francisco in time to commence his fall course of lectures.

Friday, April 7th.—This is Good Friday, being the day appointed by the Catholic and English churches to commemorate the crucifixion of Jesus, though if such an event ever took place there is a hundred chances to one that it was not on the seventh day of April. But let that be as it may, it is a beautiful day in this locality, and at 9:30 A.M. we leave the wharf, where we are surrounded by lovely islands, with moderate elevations covered with luxuriant tropical vegetation, flowing vines, shrubs, and trees; some flowers yellow, some blue, and some bright scarlet, making a sum total of loveliness, which I never expect to see excelled. We passed down at a moderate speed in front of the city, with the twenty islands scattered around in the offing and rounding the island of Singapore. We passed up on the east side of the Malay peninsula into the China Sea. The day continues lovely, and the entire view is as fine as could be easily imagined. The city with its scores of steamers, ships, and smaller sailing vessels, gradually lessen in our view, until after a time they entirely fade from the view, as also does the island of Singapore and the Malay peninsula, and nothing is before us but the watery expanse of the China Sea.

This being a very holy day in the estimation of the English Christians, and this steamer being an English institution, it was of course to be expected that some attention would be paid to it. Word was given out that service would be held in the main saloon, and all were requested to be present. I had no objection to being present, and walked aft and attended the service, at which the Rev. Mr. Johns, a Welshman residing at Hanchow, China, read the regular Episcopal service, consisting of numerous prayers, psalms, and parts of several chapters in the Bible, with the singing of two or three hymns. No sermon or discourse was attempted.

The list of passengers in the first cabin numbers about twenty, but this small number is made up by some one hundred and twenty Chinamen as deck passengers, who are returning to their native country, among whom are several women. Some have made their little "pile" and are returning to their native land to enjoy it in peace; some have been acting as servants in Singapore and other places, and, their masters returning to Europe, they are returning to China. Some are merely going there on a visit, to return again after a time to their field of labor. In our cabin we have three fellow-passengers who are Chinamen, and who are quite gentlemanly and well-behaved. One is Ah Foon, who has been in the silk business in Bombay, which he has closed out, returning home with a view of taking a stock of China silks and tea to New York or some other American city, and thereby add to the little fortune already made. He is a pleasant young man, and if the new law now being enacted by our Congress does not prevent his emigration to America, it is not unlikely that our country may be benefited by a visit from him. Another of our distinguished fellow-passengers is Foo Sum, who has been engaged in a very successful trade in tin at Perak, on the Malayan peninsula, where he has made a profit of some fifty thousand dollars. He sports a fine diamond ring, an amethyst bracelet, fine broadcloth and linen apparel, and withal is quite a modest man. He has been somewhat overworked, and is going home for a rest, after which he will return to Perak and perhaps make another fifty thousand. I notice the Chinamen on deck spend much of their time at playing cards and dominoes for small sums of money, thus showing the strong national disposition. In the first cabin a rich China woman is playing it rather shrewd. She has paid her fare the same as any other lady, and being entitled to a servant for her child, she has taken her husband for her attendant, so he gets his passage free. Bret Harte says: "For ways that are dark, and tricks that are vain, the heathen Chinee is peculiar."

While attending "divine service" in the cabin aft, I had an opportunity of seeing the wife of Joseph Cook, who was some two years ago taken to his gross, flabby bosom. Joseph is wonderful as a scientific man, and he finds Christianity pre-eminently a scientific system. He is charmed with the great amount of science he finds in it! He can hardly find words to adequately extol the grand and beautiful scientific elements of the system. With him for a big masculine god to slily and secretly get a young unsophistacated virgin in the family way, and then to coolly set himself to work to bring about the cruel and ignominious death of the amiable and innocent son, the result of that overshadowing arrangement, and all for the purpose of this god's getting himself into such a pleasant and forgiving frame of mind with his other numerous children, that he could consent that 'not more than ninety-five per cent of them should go into everlasting suffering for doing the very things which he made them to do, and which he inevitably knew they would do before he made them, is remarkable—first, for its wonderful love, and second and greatest, for its wonderful science, the latter of which Joseph has been the first to discover, and for which he should apply for a patent without further delay. Yes, if there is anything that the soul of Joseph loves more than another it is the science which impels a Jew-God to order the death of his own dearly-beloved son, and he cannot help thanking the Jew-devil for the important part he performed in this scientific and god-like enterprise. Joseph cannot help regarding the devil as thus showing himself a great friend and patron of science. With Joseph, as with many others, it is a deep and difficult question whether the Jew-God or the Jew-devil is entitled to the most praise and admiration for the parts they severally performed in this grand scientific scheme, since without the parts played by each the world never could have been benefited by this masterly exhibition of scientific power and glory. The honors are easy; and in Joseph's great heart his scientific admiration for the two grand operators in this acme of scientific perfection is justly about equal. He perceives such a harmony between religion and science—such a consistency between them—that his capacious soul overflows with gratitude, and for ten or twelve thousand dollars a year he is willing to tell his dear friends all about it, and then spend a part of the money in traveling around the world and bearing to those in foreign lands the same glad news.

This is the same Joseph who refused at Bombay to stand upon the platform where I stood, or to be seen even with those who associated with me or recognized me; and this because I am so "bad a man!"—more specifically because I had been condemned and sent to prison, while he greatly admires his scientific God because he was not only condemned and scourged, but sent to execution. Herein Joseph is hardly consistent, for there was the same amount of guilt in the one case as in the other. Possibly I am not quite as scientific as Jesus, but the injustice of my conviction and condemnation was almost equal to his. Joseph, of course, does not so regard the matter; he sustains and defends the perjurer whose evidence convicted me, while he measures out upon my defenseless head his bitterest anathemas. Had he been my judge I am sure my sentence would have been heavier, and I would not now be on the same steamer Gwalior with him, steaming up the China Sea. In fact, I clearly remember that this pious and scientific Joseph helped to convict me. I see him now in the eyes of my memory, and how he lent his august presence and powerful influence against me. I distinctly remember how he came into the courtroom when I, a prejudged convict, was being tried before a Christian jury, and when he placed himself by the side of my infamous prosecutor and sat there a long time, while reading my "Open Letter" to his scientific friend J. C., which was arrayed against me, when his delectable nose turned up and his whole countenance took on the appearance of one smelling a very offensive odor, with holy horror streaming out from every angle of his beautiful features. His countenance spoke in thunder tones to that Christian jury before which he sat—if a countenance may be said to speak in thunder tones—and with all the power which Joseph is able to wield he seemed to say to this sympathizing jury: "This is a very bad man! He deserves punishment! Away with him! Send him to prison! Fine him! Crucify him!" Thus this man of science helped his friend Anthony to convict me, and it is not strange that he still denounces me because I was convicted. It seems to be a law in human nature, when an individual greatly wrongs another, to follow it up with other wrong acts to show that he was right and justifiable in the first instance. So I expect Joseph Cook will continue to be my enemy. He has not magnanimity enough to be just to me. I am very sure I do not want him as a friend. If I cannot have friends for whom I entertain more respect than I do for him, I choose to have no friends. But the world is tolerably wide, I discover, and though Joseph and I are now on the same boat, we will probably generally find room enough to get through life without seriously colliding. With all his malice I hardly think he has done me serious injury. I still live, and I hope to for a little while yet—long enough, at least, for Joseph to hear from me still again.

But perhaps I am wandering. I wished simply to remark that Joseph is a man of science. If he can not make the world believe he is scientific his mission is a failure. He looks at everything with scientific eyes. The subjects of his lectures are scientific subjects. One of these subjects is "marriage," and of course he treats it in a strictly scientific manner. He can tell his hearers in what scientific marriage consists, and how people should select life-partners in consonance with the dictates of science. In fact, this great expounder of science has within the past two years perpetrated matrimony himself, and may now be said to be making his bridal tour, and it has been done upon true scientific principles, I beg to assure you. He would have no marriage but a scientific marriage; no union but a scientific union. Let me tell you, then, what kind of a wife this apostle of science has taken unto himself. Let me show you a tall, gaunt, sallow, spare female of very uncertain age, who looks as though she had remained an old maid twenty years too long, and who, I heard one of the passengers say, looks as though she had not vitality enough to draw a herring off a gridiron. (Perhays that remark is a trifle severe; I did not make it. It is only my business to report what I see and hear.) But just imagine two hundred and fifty pounds of coarse adipose and lymph, which for over forty years has lived in a state of angelic purity and celibacy, basking in the rays of the sun of science till approaching the fiftieth mile-stone in the journey of life, then taking to his puffy and distended but scientific bosom ninety-five pounds of spare, elongated, osseous femineity with sallow cuticle and silvery locks, and you will have in your mind's eye what constitutes a true scientific marriage, and what matrimony is and should be according to the superior light of the scientific Joseph. This is the kind of conjugal union he has looked up for himself, and for the benefit of those who do not wish to give fifty cents to hear this man of science expatiate upon the theme from the orthodox platform, I give it unto you. And those of you who have not yet perpetrated matrimony and wish to perform it in the true scientific manner may here perceive the mode pointed out and be able to govern yourselves accordingly. At all events, here is a fine specimen of this Cook's science, and the value of his scientific lessons.

SIAM.

While moving northward in the Chinese Sea we leave on our left the kingdom of Siam, concerning which it may be well to say a few words. It is an extensive kingdom in the southeastern part of Asia, between Burmah and China, and consists of forty-one provinces, each governed by a phaja, or great functionary. It lies between 4° and 21°, 30′, north latitude, and between 97°, 30′, and 107° east longitude. Its area is estimated at 309,000 square miles, and its population at 5,700,000. There are several ports along its coast-line on the Gulf of Siam, but foreign commerce is entirely carried on at Bangkok, a few miles up the river Menam, Paknam and Paklat being custom stations at its mouth. The chief products are rice, sugar, guava, mango, dauries, coffee, cocoanuts, tobacco, sage, and gums. Teak, sandalwood, rosewood, and the aquila-tree are the chief woodland products. The principal manufactures are vases, urns, and other vessels, in the making of which gold is embossed upon silver; gold-beating, iron-founding, and pottery. The chief exports are rice, sugar, gums, hides, horns, oil-seeds, drugs, dye-woods, timber, etc. The chief imports are calico, linen, glass, cutlery, hardware, etc. The government is an absolute and hereditary monarchy, and there are two kings; the first the actual monarch; the second the nominal head of the army. In addition to the public revenue the king is entitled to three months' labor, or its equivalent, from his subjects. Its revenue and expenditure amount each to about $6,000,000. Bangkok is the capital, and has a population of 255,000.

The inhabitants of Siam are of the Mongolian race, so they of course bear some resemblance to the Chinese. The religion of the country is Buddhism, which system was introduced into the country two thousand years ago. The people are peaceful and quiet in character, though they cannot be claimed as being as enterprising at the Chinese.

Like Burmah, Siam was in former times much in volved in wars with Pegu. In the seventh century it had the misfortune to have a Christian prime minister—a Venetian named Phalcon—and he concerted with the French for the conversion of the kings and the establishment of a Gallic-Indian empire in the East. But the Siamese nobles discovered the plot and defeated it, the Christian minister being killed, and the French expelled from the country; and as the king had been partial to his minister, the royal dynasty was changed. In 1821 steps were taken by the British government to open a friendly intercourse with Siam; but the mission dispatched for the purpose was unsuccessful. But after the English established themselves in Burmah they obtained some foothold in Siam, and they virtually have the chief port at their command. It is, perhaps, only a question of time when the entire country will be under English control.

Though the government of the country is despotic, it is a modified form of despotism. A great share of the political power is vested in a number of hereditary chieftains, who are owners of the land. Besides the second king, or deputy, a state council, and a privy council help to modify the despotism of the government. The institutions of Europe are said to be gradually introduced in the country, though it is to be feared they are not as highly appreciated by the natives as they should be. Upon the whole, Siam may be regarded as one of the progressive oriental countries, and there is good reason for hoping that before another century has rolled away it will have taken a decided forward step, and will have numbered itself with those nations resolved to do something for itself and for the race.

COCHIN CHINA.

Next east of Siam, and between that country and China proper, lies the comparatively small French colony of Anam, at the southern point of Cochin China, the principle town of which is Saigon. The French as colonists have proved themselves far inferior to the English, and though they have done better here than in some of their attempts at colonization, they have done only tolerably well here. The town of Saigon is represented as not in a prosperous condition, commercially, its trade falling off within the past four years. The commerce was formerly rather active in the tropical products common to the neighboring countries, but its diminuition presents a discouraging prospect. The natives of the country are said to be an odd mixture of Chinese and Malays, and not very distinguished for enterprise or thrift. They are small in stature, slovenly in appearnce, and it seems that those farthest removed from Christian influences and civilization are the best and most uncorrupted. This is the way it is everywhere. I am fully convinced that Christian missionaries and Christian habits have not been a benefit to the oriental people.

When the proposed canal is cut across the narrowest part of the Malay peninsula it will shorten the journey between India and China some four days by steamer, and leave Singapore and Johore, if not out in the cold, at least down in the warm. But there is no likelihood that the great enterprise will be undertaken for a long time yet. From all the indications this is not a greatly frequented route. This, the 12th, is the sixth day out from Singapore, and I have not heard that any sail or craft has been sighted since we reached the China Sea. We have seen thousands of flying-fish, and a few albatross and other sea birds, but these are all.

The first day was pleasant and lovely; but on the second day out we were fairly in the northeast monsoon, now in season, blowing strongly in our faces, which caused the sea to be very much disturbed and the steamer to roll and toss to such an extent that many of the passengers were sea-sick, and acted much as the whale did when Yahweh gave him an emetic and caused him to throw up Jonah. As I said once before, my stomach has been too faithful a servant, and has worked itself through with too many a difficult undertaking, for me to wish to indulge in a disparaging remark about its shortcomings, but I did nevertheless think on the 8th inst that it was over-sensitive at the roughness of the sea, as it undertook several times to forcibly throw off into the sea what I thought would be better for it to retain. In fact, I began to think I was not progressing at all in becoming a sailor; it seeming to me that my stomach was disposed to make more ado at mere trifles now than at the beginning of my journey. But on the third day the wind and roughness had so far abated that the vomiting was discontinued, though the nausea somewhat retained. On the fourth day the sea had become comparatively smooth, so that its gentle ripples on the surface in the mild breeze gleamed and glistened in the bright rays of the morning sun like a vast plain of moving diamonds. It was indeed most beautiful.

To-day the wind is stronger again, and the steamer has more motion than is just agreeable, but not quite enough to make the stomachs try to place themselves inside out. Upon the whole, we have had a pleasant passage, having no storm save of wind and one slight shower. It is agreeable again to get far enough north to get a good view of the North Star. When in Ceylon it passed down nearly out of sight. At Singapore it could not be seen at all, while in Java it was away below the horizon. We are now between 19° and 20° north latitude, and I was last night pleased to get a good sight of the old polar star once more. I like the North Star, and prefer to spend the remainder of my days where I can see it every night, whenever the clouds will permit.

We have now but one hundred and fifty miles more to make to reach Hong Kong, one of the outlying cities of the Celestial Land, early to-morrow morning. As my next letter will be largely taken up with celestial matters, it seems a proper place and time to bring this letter to a close.

Dear friends, adieu. D. M. B.

THE FREETHINKERS' CONVENTION.

This year the New York, Lake Erie, and Western Railroad (the Erie) will sell excursion tickets to Corning or Elmira to persons attending the Watkins Convention at two cents a mile from the following stations: Jersey City, Paterson, Newburgh, Port Jertis, Lackawaxen, Deposit, Susquehanna, Great Bend, Binghamton, Omega, Waverly, Addison, Canisteo, Hornellsville, Castile, Warsaw, Buffalo, Suspension Bridge, Wellsville, Friendship, Cuba, Olean, Salamanca, Dayton, Dunkirk, Bath, Avoca, Wayland, Avon, Rochester, Batavia, Cornwall, Conewango, and Jamestown.

As this arrangement has never been made before, I desire to call the especial attention of the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER to it.

And now allow me to say the certificates for passes on the Northern Central Railroad and all its branches, and also for the South Shore and Michigan Southern and all its branches, are ready for delivery. The last-mentioned road runs from Chicago. Send in your orders with a three-cent tamp.

The Convention commences August 23d and holds five days, closing up on Sunday evening. As I shall spend my whole time from now until the Convention working for its success, I shall be pleased to answer any question in relation to it. H. L. GREEN,
Secretary.

H. L. GREEN'S LECTURE TRIP.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: As I am compelled to occupy so much of your space nowadays with articles about the Watkins Glen Freethinkers' Convention that commences August 23d (and, by the way, is sure to be much the largest convention we hav ever held), I will make this letter very brief. Since my last letter I lectured in Detroit, at the Orion Camp-Meeting, Linesville, Pa., and North Hannibal, New York.

I was pleased to find in the city of Detroit many intelligent Liberals, but regretted to learn that there was no activ Liberal organization. My lecture was well attended by an intelligent audience, and a committee was appointed at the meeting to call together the Liberals of the city soon after hot weather for the purpose of organizing a Freethinkers' association, which will also be a Liberal League. Mr. Edward Chope, one of the subscribers and admirers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and a man of character, property, and standing in the city, is the chairman of the committee, which insures success to the undertaking. I had a very pleasant visit at Mr. Chope's suburban residence. As is the case generally with out-and-out Infidels, he has an excellent, intelligent wife, who makes his home pleasant. Brother Chope gave me a very fine carriage ride about the city, which I greatly enjoyed. And I must not forget to mention my good friend, Dr. W. R. Merwin, and his equally good wife, both stanch Infidels; and I am pleased to know that they are differently situated from the way most Infidels are, for they are the owners and occupants of one of the finest residences in Detroit; and if they have any money to dispose of they prefer, they say, to giv it to suffering humanity rather than for the support of "God-houses."

I enjoyed the Orion Camp-Meeting very much. It was under the supervision of S. B. McCracken, of Detroit, one of the most activ Freethinkers in this country. I notice Bro. McCracken is getting up another camp-meeting for August 23d at Ionia, Michigan. And this reminds me we must hav three or four Liberal grove-meetings in New York state after the Watkins Convention.

On the 25th of June, in company with Judge McCormick, I spoke for the Linesville Liberal League, which, by the way, is not one of the "dead Leagues" we read of. This League has a fine hall, tastily fitted up, and has for five or six years held regular meetings and annually celebrated Paine's birthday.

On Sunday last I spoke at North Hannibal before one of the most substantial Liberal Leagues in this state. This League meets regularly every two weeks, and has done so for the last six years. It has a regular attendance of about one hundred and fifty. It often employs speakers. Levi G. Ball is President of the League, W. J. Bradt, Secretary, and Ambrose Price, Treasurer. Among the members are a number of good speakers. It is composed mostly of farmers and their wives and children. They hay a fine choir of singers, hold sociables, picnics, and other entertainments. There is but one place where public meetings are held in the village, and that is the school-house, and in that three Christian denominations hold their meetings, as well as the Hannibal Liberal League, and I learn the attendance at the League meetings are larger than all the Christian meetings put together.

Our friends in Hannibal are entitled to great credit for the way they sustain their League. I put it down as far the best League in the state outside of New York city. The members of this League contemplate attending the Watkins Convention and tenting out. And, by the way, I hav engaged the shady Village Park at Watkins for the Convention and for tenting purposes, and I hope to see a dozen tents put up there for the week of the Convention.

THE WATKINS CONVENTION.

A word to friends who cannot attend the Watkins Convention. If you cannot attend, you can send me a small subscription to use in defraying its expenses. Please do it at once.

A LETTER FROM DR. T. L. BROWN.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I would like to hav the following letter from my friend Dr. Brown published in your columns, nothwithstanding it may justly subject me to the charge of a little vanity. I was sure Dr. Brown would be in favor of giving Mr. Bennett a public dinner and reception at Watkins; and allow me to say here that letters indorsing the proposition are reaching me from every quarter. I wish our distinguished literary writer and biographer, James Parton, could be engaged to deliver the address of welcome on the occasion. The article Dr. Brown refers to I herewith inclose. Dr. Knox is the leading Presbyterian minister of southern New York. H. L. G.

DR. BROWN'S LETTER.

BINGHAMTON, N. Y., July 17, 1882.

FRIEND GREEN: In the Elmira Telegram, under the heading of "Dr. Knox and Satan," I hav read one of the best things written by you I hav ever seen put to the consideration of those Presbyterians who would wilfully lie about the Freethinkers.

Your work this year has been all we could ask, and I want to be one of five thousand Liberals to giv you one dollar apiece for your general work, and do the same every year I live.

Any suggestions you may giv me about the coming convention I shall be glad to receive from you. I most fully approve of the dinner we are to giv D. M. Bennett on that occasion.

I am more interested in the general Liberal cause than ever before in all my life. You can depend upon me to work in the most harmonious manner with both Christians and Spiritualists in the rule of the majority. We are in a good condition to again meet the common enemy at Watkins. Hoping to hear from you soon, and, as you wish, help you in your efforts to advance the cause of mental liberty, I am ever yours,

T. L. BROWN.

[That our readers may hav an opportunity to indorse Dr. Brown's estimate of Bro. Green's little shot at the Presbyterians, which appeared in the Elmira Sunday Telegram, we append it.—ED. T. S.]

DR. KNOX AND SATAN.

I noticed that the corner-stone of a new Presbyterian church was laid in your city last week, and from a report in the Advertiser I learn that among other false and foolish things Rev. Dr. Knox said: "Radical opponents of the church were meeting once a year to say that the church was falling down and couldn't stand alone; but meanwhile church people (Christians) were meeting every day to put up more churches for Christ than the Freethinkers, so called, could build in a year for Satan, either at Watkins, Hornellsville, or anywhere else." In the first place, I want to thank Dr. Knox for advertising the Freethinkers' coming convention, and then ask him a question or two. Doctor, how do you know Christ indorses your church? Christ, when on earth, it is reported, took up little children and blessed them and said, "Of such is the kingdom of heaven." Your Presbyterian "Confession of Faith" holds that little children, if not of the elect, go to hell and are there to be tormented forever. Christ said man should be rewarded according to deeds done in the body. Your Presbyterian "Confession of Faith" is a Calvinistic document, and teaches that good works are of no account—that men, women, and children are sent to heaven or hell, not on account of any good or bad deeds, but by reason of a decree made by God before they were born. If that is true, doctor, by what reason do you claim the Presbyterian church is a church of Christ? You speak of Freethinkers building up churches for the devil. We deny the charge. We hav no interest in the old cloven-footed fellow. He is an orthodox institution, and the church could not get along without him. A few years ago a man to my knowledge was turned out of an orthodox church for saying he did not believe in the devil. And I judge your Presbyterian church would not take in a member who did not believe in the devil. As Theodore Parker used to say, "The devil is the fourth person in the orthodox godhead." But, doctor, if Freethinkers ever get to building churches I hope they will be manly enough not to exempt them from just taxation, and thus compel other people to pay the taxes on them whether they desire to or not. What cheek an orthodox minister must hav to stand up in the pulpit of a church untaxed and read the eighth commandment, "Thou shalt not steal!"

H. L. GREEN.

What Shall We Name Them?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The correspondence of Mrs. Lake and Mrs. Wixon is very interesting, and doubtless contains suggestions worthy of consideration; but I could not help noticing that both these ladies (for whom I hav great respect), in their plea for the preservation, after marriage, of the anti-nuptial identity of woman, omitted to make any provision for the naming of such children as may occur from the matrimonial association of male and female citizens. If Citizen Smith (female) enters into connubial partnership with Citizen Brown (male), and both retain their maiden name, so to speak, shall the achievements of their mutual offspring render illustrious the name of Smith, or shall such offspring liv only to perpetuate the glory of the house of Brown? One or the other of these names would naturally be adopted as the common denominator of the little Brown-Smiths, and which it shall be is the duty of those who favor this movement to decide in a satisfactory manner before their apostles become involved in the difficulty which these remarks are designed to call attention to.

DENNIS.

Watkins and the Freethinkers.

The weeks are fast speeding away, and I trust that every Infidel who can do so is preparing to attend the great Freethought convention at Watkins in August.

Every man and woman whose heart is thrilling to the music of the new era, who looks anxiously and hopefully forward to the dawn of a new day for the human race—a day when the slavery of creed, of custom, and of caste shall hav passed away—should determin to be present at Watkins and to do whatever he or she can to signify that Infidels are moving; that in the world's work they are not laggards.

All should feel it a pleasure to contribute of time, money, and influence to the success of this undertaking, the responsibility of which has been assumed by that ever-activ and zealous worker, H. L. Green.

In response to inquiries as to whether I shall be at Watkins, let me say that I so intend. I hav already turned eastward—having completed my Western engagements—and shall be with you upon that occasion.

I should be glad to hear from Eastern individuals and societies in reference to lectures. MRS. H. S. LAKE, Further from Mr. Bennett.

MILWAUKEE, July 17, 1882.

DEAR EUGENE: I hav just arrived here by train from Chicago, and found kind friends and a carriage at the depot awaiting my arrival, and was transported to the Plankington House, one of the finest hotels in Milwaukee. My reception last night at Hershey Music Hall, in Chicago, was a perfect success. That fine hall was well filled at an early hour, though an admittance fee of twenty-five cents was charged at the door. Mr. J. K. Magie, president of the Chicago Liberal League, ably presided, and Dr. Paoli, president of the Scandinavian Liberal League, Prof. P. Bandgrass, J. W. Archibald, Prof. Charles Orchardson, and W. T. Peck, acted as vice-presidents.

Over the stage and in front, the word "Welcome," in large letters and inclosed by a wreath of evergreens, stood out conspicuously. On another banner in large letters were these living words: "Free thought, free speech, a free press, and free mails." On one side of the proscenium was a painting of Thomas Paine, surrounded by a wreath, with this glorious and immortal quotation from him conspicuously displayed: "The world is my country; to do good, my religion." On the opposit side on another large canvas was the painting of a female with a wreath, surrounded with these appropriate words: "Reason offers her wreath to all truth seekers." A life-size painting of Robt. G. Ingersoll, also wreathed, stood near the foot-lights in front. The stage was profusely decorated with flowers, evergreens, and wreaths.

The services commenced with a voluntary on the fine organ of the hall, exquisitly performed. I entered the hall while the voluntary was being performed, when I was greeted with such applause as could not fail to make any recipient happy. The president stated clearly the object of the meeting, when the secretary, E. A. Stevens, read some letters from persons who could not be present, among which were the following:

NEW YORK, July 13, 282.

E. A. STEVENS, Dear Sir: Let me add my voice and my congratulations for the safe arrival of the great world traveled truth seeker on the shores of his nativ continent.

The American Board of Foreign Missions, through their illustrious vicegerent in America, Anthony Comstock, sent Mr. Bennett as a missionary to India. I congratulate them on their choice of a man of learning, eloquence, and eminent fitness for the preaching of the latest and truest gospel through all the world to every creature, and would like to ask the American Board how they relish the result. Since we hear that many saints were brought to repentance, and led to see the error of their ways through his preaching, we hope they will know where to come again when they want to secure the persuasivness and the energy of a man illumined from on high and inspired by the divinest afflatus.

We await with deep interest the coming of Mr. Bennett on his triumphant way across the continent.

I am, most sincerely, first his, and then yours,

T. C. LELAND.

ROCKFORD, ILL., July 14, 1882.

MY DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: I hav purposely delayed answering you, hoping circumstances would occur by which I could join your reception on the 16th to our voyager around the world, but, unfortunately, there is no Saturday-night train from here to Chicago. Imperativ duties keep me here until midnight.

Convey the congratulations of Rockford Liberal League, No. 199, and those of my own to our worthy friend, D. M. Bennett, on his successful trip and safe arrival home from his 25,000-mile voyage around the globe, and assure him of our continued confidence and esteem. Say to him that when the orthodox public shall so amend their creeds as to make them harmonize with the teachings of nature, we shall hope they will abandon calumny, misrepresentation, falsehood, and persecution in their defense.

Trusting the attendance will be large and the ceremonies interesting and worthy the great occasion, with regrets that I am not able to participate in them, and thanks for your kind invitation to do so, I am, Fraternally and truly yours,

G. W. BROWN, M.D.

Mr. W. F. Peck read a poem composed for the occasion by Mrs. H. S. Lake.

A quartet, of two male and two female voices, sang in admirable style the following original song by Mr. Peck:

WELCOME GLEE TO D. M. BENNETT.

In loud and joyful strain
Merrily we sing, merrily we sing
A welcome home again
Shall music gladly ring.
Welcome, welcome to your home again,
O standard-bearer brave, we hail thee with applause,
From foreign lands returned with strength regained,
To battle still in freedom's cause.

CHORUS.—In loud and joyful, etc.

All hail thou noble son
Of liberty loyal and free,
In ages yet to come
Thy name shall honored be.
We'll ne'er forget the burdens you hav borne,
Your struggles 'neath the weight of obloquy and pain,
But from your dungeon's gloom a light has sprung
To fire the patriot heart again.

CHORUS.—In loud and joyful, etc.

Mrs. Dawson next skilfully performed a beautiful piano solo. The president then introduced me, recounting briefly some of the events in my career. I followed in remarks, continuing an hour and twenty minutes, giving an account, first, of my arrest, mock trial, and imprisonment, and then detailing incidents, observations, and impressions connected with my travels. When I stepped forward I was greeted with prolonged applause, which was repeated several times during my remarks. No reasonable person could ask for more hearty applause. Before I closed Miss Dora Sweet came gracefully forward and presented me with a large, beautiful bouquet in the form of a basket, and other bouquets of elegant flowers were furnished by Mrs. J. C. Jones and Mr. M. C. Wellington, all of which I hav expressed home, so highly did I prize them.

I was followed by an exquisit solo upon the organ, when Dr. Paoli was introduced and made some effectiv remarks upon the sacredness of free thought, free speech, a free press, and free mails.

A resolution indorsing the course I hav pursued, and condemning in strong terms the persecution and defamation which hav been extended to me by the church and false-hearted friends, was unanimously adopted.

Mrs. Freeman was then introduced and made many telling and eloquent remarks touching the spirit of persecution which our enemies hav shown, and warmly commended the principles of individual rights and freedom. Her mention of the "Christian Mule-Kicking Association," headed by that disgusting donkey, Anthony Comstock, was warmly applauded by the well-pleased audience. Another beautiful song of "The Liberal League" was rendered by the fine quartet club. At the close a large portion of the audience came forward and grasped me by the hand, giving it many a vigorous shake, and speaking many kind and sympathetic words to me. I also took subscriptions for THE TRUTH SEEKER and the books of travel. Several persons from distant towns were present, who had come expressly to attend the meeting, some coming a distance of fifty and a hundred miles. The friends were all enthusiastic, and everybody seemed pleased.

Too much praise cannot be awarded to the committee who had the preparation of the meeting in charge, and the efforts of Mr. E. A. Stevens, secretary of the Liberal League, are especially worthy of mention. I feel particularly grateful to all my Chicago friends.

The afternoon of the day here was spent in a carriage drive over the city and suburbs in company with T. W. Williams, M.D., Mr. A. B. Severance, and Mrs. H. S. Lake. Milwaukee is a beautiful city, situated, as it is, on an elevated bluff on the western shore of Lake Michigan. Its elegant residences, in view of the lake, and along Grand avenue, are unusually rich and more numerous than in most other cities of the same size.

July 18th.—The meeting last night at the Academy of Music, given in honor of myself, was a large one. The beautiful theater was well filled. A large and splendid bouquet occupied a prominent place on a table at the front of the stage. Mr. Landor, a lawyer of the city, and chairman of the committee of reception, being rather hoarse, did not preside at the meeting, and that duty devolved upon the vice-president, Dr. Juliet H. Severance, who acquitted herself with dignity and ability.

Dr. T. W. Williams made the opening speech, and read a paper of decided ability, reviewing the ground occupied by the Liberals of America. The exposition of the errors and shams of theology was thorough. The compliments paid to myself were all I could ask.

Dr. Severance read several letters from friends in the East as follows:

PAINE MEMORIAL, BOSTON, July 13, 1882.

MR. CHAIRMAN, AND LADIES AND GENTLEMEN: We are much pleased to learn that our respected friend and excellent fellow-laborer in the Liberal movement, D. M. Bennett, has reached your city on his journey homeward. In common with all of you, we hav read with great interest his letters from abroad, which manifest his superior ability as a writer and his remarkable and untiring industry as a traveler in seeing and making a note of everything, from great to small, of any importance to the general reader. Mr. Bennett in these two respects had acquitted himself with high credit, and to the entire satisfaction of his numerous friends, and also in his ready and valuable efforts to promote Liberalism, as opportunities hav offered. With you all we congratulate him that having escaped the danger of the seas, and (if we may be allowed a little scripture) "the pestilence that walketh in darkness and the destruction that wasteth at noonday," he returns in safety, health, strength, and renewed vigor from his protracted and useful experience among Christians and heathen. It was said of the philosopher Franklin, who, you know, was of "our church," that he could not cross a channel without making some discovery useful to mankind; and it may be said, without any flattery, of our friend Bennett, that his voyage around the world has added to our stock of knowledge by the interesting and instructiv letters he has given us. He engaged in a hazardous undertaking, but he got through "right side up;" perhaps he had been saved "providentially!" but as we are not quite sure of that we will not stop to argue the point. Sufficient for us that he has got back alive, and is the same D. M. Bennett, Liberally, that he was when he sailed from New York a year ago. And now, ladies and gentlemen, please drink this Boston toast as a mark of respect to our friend Bennett, and as an expression of gladness for his safe arrival:

"When his perils are past, shall our gratitude sleep?
No! Here's to the pilot that weathered the storm."

P. S.—In conclusion, permit us to say to you, Liberal brothers and sisters of Milwaukee, that you honor yourselvs by this kind reception to Mr. Bennett. We are all engaged in the same common cause, the cause of freedom and humanity. It is the only right cause, and never let us cease our labors in it until time rings down his curtain upon us and the drama of life is ended. We hope you are having a pleasant and a large party, and whenever any of you come to Boston we shall be pleased to see you at the Paine Memorial, where there is always free thought and free speech, and where "the latch-string is always out."

With kind regards and best wishes for all, we are,

Yours fraternally, HORACE SEAVER,
JOSIAH P. MENDUM.

NEW YORK, July 12, 282.

TO THE BENNETT RECEPTION COMMITTEE: You wish a word from me for your reception of the "Around-the-World" pilgrim, D. M. Bennett? Let it be this, Those who suffer and toil for Liberty should be honored by her servants the world over. In such honor you honor yourselvs. Those who make and stand the brunt of the test cases of liberty must never be deserted when under fire. It is only by such tests that our dangers are disclosed and popular government is secured.

All defects and failings are atoned for by, and pale before, such services as Mr. Bennett has rendered to the cause of liberty at home and abroad.

The welcome you giv the pilgrim will hav more than an echo when he reaches New York. Yours sincerely,

T. B. WAKEMAN.

NEW YORK, July 14, 1882.

MRS. JULIET H. SEVERANCE, M.D., My Dear Doctor: There is no such avenger as time, as he rolls around his whirligig. Time is doing much avenging work for Mr. Bennett, and doing it in his time, and on time too.

In September, 1879, at the annual Congress of the National Liberal Liberal League, in Cincinnati, while Mr. Bennett was still in prison as a representativ defender of a free press in a free republic, the delegate, or one of the delegates, from Milwaukee, strenuously opposed the resolution of sympathy with Mr. Bennett, presented by Col. Ingersoll, and, on its final almost unanimous passage, he, the only dissenting so-called Liberal in that large body, rose in his place and voted a loud, spiteful No! Since that time Mr. Bennett, patronized and supported by the Liberals of this country, has been twice to Europe and once around the world, meeting with a continued series of receptions in his own city, in London, in Asia, and wherever he has traveled. Now he appears in the presence of that disagreeing delgate and receives an ovation in his own city of Milwaukee, such as no other Liberal in the country could obtain.

It is glorious to be "in the right with two or three," but what is it to be in the wrong in a minority of one? It seems in this case to be making a moral Haman of oneself—a fitting goose to hang high—while the Liberal Mordecai, illustrious sufferer for freedom's sake, sits in triumph in the most liberal "king's gate" that has yet been developed in this republic.

Yours very sincerely, T. C. LELAND.

ROCHESTER, N. Y., July 12, 1882.

TO THE CHAIRMAN OF THE BENNETT RECEPTION:

"Bearded, sunburnt, gray-necked, forbidding, I hav arrived,
To be wrestled with as I pass, for the solid prizes of the universe,
For such I afford whoever can persevere to win them.
On my way a moment I pause,
Here for you! and here for America!" —Walt Whitman.

It is not possible for any man to be a true friend to humanity or to freedom without being an uncompromising enemy to all kinds of slavery, for there can be no permanent peace to individuals or nations while slavery of either mind or body exists. That your honored guest, D. M. Bennett, editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, on his way home from a triumphal march around the world, is such a man, I am, after a long acquaintance, thoroughly convinced. He is an iconoclast, a hater of shams, and under the most trying circumstances (as has been clearly proved) would not for a moment entertain a thought of compromising with any wrong that would in any manner endanger the liberty of man, woman, or child. Let us welcome him again with open arms and joyous hearts, feeling assured that after a year's absence in foreign lands, battling for universal mental liberty for all nations, he will still continue the formidable struggle against all kinds of superstition and priestcraft with the same ardor and success as in the past.

Out of slavery comes war. Hence this skirmishing all along the lines. The enemy show themselvs in various disguises. One of the latest and most disgusting to all intelligent minds is that of attempting to suppress Walt Whitman's "Leaves of Grass." Any attempt to end this conflict between Freethought and religious intolerance, except by an entire cessation of the encroachments of the church upon all Liberals of whatever name or nature, is like covering up a volcano which must inevitably burst forth in the future with renewed vigor and violence, carrying sorrow and destruction in its path. The end is not yet. Let us strike hands of undying friendship and love, and resist with unflinching purpose all kinds of oppression, and let us not cease in our well-doing until all nations, races, and sexes are free from the stupid authority of "thus saith the Lord," which has so long held women, both by law and custom, in subjection to men, and which the latter in turn hav for the same length of time permitted to be done like a great army of poltroons. Very respectfully yours, JAY CHAAPEL.

ROCHESTER, July 12, 1882.

MY DEAR DR. JULIET H. SEVERANCE: I am truly rejoiced to hear that the truth seekers of Milwaukee are so wide awake to the great needs of the hour as to giv our veteran hero in all good works a public reception.

D. M. Bennett is not trying to be a hero; he is trying to be a man; so we need not be afraid of hurting him. I say man, because I think it the highest praise, and if custom and law had not put an ignominious bar between man and woman I should bow to him in reverence above all other names. In recognizing all of the patriotic good work of our earnest friend and brother, I hav sometimes wished that he would speak a little oftener of the mean injustice of woman's humiliating position, and ask, Who did it? Who has hedged her in? But my faith in the "good time coming" is strengthening. I rejoice every hour to see the great people of the West so ready to honor our best agitator on his safe arrival from his long and toilsome journey, and I hope this grand opportunity will be kept up and increased on his near approach home. In view of the mighty effort made everywhere—everywhere to impede every advance step, every progressiv work and word, surely Agitate, agitate! should be our watchword, as in the days of negro slavery.

Very respectfully, AMY POST.

J. O. Barrett, from the northern portion of the state, made a very finished and effectiv speech, in which my efforts in the cause of Freethought and the persecutions of my enemies received due attention.

Mrs. H. S. Lake was then introduced and made a finished and able speech, closing with the following original welcome to myself:

WELCOME TO D. M. BENNETT.

Welcome! Truth's devoted seeker!
Not from fields of war's red glory,
But from plains, and seas, and mountains,
Rich in ancient lore and story.

Welcome! not from war's debasement,
Where man slays his conquered brother,
But from fields of mental conflict,
Where the victor helps the other;

Helps unbind the bands and fetters
That hav kept man's mind in prison;
Helps destroy the fabled Eden,
To rebuild a real Elysium.

Gods and goddesses hav failed us;
They hav reaped our love and labor,
Yet, where peace and joy should blossom,
Flash the guns, and gleams the saber.

Over all this globe of plenty,
Where strong arms hav delved and spaded,
Labor weeps in rags and tatters,
Hungry, wretched, and degraded.

On the plains and in the cities,
Where the steeples gleam and glisten,
Honest thought is gagged and handcuffed,
While to rogues the people listen.

"Governments belong to governed!"
Such the sentiment invented
By a nation in whose counsels
Woman is not represented.

So the theory of justice
Mocks the people through the ages;
But at last the light is blazing
From the poet's pen, and sage's.

Round the world the rays are glinting,
And they light the night of error;
From the bonfires we are building,
Priests and kings shall flee in terror.

We will raise the house of refuge
For the slave of every station;
We will toil with brain and muscle
For a sensible salvation.

So we rally round our standards—
Soldiers true in every season;
So we greet you, scribe and comrade,
In the dawning "Age of Reason."

I was then introduced, and for about forty minutes spoke to the audience in my usual uninteresting style.

The meeting was concluded with an earnest appeal from Mrs. Lake in favor of organization, and of reviving the League which once existed here. At the close of her remarks over forty names were given by those in favor of forming a new League. The meeting continued over two hours.

I hav to report that here, as well as at Chicago, the dirty sick-roosterites hav been busy at their vile work in sending out from the East in large numbers the scurrilous, anonymous, and infamous pamphlets alluded to. Three of these were sent to each of the Chicago papers, and hundreds of them were sent to this city, and they hav been freely handed around and mailed. There is some diversity of opinion as to the source from whence these pamphlets come, some thinking them furnished by Comstock, and others regarding them as from the Boston school of "cultured Liberalism." The job of issuing and circulating these pamphlets was a part of the dirty work marked out by the conspirators at Greenwood, while I was the occupant of a prison cell, with the bolts turning on me ten times a day. The fact that M. Masson, the secretary of the Comstock obscene society of this city, has distributed them freely, and is known to hav mailed them, would seem to indicate that Comstock had something to do with them; but the relation with them of R. C. Spencer, the "cultured" gentleman who was expelled from the National Liberal League Congress at Chicago nearly two years ago for improper conduct and offensiv and insulting language, and who is also an ardent Index man, connects those shameful pamphlets with the Boston-Greenwood-Comstock-Ellis-Abbot-Underwood-Bundy-Savage-Religio-Index conspiracy crew. The "honors," perhaps, may be divided between Comstock and the parties named, but it is pretty well understood that the dirty pamphlets were issued and largely circulated by the other party. Thousands were thrown into the entrance of Chickering Hall at the time of my reception upon leaving prison, and thousands were sent all over the country. This was unquestionably the most dirty and infamous mode of warfare ever pursued by moral skunks, sneaks, and hypocrits. If such conduct belongs to Liberalism then I hav been mistaken in the article, and need to revise my opinion of it. What can men think of themselvs who will busily circulate such shameful documents—not for the promotion of truth and virtue, but only to injure one already deeply wronged? The base and despicable course of this class of men is in strik contrast with the letters from the true friends above quoted.

I leave to-day for Michigan and the East. In two weeks I will be with you. D. M. B.

NEARER MY HOME TO THEE.

THREE RIVERS, MICH., July 22, 282.

DEAR EUGENE: Leaving Milwaukee on the morning of the 18th, I halted for a few hours in Chicago, and at 3:40 P. M. friends Magie and Jones accompanied me to the Central Michigan depot, where the good-byes were duly said. I arrived at Dowagiac, Mich., at a little past eight, where I found Dr. Abbie Knapp waiting with a carriage to convey me to the farm house nearly eight miles from the town. Here I enjoyed a very pleasant visit of over thirty hours. Some three loads of the friends having been notified of my arrival, drove out to the farm, where we partook of an excellent dinner and enjoyed an agreeable visit of six or eight hours. Prolonged conversations and discussions were indulged in, with interest, all around.

My next point to make was this, where dwell my boyhood friends, E. D. Blakeman, C. E. Sears, and their amiable companions. I had to stop over at Kalamazoo for a few hours to wait for the train coming south to this place, and took the opportunity to call upon a few TRUTH SEEKER friends, who insisted upon my taking a carriage ride with them around the beautiful town, passing out by the State Insane Asylum to the large nursery of L. G. Bragg, an ardent admirer of THE TRUTH SEEKER and the Round-the-World letters. I had such illustrious companions as Willian Shakspere, H. M. Porter, Lucius C. West, and John Galligan. They chided me somewhat for not notifying them of my passage through Kalamazoo, that they might have taken some steps to do me honor. Upon accompanying me to the southern train, they extracted a promis from me that I would return there from Jackson and partake of a dinner with them on Monday evening next. Being somewhat fond, by the bye, both of a good dinner and the society of appreciativ friends, the promis was readily given.

I found the friends here in wating for me; I hav had a pleasant visit with them, and am pleased to report them virtuous, prosperous, and happy. My visit here has been very agreeable.

My good friends, M. P. Thurston and wife, of Burr Oak, drove over fifteen miles to see me, and urged me strongly to return with them and visit the truth seekers in their neighborhood; but my engagements would not admit of it. Bro. Thurston is a great lover of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I was very glad of the opportunity to visit with him.

In a few hours I take the train east for Jackson, where I am advertised to speak to-morrow. In a little more than a week I will hav fulfilled my engagements, and will once more be with you.

D. M. B.

STILL NEARING HOME.

JACKSON, MICH., July 24, 282.

DEAR EUGENE: When I arrived here from Three Rivers on Saturday, I found friends and a carriage waiting for me; the friends made me welcome, and the carriage conveyed me to the Hurd House, where many friends called upon me. Hearty conversation was engaged in, and the visiting continued until a late hour. I found that delegations had come in to see me from different localities in the state, some traveling for this purpose ten, twenty, forty, and even a hundred miles. Of course the knowledge of this made me proud, though I could not forget that it was the cause I represent more than personal considerations which brought them here. I was nevertheless very glad to see them and take them by the hand.

Double honors hav been shown me here. The first reception was given me yesterday afternoon in Merriman's beautiful grove adjoining the city, the weather being most propitious and enjoyable. S. D. Moore presided over the meeting and made the opening remarks. Mrs. A. E. N. Rich, of this city—her poetical name being "Ethel Etherton"—recited a welcome poem, written for the occasion. If you and the other friends will excuse the over-complimentary allusions to your humble servant I will send it to you. Here it is:

Welcome to-day with greeting earnest, heartfelt,
Come in behalf of friends of Liberal thought,
To D. M. Bennett, of world-wide reputation,
The man who never yet was sold nor bought.

Around the world this intellectual giant,
To see her wonders, with her gods commune;
Into the lap of science pouring treasures
To broaden freedom's skirts, her path illume.

Around the world this truth seeker hath wended
His way. Again with his own people stands.
Shall the Pacific coast or Eastern borders
Outdo the West in "holding up his hands?"

This man who for mankind hath been a martyr,
Not for some mythical, some monstrous God,
And that he dared giv utterance to reason,
Smite with Truth's sword blind bigots' blood-stained rod.

Behind the bars for what? obscene effusions?
No! freedom of conscience, liberty of speech!
The Comstock grab a subterfuge to place him
Beyond the power the public ear to reach.

There never yet was wall so high or hoary,
Abyss so black as the famed Calcutta hole,
But from its depths would leap to light and glory
The inspiration of a mighty soul.

Bennett, behind the bars, like Michael Davitt,
Was heard in every port, from strand to strand.
These prison-voices, like deep, rolling thunder,
From center to circumference shake the land.

This cry for liberty is far outreaching;
Every true heart its echoes will prolong
To cheer the heroes who dare stir the waters
Of our Bethesda; "suffer and be strong."

When to step out means something more than honors,
Vile persecution in ten thousand forms,
Imprisonment, a crown, but not of roses—
Of asphodel and rue studded with thorns;

Then while these angels stir the mighty waters,
And thus impregn them with life-giving powers—
Powers first to cauterize, then heal the nations,
Before which staid conventionalism cowers.

Let every soul worthy the name of manhood
Step out and plunge into this cleansing pool;
The future holds for such his meed of glory,
Though asses bray and serpents hiss "thou fool!"

Bennett around the world with pen of granit
Hath traced upon the everlasting hills
Truths that will light the onward march of science,
When creeds hav perished with the word that kills.

Then let us as truth seekers, brave, true, earnest,
Giv him a welcome home, warm, loving, long,
To cheer him in this work of human progress,
To bear him heavenward on the waves of song.

Three cheers for him who dares brave opposition,
Fearless of foes, tireless to combat wrong!
Such names shall yet be borne on waves of glory
Around the world, chanted in all known tongues

By those whom through like suffering hav grown strong!
Then superstition drop her mantle gory—
Reason and freedom love-crowned tell the story,
A world redeemed, and earth and heaven strike palms!

Dr. J. W. Kenyon, of this city, followed in able and complimentary remarks. Being a converted clergyman, he speaks with ease and ability. I followed in expressions of gratitude, and giving some of the incidents of my travel, especially connected with the "Holy Land."

Mr. Moore closed the meeting by an urgent appeal in favor of organization.

Another meeting was held in the evening in Guard Hall in the city. Many of those attending the afternoon had to drive home, and others attended the evening meeting who were not present in the afternoon, so the two audiences were only partially the same. The speakers, however, were the same. Mr. Moore presided, and gave a brief history of my arrest, trial, and imprisonment, as well as of my visit to Europe two years ago, and my journey around the world. Dr. J. W. Kenyon followed in an eloquent address, dwelling upon the effects of the persecutions which hav been imposed upon me, speaking in very complimentary terms of the two volumes I wrote while in prison, "The Truth Seeker in Europe," and the five volumes written while traveling round the world. Mrs. Rich again recited her welcome poem in a very effectiv manner, after which I spoke nearly an hour. A good audience was present. At the close or the meeting steps were taken for the organizing of a Liberal League. The stand upon the platform was decorated with a bouquet of bright flowers, presented by Mrs. Atwood, of Eaton Rapids.

I return West to Kalamazoo to-day, where a reception will be tendered me this evening. After that I set my face homeward, stopping only for a visit and reception at Rochester, N. Y. In a week from this time I will probably be in my old place at home. D. M. B.

NOT wishing to be behind the Liberals of other cities in giving honor where honor is due, those of New York will giv Mr. Bennett a banquet reception on Thursday evening, August 3d, at 6 P. M., at Martinelli's, corner of Fifth ave. and 16th street. The presence of as many friends as possible is desired. There will be several prominent Liberals from abroad. We expect Geo. Chainey and friends Mendum and Seaver, as will be seen by the following from the Investigator:

"We were obliged to our friend Macdonald for his kind invitation; accept it with much pleasure, and shall be on hand, one or both of us, at the dinner, which, as our friend Bennett deserves, let it be good, for his sake, and full of 'material aid and comfort' for the sake of those who are to eat it.

"Fraternally, but in a hurry, BOTH."

We assure our Materialistic friends that the dinner will be good, as Mr. Martinelli has considerable reputation in that line in this city.

To cover cost of dinner and incidental expenses the price of tickets has been put at $2. They can be obtained of Dr. E. B. Foote, 120 Lexington ave.; E. W. Chamberlain, 120 Broadway, or E. M. Macdonald, TRUTH SEEKER office.

The Slade Exposure.

From the Belleville (Ontario) Daily Intelligencer.

The best-known of the slate-writing mediums, and the one generally acknowledged to be possessed of the greatest mediumistic power, is Dr. Henry Slade, of New York. His name as a medium is world-wide, and he has confounded and converted some of the most eminent thinkers in England, Germany, and Russia, as well as in America, by the wonderful phenomena which are produced by him. Knowing this, a number of gentlemen of this city, having heard much, read some, but seen but little of so-called spirit phenomena, determined to engage Dr. Slade for one week, to giv daily sittings or seances. The arrangements were completed, the engagement was made, and Dr. Slade arrived in Belleville on Friday evening, the 30th ult., and put up at the Dafoe House, where rooms had been engaged for him. The doctor's suave, gentlemanly manner and apparently honest and sincere desire to work in the great cause to which he had devoted his life created in many minds quite an impression in his favor. "It does not matter," he said earnestly to the writer, "if only one person in Belleville is convinced of the fact of a future existence who was not convinced of it before, I will consider myself well repaid."

Such a noble illustration of disinterestedness and zeal could not but impress one with his honesty of purpose, notwithstanding the fact that he was to receive $150 and his expenses for the visit. Dr. Slade's sittings began, and the phenomena which were produced were certainly, at first, startling; but after the first surprise, several of those who held successiv sittings with him began to observe suspicious movements on the part of the doctor, not so much in the slate-writing (which, in most minds, remained a mystery up to the last, and is not satisfactorily explained tosome even yet) as in the other phenomena with which the slate-writing was supplemented. These other phenomena were mere tricks, whether judged as spiritual manifestations or sleight-of-hand performances. The slate was passed under the table by some invisible agency into the hand of one of the sitters while both the doctor's hands were on the table; those sitting around the table had their limbs tapped and pressed, as by a hand, and occasionally their chairs were sharply jerked; a long pencil would be placed on a slate, and when the doctor would place the slate under the table the pencil would fly suddenly from under the table on to it, or over the heads of the sitters; if the "atmospheric conditions" were favorable, a large chair, which was always placed at a convenient distance from the doctor's chair, would suddenly fly toward him; and of course the raps under the table and in the vicinity of the medium were of frequent occurrence. In every one of these "manifestations" the doctor was detected by different parties at different times. Sunday night, Mr. James Starling distinctly saw him throw the long pencil, with his thumb and finger, from the edge of the table over the heads of the company. He was also detected afterward by Mr. J. Northcott and others. This is a simple trick, and can be done by anyone with a little practice. Dr. Abbott, in the course of his only sitting, looked suddenly under the table while loud raps were in progress and distinctly saw Slade's heel knocking against the rung of his chair. The raps under the table were of course produced by the toe of Slade's left slipper. The pressures and taps were undoubtedly produced by him. One who had sat with him two or three times and closely observed him could not fail to perceive that just before the taps and pressures would be made on the limbs of any one of the sitters he would always pretend to be touched himself, and would shiver, jerk back his chair, and look under the table, giving as a reason that he was so nervous that he did it instinctivly. For his keen and practiced eye, just the one glance was sufficient to enable him to "take in" the disposition of the legs of the company, and he could, with that snake-like left leg of his (which he always kept under the table, allowing the other to remain in full view of the company), touch any of the sitters wherever he pleased, with an unerring precision, so long as they kept their limbs in the same position. A close and suspicious observer could easily perceive by the movement of Slade's body when he was manipulating his left leg. On one occasion, Mr. James Starling, who sat at the doctor's left, was touched on the left knee. He suddenly and very vigorously raised his right foot, and it came in contact with a material substance suspiciously resembling the calf of a leg, and the ownership of the said leg was immediately confirmed by an expression of pain on Slade's open countenance, and an uneasy start from that individual. After this "manifestation" Slade objected to having Mr. Starling sit in the circle on the ground that he had already sat five times, which, he claimed, should hav satisfied him. On another occasion, after the party sitting opposit Slade had been touched several times on both limbs, the writer, who was sitting at Slade's left, suddenly crossed his legs immediately in front of the medium, so that that individual could not, by any possibility, get his foot beyond them without touching, not knowing them to be in that position. In a moment there was a very palpable touch, not to say a kick, on the writer's left ankle, and Slade immediately afterward looked under the table.

It is significant that so long as the writer kept his legs crossed in front of Slade, the gentleman sitting opposit Slade was not touched, though the party to his right was. As to the passing of the slate under the table, that was done with Slade's useful left foot, which he could bend forward so far that the toe almost touched the front of his leg. The slate rested flat on the sole of his slipper, and in this manner he passed it along to any one in the circle to whom "the spirits" were directed to send it. Mr. A. McGinnis, leaning back in his chair quietly, saw Slade's foot with the slate resting on it. Mr. W. Templeton also glanced under the table hastily on one occasion, but was observed by the doctor, and Mr. Templeton, though he did not see the slate on his foot, saw the slate fall to the floor and Slade's foot draw back like lightning to his chair. The spirits attempted four times to carry the slate to the writer, but failed each time, the slate falling to the ground before it could reach his hand. The reason given by Slade was that the writer held his hand beyond the magnetic current, and the spirits could not carry the slate past that current. The real reason was that as soon as Slade announced that the slate had left his hand the writer moved his hand about eighteen inches from the rim of the table. where he could see, if the slate reached his hand, whether it was conveyed by any visible power. (It is perhaps necessary to explain that during all these manifestations Slade insists that all in the circle must join hands in the middle of the table—thus making it necessary for them to come up close to the table.) On Thursday Chief McKinnon detected Slade twitching with his toe the chair of the man on his left, and another gentleman distinctly saw him, with his left leg, wheel an arm-chair that was standing a few feet away, up to the table. Several other discoveries could be mentioned if we had space to enumerate them. But though the trick part of the phenomena was all made clear, the slate-writing remained a mystery. This much was clear, that it was not the work of spirits, for the writer received gushing messages from persons still living, whose names he had written on the slate. These yet embodied spirits wrote that they were present, were happy to be so, and one was so kind as to promis to remain always with the writer—in the capacity of office bore, it is to be presumed. There was no doubt in the majority of minds that the messages were fraudulent, but how they were produced was a puzzle. There was no doubt that when one of the circle wrote a name on the back of the slate and handed it to Slade, he contrived to read it while he held the slate under the table. As soon as the slate was well under the edge of the table, the spirits began to make his arm shake, and of course his wrist would shake and twist, and of course the slate, being in his hand, would shake and twist also—several times being turned completely over, so that he could read the name without any difficulty. Usually, however, he contented himself with allowing the slate to assume a perpendicular position, so that he could get a peep at the initials, without reading the whole name. As to how he produced the writing when the slate was under the table, no one could explain (and indeed it still remains unaccounted for). It may be observed, however, that no message in answer to a question was produced, while the slate was in that position, which was longer than a dozen words or so; they were always written in a cramped, unnatural hand, which, often, no one but himself could read; and they were written within a short space, not extending the full length and width of the slate, like the messages, not in reply to questions, which were supposed to be written between inclosed slates. The writing produced between closed slates or with the slate flat on the table was, moreover, regularly and well written, and could be read with ease. Several persons maintained that the writing between the closed slates was not produced at the time when it was supposed to occur, but that one of the slates which were placed together had writing on it when they were placed together, and that Slade deceived the sitters by sleight of hand when he pretended to show each side of both slates. Several persons had become convinced of this, but no one wished to be the party to snatch the slates and expose the trick. Chief McKinnon, however, at a seance on Wednesday also became convinced, and decided to make a test. Accordingly an arrangement was made by several parties to go together to the sitting yesterday morning at 10 o'clock, and the person on whose arm or shoulder Slade should rest the two closed slates was to grasp them and wrest them from him as soon as the writing should commence. Those who were present at that sitting were Chief McKinnon, E. McMahon, and Alderman Dickson.

When the time for the closed-slate feat came, Slade reached his hand, as usual, to the little stand behind him that held his slates, selected a slate, and appeared to show both sides of it as well as those of the one on the table. He closed them together as usual, with a scrap of pencil between them, and held them on Mr. McMahon's shoulder. In a moment the scratching began. But it was not heard longer than two seconds, when Mr. McMahon suddenly seized the slates, wrested them from Slade, and laid their inner surfaces open on the table. One of the slates was entirely covered with writing which, on examination, proved to be the following, which is but a specimen of all the platitudes that hav been supposed to come from the spirit land through Slade's mediumship, and which is given exactly as written, even to punctuation:

"You are all the children of the infinit; your times are the measure of endless years; your labors are the search from immemorial wisdom; your destiny is the joy and love—now it is time you all began to realize this fact and prepare to meet the change from earth to spirit; you cannot prepare unless you look more to the laws of spirit and of God—this is all I shall say now. God bless you all."

Slade, with the evidence of his fraud confronting him, did not make any attempt at explanation. He wilted at once, and appeared for a time quite dazed and stupid. But when Chief McKinnon threatened to arrest him for fraud he begged with tears and sobs to be allowed to leave town. He acknowledged that all the phenomena which had taken place were fraudulent, and that Spiritualism had nothing whatever to do with them. He offered to show how he produced the trick which had just been exposed, and explained it in this way: When he took the slate from the stand behind him it contained the message just quoted, which he had written while he was alone, before the sitting began. By sleight-of-hand manipulation, which is very easily understood when seen, he made it appear that he wiped and showed the two sides of each slate, while the fact is that he had wiped and showed only one side of the one that had the writing on. The scratching noise was produced by his finger, and the final tap on the slate denoting that the message is complete, by the same means. When told that he would probably be arrested, he paced the floor in extreme trepidation and entreated piteously to be allowed to leave the city at once, declaring that if arrested he would certainly cut his throat. Steps were taken to procure his arrest, but after the information had been laid and while the warrant for his arrest was being made out, two or three of those who had been most activ in unearthing his deceptions, moved to pity by his entreaties, his tears, and promises, pleaded for him and secured him his liberty. He left by the noon train for the east. Before he left the city he attempted to do something to retrieve himself. To one gentleman he said that when he admitted that his manifestations were the results of trickery he told a lie in order to avoid arrest, and was ready, on account of fear, to admit or deny anything. He told the cabman who drove him to the station that a certain gentleman who had prominently interested himself in the recent affair had got him drunk, and that he (Slade) was not responsible for what he had done or said.

Since he has gone there are several persons who hav had repeated sittings with him who are not satisfied with the explanation he gave of the production of writing within the closed slates. They say that they know the writing could not hav occurred in that way, because they brought their own marked slates to the sittings, had examined them closely on both sides before the writing came, and that Slade had never attempted to substitute any other slates in place of those they brought. However that may be, there is no doubt whatever that the manifestations which take place at night in Slade's bedroom are produced by himself. This was demonstrated on Thursday night to the complete satisfaction of the writer, who shared Slade's bed with him for some time that night. About a quarter of an hour after the writer turned off the gas and got into bed loud raps came apparently from the back of the bed near the writer's head. Slade immediately began to tremble and cower down in the bed, and in reply to the question what was the matter with him, he said the spirits were there and were going to do something, for he was being touched all over. The rapping continued, now at the head of the bed, now at the foot, now apparently under it—Slade never ceasing to shake and press close to his bed-fellow and clutch him by the arms convulsivly. After this interesting performance had lasted for about ten minutes, Slade asked the writer to address the spirits and ask them whether there would be manifestations during the night; he said himself that he thought it was rather late for them to manifest with much power. (It was then after 2 A.M.) The writer said aloud, "Well, do you intend to produce any manifestations to-night?" Three loud raps, signifying "yes," was the reply. Suddenly Slade rose on his left elbow and extended his right arm over the speaker's breast. "Look," he said, "at that bright light just at the foot of the bed. Oh look! don't you see it, just in the direction that I am pointing?" He continued in this way for about a minute, directing attention to a supposed light in the room, which, to the writer's unspiritual eyes, remained veiled in Egyptian darkness Slade then pointed in the direction of the bedroom door, shooting out his long, lithe arm suddenly over the writer's breast, and directing his attention to a most brilliant violet light in that direction. He was informed that his energetic pointing was rather unnecessary, for in the darkness his hand could not be seen, and he was civilly requested to be quiet. He paid no attention to the request, however, but almost immediately after it was made threw himself with considerable force against the writer, and stretched his arm far over his body. Something was heard to clank against the side of the bed, and the passiv occupant of the bed knew almost as well as its activ occupant that something was coming. He was not disappointed. In four or five seconds something decidedly hard and heavy fell, as if from the ceiling, on his bare shin, which lay outside the covers in case of an emergency. He leaned forward and clutched the object, and, feeling it, discovered it to be a smooth walking-stick with a metal knob. He quietly placed one end on the floor and held on to it with his right hand. "What was that thing that fell on the bed?" asked Slade, after a moment's pause. "Only a bit of a stick," was the reply.

A few minutes afterward Slade began groping with his left hand to find out what had become of the stick. He found his companion's right arm hanging by the side of the bed, and he asked, presently, "Hav you my walking stick in your hand?" The fellow had no doubt concealed the stick somewhere near the head of the bed when he retired, in case any "manifestations" would be required. The writer then caught Slade's both hands in his left hand and held them close to his breast, and demanded that the manifestations should continue under those conditions. Slade protested against this, and alternately argued, whimpered, and threatened, but he finally submitted. After a short time the writer was touched on the right leg several times and the rappings were renewed around the bed. After lying passiv for a minute or two, the writer raised his left leg as quickly as he could; it came in contact with Slade's left leg, which was evidently performing gyrations in the air. The first-mentioned leg rose higher than the other, and came down on it, pinning both of Slade's legs to the bed. Then grasping Slade's wrists tightly, the writer requested that the manifestations be continued. Slade writhed a little, protested much, and again threatened and whined, but again submitted, with very little resistance—strangely enough, for he is very powerful in the upper part of the body. For ten or fifteen minutes the two remained in that position, and during that time there was not the faintest suspicion of a manifestation—not a rap, not a touch, nothing. Finally a cramp in the left leg, brought on by keeping it so long in a strained position, induced the writer to release Slade. He then rose, dressed himself, and left the great medium to his dreams—not, however, without first denouncing him as a fraud.

Before closing we wish to say a word about the character of this individual, apart from his profession of medium-juggler-swindler, and we hope that this article will be copied into newspapers throughout Canada and the states, so that society may be warned against him, and he may be driven into private life. It is impossible to enter here into a minute description of Slade, but he is most assuredly a creature not fit for the companionship of respectable people—a slave to the most horrible, abnormal, and loathsome lusts; a being without conscience, without shame, without honor, and without sex.

IS HE THE GENUIN SLADE?

Since the foregoing article was put in type an Intelligencer reporter has seen and interviewed a gentleman named W. H Dakin, a traveler for a large hat and cap establishment in New York, who is in the city on business. Mr. Dakin asserts that the man who has been in Belleville under the name of Dr. Slade is not the real Slade, but an impostor. He was, he says, in Port Huron, Michigan, on Saturday last, and the real Slade was there on that day, and was extensivly advertised through the town to deliver a lecture on Sunday. He had been in Port Huron for nearly a week, stopping at the houses of prominent Spiritualists, and had been giving a series of seances, at which wonderful materializing phenomena had taken place. Mr. Dakin offered this afternoon to wager $100 against $5 that the Port Huron Slade is the genuin man, and the Belleville Slade is an impostor. In a day or two the true facts of this mixed-up affair will be ascertained.

THE QUESTION ANSWERED.

A telegram from the editor of the Port Huron Sunday Commercial says it was Dr. Charles Slade who lectured there. The genuin man is Henry Slade who was here.

The above account was sent to us several days ago, but we declined to publish it, having seen the following in the Banner of Light:

"Information reaches us from Montreal, Canada, that an individual who goes about that country calling himself—or by inference agreeing to allow others to call him—'Dr. Slade,' is now operating in that part of the continent, and has just been exposed in Belleville, Ont. We are glad to hear that to such an extent, at least, justice has overtaken him. We would inform our readers in Montreal, Belleville, and elsewhere, that Dr. (Henry) Slade, of New York city, the genuin proprietor of the name, is at present lecturing in Michigan, and is not, nor has he been of late, in Canada. The person claiming his name and reputation is either the party who is known as 'Charles Slade,' against whom we hav repeatedly warned our patrons, or else some one of the Braddon-Fay-et-al. combination now imposing upon the Canadian people has assumed the name of Slade to escape the effects of the showing up which we gave these 'worthies' in our issue of June 3d. The New York Sun paragraphs this 'Belleville' business as applying to the genuin Dr. Slade, but its attempt to injure a worthy medium is beneath contempt, and is too absurd to need an answer."

We had always thought the Banner to be a strictly reliable paper, and deemed the above sufficient to cast doubt upon the genuinness of the exposed medium, and so informed our Canadian friends. But the following letter leads us to believe that the affair is much mixed; and that it may be cleared up we print the whole. It seems to us that it is in order for brother Colby to explain, for the preponderance of evidence is against Slade. We trust our correspondent will not regret that we have softened down one or two of his expressions.—Ed. T. S.

Belleville, July 19, 1882.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I hav just received your letter, and noted its contents. As to it not being the genuin Dr. Henry Slade, who was so completely exposed here. I can and will prove that it was, also that the people in the Banner of Light office are mistaken. Here are the proofs:

First. The first letter we sent reached Slade through the Banner of Light office.

Second. Slade was recognized by Mr. H. Tammadge, of this city, as the same man who was on trial in London several years ago.

Third. He was recognized by Mr. C. J. Starling, who visited him several times in New York city.

Fourth. He was recognized both from photographs and engravings in illustrated papers in the possession of several of us here.

Fifth. In a letter written to a gentleman of this city, Mr. F. H. Rous, written after the exposure, he attempts to excuse himself. I send you the paper so you can judge with what success.

Sixth. While here many letters were received by him, all addressed to Dr. Henry Slade, and several forwarded from the Banner of Light.

There are several other proofs, among which are the improbability of an impostor wearing several thousand dollars' worth of diamonds and having several hundred dollars with him, as this man had. You can tell the Banner of Light people that if he was a bogus Slade they should send us the money we are out, as it was their fault, they giving the bogus our letter instead of the genuin. But it was certainly the genuin humbug, and if they still deny it we will send a committee to New York and unmask him as thoroughly as we did here. If there is a genuin medium, they ought to send him to Belleville, but they won't. "Fraud will not stand honest investigation; truth courts it."

The reason Slade was allowed to escape is, he, or it, was a member of the Masonic body, so were some of his captors; also it is likely he or it made a liberal use of his ill-gotten gains to grease their palms. Yours truly, Joseph Templeton.

Elmina Abroad.

Dear Truth Seekers: Once more I greet you from the old Empire state, and among the friends and relativs of my girlhood days.

I hav pleasant memories of the friends I met in Boston, and the sights I there saw hav left bright pictures on memory's walls. The last day of my stay I went through Prang's vast chromo factory. I had always a curiosity to know how it was possible to manufacture such lovely pictures at so cheap a rate. But I had never once dreamed of the work it took. When I went in and saw long rows of desks, and at each one seated an artist bent intently over a picture, faithfully copying line by line, dot by dot, each little stroke or speck, and saw the pictures transferred one by one to lithographic stones, and then printed on paper or cardboard, shade by shade, color by color, a little more red, a little more yellow, a little more brown, till it passed through some twenty or thirty impressions, going from hand-rollers to power-presses, from room to room, I then realized that even the tiniest chromo was a work of far more toil than a grand painting in oil colors. But the rapidity of the reproduction makes them cheap and plentiful, and I saw some as high as twenty-five dollars in price, and others only a cent or two in value. We saw one large room containing two or three hundred girls, all putting fringes on valentines, chromos, and holiday pictures, and counting, folding, and arranging them; and we saw the Christmas cards for the coming season in process of being made. One large room way down in the cellar was called the "stone library." It was filled with shelves of lithographic stones, containing plates from which the pictures had been printed. These stones are all brought from Bavaria, and many of them cost twenty-five and fifty dollars apiece. We went in the engin room and saw the power that moves the great machinery of the factory, and the engineer touched one of the great belts and lighted a gas-jet with his finger, and also transmitted a spark to each of us from it, by touching the tip of his finger to ours. As I looked at all the wonders of the establishment I thought of a remark made by one who once visited our woolen mill in Tennessee. After watching the process of cording, spinning, and weaving the wool into cloth, she exclaimed, "The works of God are great, but the works of man are greater." Prang has a grand house, and the grounds are just lovely, and what is best of all, he is a real German Liberal, and hundreds of dollars are given by him every year to support the cause of freedom of thought and the elevation of humanity. He is a man of whom we may well be proud as a laborer in our ranks. His lovely pictures are gems of beauty in thousands and tens of thousands of homes all over the civilized world, and he himself is a kind, cordial, and pleasant gentleman. He took us all over the building, and then out on the top of his house, where he gave us seats, from which we had a splendid view of Barnum's great traveling circus as it passed along the street. It was one of the most gorgeous processions I ever witnessed. In the afternoon of the same day I went with Mr. Chainey and his pleasant little family to Nantasket Beach to see the old ocean. We had a nice ride on the cars, and a beautiful sail in the steamer, and at last stood on the shore and saw the mighty ocean roll her white foaming billows toward the shore, each following the other in regular succession, and yet no two alike, and all having a wild, weird, fascination that can never be described, but can only be realized by the onlooking of one's self. To see the white specks of sails far off against the distant horizon, and think that beyond them, on, on, on, was only one vast sea of waves, made one think how wonderful it was that so tiny a thing as a ship could ever find itself, or bring its precious freight of living beings back to the solid firm land again.

All this is now only a memory, but how precious is the faculty that has power to call up at any hour the whole panorama back to view and liv it over and over again!

And now I am once again in Rhinebeck Institute, and hav been witnessing the school commencement, a regular feast of reason and flow of soul. The junior class had the first day, and spoke their little pieces better than many a public orator could, and sang and played "divinely," and in the evening had a reception. It was a pretty scene to see little tots of eight, ten, and twelve years dancing, waltzing, and playing plays, just like grown-up people. The seniors had their day yesterday. There were nine graduates, all girls but two, and I think the proficiency of these young ladies in their studies ought to convince any reasonable person of the equality of sex as far as mental acquirements are concerned, and I might say superiority, for they certainly put the young men in the shade this time. To giv any idea of the addresses (valedictory, etc.), is impossible, but professors who were present said they would do credit to almost any college commencement. The paintings done by the pupils of the school are real specimens of art and gems of beauty. The art reception was in the evening and dancing music, etc., made gay the passing hours. As it all glides by, I softly say to myself,

"Oh, the world it is beautiful,
Who can complain
Or wish that the world
Were made over again?"

God Ideas.

It seems to me that we are indebted to our early religiou training for our ideas of God and nature. Nearly every one ofs us is influenced by the ideas derived from the Bible. If a lad never went to church or Sunday-school, still he gets ideas on these subjects from those who hav. Hence the idea that the creator is omnipotent, can perform miracles, etc. Now, when we break from this idea we naturally run into Atheism. One of my friends, in denouncing my remarks in this paper, asks why not suppose nature to be eternal, self-existent, and then no use for a God. I ask, why not suppose God eternal? I cannot suppose nature as eternal except as a principle. We see beginning and ending to all things, earth included. "What," asks the Atheist, "nature and God both?" Why not? What warrant hav you for the idea of an omnipotent God, such as you think he must be, if at all? Why not God and nature both eternal, from everlasting to everlasting? Most Atheists reject the idea of a god because they see no signs of sympathy and interference. But why not a god who cannot interfere as well as a god who can? There are some facts we do know. I mean that some things do exist positivly and truly. They seem hard facts to us, too, yet they are. Our reason teaches us that omnipotence cannot be. God cannot be and not be at once. Yet if omnipotent in this idea of omnipotence, he could be and not be. Omnipotence is utter absurdity. Eternity we know exists, as do space, time, etc. Eternity is infinit time. May there not be a creating spirit eternal, but not omnipotent? In fact, may there not be two or three, half a dozen, or an infinit number of such? When we examin the one-god idea we see no more warrant for it than for some other ideas.

The grand point with me is just this—if this blind, dumb, senseless nature is all, then it has created something greater than itself; that is, intellect. Why, even a dog's sense is superior to dumb nature.

I would say for Mr. James's benefit that I do not feel called on to worship this god except by doing, the best I know how, my duty. Clarke Irvine.

Liberalism Run Mad.

In The Truth Seeker of July 8th is to be found the following sentence from the pen of E. C. Walker: "Prohibition involves a principle which, if carried to its logical conclusion, would stop every Liberal press in the country and close the lips of every Freethinker."

A friend of mine, a lawyer and a Freethinker, and, more than that, one who stopped just on the verge of ruin from the accursed habit of strong drink, brought that copy of The Truth Seeker to me and said: "Here, look at what Mr. Walker says. It is not true; it is wrong, and he ought to know it."

Blood boils in the veins of one who has known and felt the almost resistless power of the drinking habit fastening closer and closer day by day, with friends and acquaintances helping it on, and none save those who are called fanatics by the heartless, thoughtless rabble, putting forth even the slightest efforts to stay the evil. When one has broken the terrible chain, torn its links from out the quivering nerves, then to hav such words from one who ought to be a leader in the van for liberty, sneering at the honest efforts of serious men to break the fetters of a bondage ten thousand times more damnable, resistless, and awful than even the hideous monsters of the Inquisition, self-restraint becomes a double burden.

Liberty itself was born of prohibition in that early day when the idea of law, order, and individual right first entered the savage breast of man. The principle of prohibition involves the restraint by law from the doing of that which is a crime per se as well as that which is a crime because forbidden. From the masters of jurisprudence we learn that a law is a rule of conduct prescribed by the supreme power of a state commanding what shall be done or prohibiting that which shall not be done.

Laws that prohibit that which shall not be done are the sort of laws in which the principle of prohibition is involved. Nothing can be more apparent. By examining the laws which are prohibitory in their nature, it seems to me we can easily determin whether or not they "involve a principle which, if carried to its logical conclusion, would stop every Liberal press in the country and close the lips of every Freethinker."

By looking into our penal code, which is but a codification, somewhat modified, of the revised statutes, which were themselvs built from statutes previously in existence, containing, therefore, little that is new, we find prohibitory provisions against murder, treason, larceny, bigamy, incendiarism, swindling, gambling, etc. It does seem to me that these provisions are really prohibitory; that they involve all the principles involved in prohibition, and that they support liberty, both of the press and speech. To this list of prohibitory enactments in the highest interest of the liberty of man, woman, and child, protecting and guarding the right to be sober, to hav a sober father, husband, and brother, many wise, thoughtful, philanthropic, liberty-loving Liberals wish to add one prohibiting the manufacture, sale, and importation of alcoholic liquors to be used as a beverage. Mr. Walker speaks of this proposed law as of a sumptuary nature. He knows, if he knows anything at all about the matter, that sumptuary laws were distinguished by the object for which they were enacted, being either for economic purposes or to foster some particular trade or industry, but never for the great purposes for which the prohibitory laws are deemed the most practical and effectiv means, viz., to lessen crime, idleness, pauperism, disease, and death. The law prohibiting the sale of intoxicants is, therefore, not a sumptuary law, but a part of the police regulations of the state.

Here I should stop, knowing that the splendid letters from Mr. Bennett are not only more interesting to your readers, but crowd your ample pages, were it not that the importance of this subject and the fact that a few red-hot and unbalanced Liberals are continually representing the Liberal thought of the age to be against everything moral, decent, healthful, or temperate that has ever heretofore been kindly touched by a Christian, makes me feel justified in begging your indulgence for a line or two more.

The use of intoxicating liquors as a beverage causes more than three-fourths of the crimes and accidents, more than seven-eighths of the poverty, disease, vice and wretchedness, cursing and injuring our republic year after year. Shall we lift no hand to stay the dreadful avalanche? And who really do least to stop this slimy old serpent from continuing to trail over all?

Our judgment must be based upon what we witness. Do we not see the preachers of the various Christian churches coddle and coo around our dear Brother Distiller and say only soft and pleasant things about this matter, except occasionally, when far, far from home and hid in a multitude of temperance advocates, of whom half at least are Freethinkers, lest Brother Rumseller be offended. If ever we do attend "divine" worship we will see sitting prime and smiling in their pews the great wholesale dealers and manufacturers and the boss retail dealers, those who keep respectable places, and we will see the pulpit smiling back at these same pews. Why? The answer is evident when the box comes round and these magnates, who make a veritable hell on earth, put up the largest sums for Jesus and trim in elegance the slick-headed calf who bleats from the pulpit.

No, no, Liberal friends, let us not advocate that principle which would, if carried to its logical conclusion, fill the lips of our people with a poison that would bind in chains not only the body but the brain as well. We who believe that mind is but the expression of the body, i. e, of material organism, hav an impregnable position from which to bombard this mind-destroying traffic. Liberta.

Col. Kelso's Book.

Deity Analyzed and the Devil's Defense. By Col. Kelso. See advertisment.

This book has the intensity of an autobiography. It contains the processes of thought by which a bright and earnest mind has worked its way out of superstition into the real truth. On this account it has a value beyond the keenness of its logic. This is unanswerable and is a mental tonic of the first order. There is a breezy freshness in this book which makes its arguments like the mountains on the Pacific coast, not bare forms, but rugged and superb forces, with a suggestion of volcanic fire. We might know that this was written by a frontiersman. It is not the "chop logic of mere culture." Every word has the ring of a genuin truth seeker. This book has not been written out of intellectual vanity merely for the sake of writing a book. It is the expression of the author's intellectual travail. It has the birthmarks of a keen struggle by which he has liberated his own mind from the chains of dogma. It is also an original book. Col. Kelso has dug his own mine and brought forth his own gold. He has not "jumped" anybody else's claim. He has gone directly to nature. He givs us his own contact with it and not another's.

The God of the Bible is indeed pretty thoroughly picked to pieces. The sawdust flies. The poor doll makes a sorry figure in the hands of the dissecter. his dignity vanishes when we see of what it is made up. The fact is, that deity cannot bear analysis. The worshiper must take it whole like a pill and swallow at once. To reduce deity to its elements is to destroy him. We then see that he is of the earth earthy.

Col. Kelso's defense of the devil is, we think, quite just. Many good points are made. What the world has called the devil has certainly done a vast amount of good. He has been the parent of knowledge and the spur to progress. He may hav "slopped over" occasionally and not been quite dignified and respectable. No doubt he has gone to extremes. The trouble of it is that the devil don't always know where to stop. He gets started and away he goes; and he hasn't the slightest notion of letting off steam. Of course he smashes things. But the original intention of the devil is good. He sincerely desires to make things better. He has a "divine discontent." Like the Irish party in Parliament, he is always in the opposition benches because he sees that is the best way to make progress. He is in too much of a hurry oftentimes, I grant. He lacks "culture," of course. He isn't "college-bred." He is a rough, sturdy, upright, and downright reformer, who don't care a blank what people think of him. Such is the devil, and Col. Kelso will tell you more about him if you will read his very lively satire.

So Do We.

From The Index of July 20.

We quite agree with a correspondent who writes, "An editor who, from policy or cowardice, publicly mentions as a friend and praises as a hero a man whom he privately calls an enemy and speaks of as a vile fellow forfeits the respect of all honest men." The above statement is very general in its character, but any one who sees in it a condemnation of his own dishonesty is at liberty to make a personal application of the remark to himself.

We know of no one to whom the above applies so well as to B. F. Underwood, whilom Liberal lecturer, at present fighting editor of the Index, a religious paper published at Boston.

We hav for sale the lithograph likenesses of the three representativ Freethinkers of America—Paine, Bennett, and Ingersoll. With a frame, which can be purchased at slight expense from any picture-frame maker, they form an ornament that would adorn the walls of any home. The three together cost $2; singly, Paine, $1; Bennett and Ingersoll, 50 cents each.

Letters from Friends.

BOLIVAR, N. Y., July 14, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $5 to pay for the three volumes of Round-the-World. C. C. CONROY.

ALDEN, IOWA, July 7, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find fifty cents for your excellent paper for three months, as I see that is your terms to new subscribers. I want to become better acquainted with THE TRUTH SEEKER, for I believe it to be the paper which I hav long wanted in my family. I am wholly, honestly, and thoroughly Infidel or Liberal, and I love truih and liberty, and I love any paper or book that is honest and bold enough to stand up, alone if necessary, and advocate the truth for truth's sake, as THE TRUTH SEEKER seems to do. It is the first paper of the kind it has ever been my privilege to read. I feel as the Methodist enthusiast says in class-meeting—I feel it a grand and glorious privilege to giv my testimony for the truth. I hav been much pleased with what I hav read of "A Truth Seeker Around the World," and we are all eager to hear from Brother Bob, as we familiarly call Col. Ingersoll. My conversion to Liberalism, I think, was due in a great measure to the reading of his lectures, although I had been striving for and gradually nearing the truth for some years. I commenced with Methodism, being brought up in that faith; from thence to Campbelliteism, then on to neutral ground, then by the help of Brother Bob, Thomas Paine, Viscount Amberley, and others, I was enabled to mount upon that sure foundation—the rock of truth—and leave superstition and priestcraft in the mud and mire which they hav made and wallowed in for centuries, and which I trust will ere long swallow them up and leave us free. Pray for us, Mr. Editor; pray for us in the form of giving us free and honest thoughts—thoughts which will enlighten and instruct, and help to make us better men and better women—thoughts which emanate from such minds as Bro. Bennett's, and are given to us through the medium of his excellent paper. Please count me in as one of your many friends. H. M. REYNOLDS.

DUNLAP, IOWA, July 12, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find cash to pay my subscription. Please excuse delay, and allow me to say further a word in regard to the trouble at Liberal, Mo., an account of which I find in your paper of July 8th.

First. That it seems strange "one of the best lawyers in southwestern Missouri," as Bro. Walser is described by the writer, should make the mistake (being original proprietor of the town) to allow himself and "other Liberals" to be drawn into a sort of partnership with "Methodist Christians." By leasing or selling ground on specified conditions, it seems Bro. Walser had it in his power to shut out saloons and "Methodist Christians," etc., from every foot of his two thousand acres if he wished to do so.

Second. With all due regard for the good intentions and good works of our friends at Liberal, Mo., allow me to say, Mr. Editor, that I candidly think the original plan, idea, and intention of building up an exclusivly Liberal town and community was and is wrong in principle. The church is ever and always trying to do just what it seems our friends in Missouri hav been trying to do—to drive out and keep out opposition, and hav it all their own way. I think we can well afford to allow the sectarians a monopoly of this "exclusiv" idea. My idea of Liberalism is for something broader and better than the dividing up of society into ten thousand of little warring factions—a platform and invitation so broad and benificent and noble that all who will may come and enjoy with us the feast and fatness of nature and reason. In short, I would not only let in the avowed enemies of our Liberal cause, but I would invite them to come and hear and see for themselvs what manner of people it is who are constantly receiving the choicest anathemas of their self-assuming, narrow-contracted, divine leaders.

Let us—in fact we must—so conduct ourselvs that instead of following or stopping to contend with any, we may be the leaders of others, even of "Methodist Christians," into the broad fields of reason and beauty, where, instead of debasing strife over small things, shall be found a plane so broad and so liberal and free that all may gain understanding.

Yours truly, D. A. BUTTS.

XENIA, July 15, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I read a sermon in the Fireside Companion, preached by Talmage, of Brooklyn, N. Y., using Samson or a part of the story about Samson as a basis of his remarks. The orthodox accuse the Infidels of distorting the text, but I will bet ten millions, or half I am worth, that there never was an Infidel on earth that ever misrepresented the text to the extent Talmage did in his sermon, using the following as his text: "And called his name Samson, and the child grew and the Lord blessed him." In reading the history of the origin of this Samson (which I believe to be a myth) in Judges xiii, we do not find who his father was. We read that his mother was barren, and as it is not possible for a barren woman to giv birth to a child, should the whole universe take hold and help her? We come to the conclusion that it is mixed who his mother was, and if we cannot find out by the text who his father or mother was, we are left in great doubt whether there ever was such a man. Talmage assumes there was, and twists the account given of him in the book of Judges into all manner of shapes in order to hide the true meaning of the story. The account says that an angel or messenger came to Manoah's wife and told her that she was barren, but she should hav a child, and ordered her a low diet in order to prepare her for the event. The first question is, Who was this angel; was it some man or was it a spirit? We conclude it was a man, as he talked to Manoah, and Talmage does not believe that spirits talk to people on earth. In the eighth verse we hav positiv proof that it was a man. Manoah asked the Lord to let the same man come again and teach them what to do with the expected child. The whole chapter indicates that it was a put-up job on Manoah by this man and his wife, but who the man was we do not learn. Talmage says that when this Samson was eighteen years old he was engaged to be married to a Philistine girl. The Bible does not say any such thing, hence Talmage misrepresents the text and tells a white lie to his hearers. The text says that Samson went down to Timnoth and saw a woman of the daughters of the Philistines. It does not say, as Talmage says, that he was betrothed. Talmage says that on his way to Timnoth he came across a lion, or a lion came out upon him, and he seized the monster by his long mane and shook him as a hungry hound shakes a March hare, and made his bones crack. Now, we pronounce this statement false, and I will prove it by the Bible. The text says that he rent him as he would hav rent a kid. It does not say one word about a hound, a March hare, or his bones cracking. Samson kept this great feat from his parents, and we hav no evidence whether it was true or false. The text does not giv us his age at this time, and how Talmage found out that he was eighteen years old is only known to him. Perhaps the spirit of Samson has been to see him and explained the whole matter.

Talmage says that this boy smote the lion with his fist and stamped on him with his heel. The text warrants no such language. Talmage says that after that when he was passing that way he turned into the thicket to see the remains of the monster. He says that under that hot climate the flesh had rotted off of his bones, and the bones were bleached until they were as pure and white as a vase of porcelain or a tank of gold. Now, the above representations are mere nonsense. The text says he turned aside to see the carcass of the lion, and behold there was a swarm of bees and honey in the carcass of the lion. We claim that Talmage has no right to distort the text and make it lie in almost every verse, He says that Samson got mad because his wife told her friends the answer to the riddle. He says that Samson in his indignation slew thirty men. The text again says Talmage lies. Samson told the people had they not plowed with his heifer they would not hav guessed his riddle. Now comes the knob to Talmage's lie. The nineteenth verse says, "And the spirit of the Lord came upon him, and he went down to Ashkelon and slew thirty men of them, and took their spoils and gave a change of garments unto them that explained the riddle." We see by the text that God helped him kill the thirty men in order to get their clothes to pay his bet. It is not hard to see Talmage's misrepresentation of the text, if not a downright lie. Talmage says, "Further to avenge the wrong done him, he sets on fire three hundred foxes, and these terrified creatures, in their alarm, rush into the corn shocks and the vinyards until the whole land is ablaze with desolation." Now, the text does not warrant any such extravagant talk. Judges xv, 4, says, "And Samson went and caught three hundred foxes, and took firebrands and turned tail to tail, and when he had set the brands on fire he let them go into the standing corn and burned up the shocks and standing corn." We should like Mr. Talmage to tell us what kind of strings Samson used to tie the foxes' tails together with that the fire did not burn off. His great imagination could easily answer the question. Is it not strange that intelligent men and women will sit and listen to a man like this Talmage distort and twist the Bible into all manner of shapes and swallow them as truths, when they are as unreasonable as "Sindbad the Sailor?" The story of Samson as given in the Bible is a big enough lie without Talmage or anyone else striving to make it a greater. There is no class of people on earth that misrepresent the Bible as our modern ministers do.

J. D. SEELY.

SAN ANTONIO, TEXAS, July 10, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: In No. 22 of your valuable paper you mention a letter received from one Fenner, which places Mr. W. H. H. Murray, late of Boston, but now a citizen of Texas, in a rather bad light. The statement that the father of a young woman said to be living with Mr. Murray came here after a long search, found her, and blew his brains out at the very threshold of Murray's door, is a myth. Mr. Murray, ever since his arrival here, has led a very quiet and retired life, living in a small cottage some distance below the city, very few of our citizens knowing anything of him until last autumn, when he was requested to deliver an address at the opening of the Agricultural Fair at San Pedro Springs, when his fine address and eloquence gained for him the esteem of the people.

Last week, at the earnest solicitations of the citizens of Boerne (a small village thirty miles northwest from San Antonio) he delivered the Fourth of July oration, and on his return here some of our most prominent citizens requested him to deliver a lecture to the public at Turner Opera Hall, which he accepted. At an early hour of Sunday evening the elite of San Antonio came pouring into the spacious hall, and it was soon filled to overflowing. A few minutes after the appointed time, Mr. C. K. Breneman, a leading lawyer of San Antonio, appeared on the stage, and in a few appropriate remarks introduced to the audience the renowned Adirondack Murray. A hearty applause greeted the noted pulpit orator of Massachusetts, now not clothed in the priestly robes of a deceiving saint, but in plain, homespun gray, his left hand bandaged and in a sling. He announced that his lecture would be the same one delivered to a certain society in Boston shortly after his return from abroad—"My Thoughts and Conclusions on the Hereafter." The subject was a deep one, and he held his vast audience spell-bound from the beginning to the end. Such theories, although in the minds of many but never before expressed by any lecturer or orator in this city, seemed to entrance his hearers. No devil, no hell, no soul, spirit, or body to suffer the torments and agonies of hell, or the pleasant meetings and reunions of friends and lovers in the paradise above, both delighted and distressed, and for fully one and a half hours the speaker was listened to with breathless silence, and on conclusion was greeted with tremendous applause. During his lecture he severely censured the orthodox ministers for ever alluding to that eternal hell as the place for the unbeliever, and he well knew that it was only the easy situations, the maintenance of their families and dependents, the credulity of the uninformed, ignorant, and superstitious, that kept the enlightened ministers in their pulpits to-day. The day of judgment or resurrection was something beyond his comprehension; where is that grand review of bodies of generation upon generation at the rate of one thousand millions for every thirty years of this earth's existence to take place? Flatten out this globe of ours, and there will not be standing-room for even the smallest fraction of that vast army to stand as on dress parade for review. The very thought or idea of a future resurrection seemed ridiculous. His views on the deity and Christ seemed to lack comprehension. At any rate he passed this point in such a manner as to leave the audience in doubt as to his true belief, and this is the only instance that I could perceive where he differed with our champions of Freethought and truth, R. G. Ingersoll, D. M. Bennett, and others; but it seems to me that the time is not far distant when he will also cast away this last illusion and pronounce to the world that he is an Infidel, and others will soon follow, and in a short space of time one law and one thought will bind all nations and kindred of the earth, and that law shall be the law of universal freedom and brotherhood.

Yours for Freethought, CHAS. L. SAUER.

WHITE CLOUD, MICH., July 15, 1882.

MR. EDITOR (not dead but absent): Through an overpress of duties we find, upon a moment's reflection, that we hav neglected THE TRUTH SEEKER. Please pardon. Hav not been at Ashland Center since early spring. It is now pleasing to send you $3, a part of which it is quite possible is your due. Please change my address to this place. Again THE TRUTH SEEKER takes a strange location, and that, too, among its enemies. But may we not trust that it is able for the shock? We should perhaps say enemies by second nature, as, strange as it may appear, we think there is not an orthodox expounder within twenty miles of us, and within this area at least twenty thousand soul habitually reside. It would seem that your paper might flourish here. I guess I will plant a few copies anyway. I don't intend it shall be long until at least some of this God-forsaken people shall know that it is affirmed upon good evidence that Jesus Christ is not the only one that died to save sinners, as the tale runs, and that Thomas Paine wrote our great Declaration, however much it may surprise them. We still admire THE TRUTH SEEKER and its cause. It presents to the world learning much needed, and which practically cannot be reached elsewhere. What is more reasonable than that the science of matter is the grand solution of the great problem? Creativ power created all for the same end. A blade of grass is just as consequential as is what we term a noble man, from a creativ standpoint or purpose. Ever since I was old enough to reason much I hav had a glimpse of this fact, and since the fortunate meeting of some learning as portrayed in THE TRUTH SEEKER am at rest upon the subject. Unbounded thanks are due the venerable author of our paper for pains taken long since, and now that he has endured said arduous journey, all from a philanthropic standpoint, we should feel that he could truly be said to hav well nigh donned Paine's life-long persistency and world-wide philanthropy. We are glad to see that those who can are trying to mete out to him some of his dues in the way of a reception upon his return to his nativ shores, and they hav my hearty cheer. We wish you and also every bona fide Liberal well. And just here we wish we could know that each and everyone of them felt as

I do—that it is wrong to giv support in any way to these clerical gentlemen, commonly styled preachers, and refrain from doing so, and thereby cease, so far as we are concerned, in responsibility, their damages to the world, and compel them to become useful members of society. Don't donate them and you effect the change immediately, and flaunt THE TRUTH SEEKER and you do the same, if but mediately. And here another idea strikes me, and it hurts a little, too. Not long since I saw a preacher of Christ and him crucified driving on his way to his pulpit. Upon his nearing the residence of a gentleman whom he knew did not believe in his dogmas he espied the twelve-year-old daughter of said gentleman emerge from the house and proceed upon the way in advance of him. Just there said preacher was taken with a serious fit of jerking the reins and applying the lash until he found himself at the side of the girl, when his solicitations that she should ride with him became too vehement to be shunned, and she rode with him. A few days after I asked what the preacher said to her. She replied: "Oh, he told me all how Christ was killed by being nailed to a tree—right through the live flesh—because I and other little girls and boys were bad and sinned against God every day, and by the death of his son we could be made good, and go to heaven where my little brother was that died, and where all good little girls and boys were, if I only prayed to God and would come to his meeting; and that I should come every Sunday and he would tell me all how it was; and if my pa would not let me come to run away and come." Now, it is a poor rule that will work only one way. If the so-called clergy can use such means to catch up and to fill the ears and minds of antichristian youth with what they know the parent would basely ignore, why should not Liberals turn an eye to youthful orthodox society, and occasionally, as the opportunity presented itself, implant a seed that might spring up and choke a whole vinyard of Christian nonsense, no matter how much it may hav been fostered. By reciprocal law we may use means against means. Yours truly, D. C. PENDLETON.

THE WORLD'S GREATEST CURSE.

CINCINNATI, OHIO, June 26, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: When the man of deep thought takes a broad survey over this small planet and beholds the hundreds of miserable superstitions which hav grown out of supernaturalism he is lost in amazement how such useless, unmeaning, and ridiculous absurdities could hav fastened their preposterous fangs on the minds of the masses. Looking out from the sublime pedestal of truth, with strong mental discernment, perfectly free from the least taint of bigotry or prejudice, what do we behold? Why, the wildest exhibitions of a demented multitude, the numerous phases displayed by the false forces brought to bear on the infantil mind by designing priests of every sect and creed throughout the world, and riveted on their lives to bend and crush them beneath the iron sway of intolerant superstition. The despotic and flagrant laws of priestridden governments swing a chain of clerical slavery around the unthinking and helpless multitudes, holding them in the vise-like grip of church domination and assumed authority. This black pall of deceit, falsehood, and delusion is the crushing principle of true progress—it is the mountain of ignorance, which must be leveled by the mighty strokes of gigantic sense. This mountain is the hive of priestly drones which skulk around in every land, imposing their driveling cant on the illiterate multitudes, unfitting them for the duties necessary to their daily wants and rendering hundreds of them fit candidates for a madhouse. Also take into account the howlings, ravings, screamings, etc.; does it not look like a vast circus with multitudes of the Grimaldi clowns on a rampage? Will common sense, reason, and scientific power be able to cope with this hydra of superstition? Its batteries must blaze away and rest not until the widespread curse topples over and becomes the laughing-stock of all sensible people. Although this curse is old, it is not unconquerable; it hath no foundation to rest its claims. There is not an ancient or modern religion in existence today but what can be traced back to some mean, unblushing fraud, and whose birth was the outcome of the wildest fanaticism, palmed off on a people perfectly helpless to understand right from wrong. The inventors of religions hav ever been one of these two things—knaves or cranks, and these are the principal ingredients involved in working its different phases to the present day. Gods and devils, heavens and hells, are the factors used by the consolidated clerical rings to cajole or terrorize and drive into the priestly net, there to be the property of the church, bound to the altar of superstition, a willing devotee to a mythical idol, made and provided by a pagan priesthood. But shall it so remain? Shall the despot and the cheat ever rule, and peddle its pious frauds and cunning tricks before an outraged people? Surely the time must come when the bandage of mental blindness will be torn to shreds and cast to the winds, never more to block out the solid and sublime truths of the Materialistic philosophy, which firmly believes in one world, one life, and one death, which is the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth.

T. WINTER.

SILOAM SPRINGS, ARK., July 10, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Grinnell, Iowa, as you know, has lately been visited by a terrible cyclone, killing scores, rendering hundreds houseless and homeless, leaving desolation, suffering, and mourning through the country. Happening to see a Grinnell paper, I was struck with the big-hearted generosity of the Chicago ministers who, after holding conference over the sufferers, sent them this very substantial aid: "The blessed Lord, who rides in the storm, will overrule your disaster to his own glory and your profit." Their great souls, as seen in this, hav called out the following, which you are at liberty to use as you see fit. The lines were furnished me by Mrs. M. Snodgrass, of this place.

THE RAT WHO TURNED HERMIT.

It is told, in a story old,
How a certain rat, grown tired of strife,
And the cares which beset his ratship's life;
And wishing to meditate at his ease,
Took up his abode in a great Holland cheese.

This rat soon grew fat,
And he said to himself, God blesses his own,
My body would hav been only skin and bone.
If I hadn't turned hermit, I really must say
Renouncing the world is the better way.

To his cheese, on their knees,
Came some representativs of the rats,
Saying Ratopolis is besieged by the cats.
We are going for aid to a foreign land,
Old neighbor, do lend us a helping hand

We set out without
A dollar to pay the needful expense.
Do lend us some shillings, or at least a few cents;
We will be very grateful, and will surely repay,
If we liv to return next New-Year's day.

The rat said that
He no longer had interest in worldly affairs,
But for the sake of friendship his two longest prayers
Were at their disposal; what could hermit do more?
He gave them his blessing, and then closed the door.

O the rarity of charity,
Amongithe rat family. If men liv at ease,
And the world is to them a great Holland cheese;
When their friends are distressed and in sorry plight,
They will giv only blessings, then close the door tight.

Ever for truth and right, J. PARKER BALL, M.D.

LIBERAL, MO., June 28, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: No doubt your many readers feel an interest in our little Infidel town, and would like to know how it is prospering. It is making a very healthy growth. A brickyard is in operation, and the foundation of a flouring mill is being laid; expect to hav it running in September. The wheat crops here are splendid, and nearly all harvested.

The National Liberal Orphan Home is a fixed fact. Between two and three thousand dollars are in the hands of the treasurer. It will be commenced in September, and we expect to hav an institution that not only Liberal will be proud of, but every Liberal in the world. Although everything is prospering, and a good deal of breaking and fencing, etc., is being done preparatory to making new houses this fall, when we expect a large addition to our numbers, I am sorry to say that we hav the enemy in our midst to contend with; ever alert, it has gained a foothold through misrepresentation and false pretense, the parties claiming to be Liberals when they were our bitterest enemies. They hav succeeded in getting seventeen-twentieths of a lot, and hav built a church upon it, and hold services every Sunday there. Liberals own the other three-twentieths, and of course hav a right in it too. Mr. Walser owns a share, and at the dedication of the church made a few remarks, stating that it must be free for all denominations; that the Liberals could hold lectures there as well as the Christians. This of course excited the anger of the followers of the meek and lowly Jesus, and something must be done. It would never do to hav God's holy temple desecrated by those wicked Infidels, so they secretly organized a mob. The next meeting Mr. Walser and quite a number of the Liberals attended to listen to the discourse. After singing and prayer Mr. Walser arose, as is customary, to announce that he would deliver an address after services closed, and those who desired to hear it would please remain. He had not said three words before he was ordered to stop, which he refused to do, as he felt he had a right to make his announcement. Then the cry of "Arrest him!" was heard, when two burly Christians pounced upon him, followed by three more, who tried to forcibly put him out of doors. Mr. Walser maintained his ground and did not go until he got ready, although he got considerably bruised by his assaulters, who knocked his front teeth loose and twisted his arms nearly out or their sockets, and bruised his side. And what was it all for—what was his great offense? Simply because he arose to make an announcement. Then they arrested him for disturbing and breaking up public worship, and so anxious were they to put him in jail that they at first refused to accept his bond for his appearance at court the next day. They had their team all ready to trot him off to jail. Their excuse was that it was not lawful to giv a bond on the Sabbath day, but of course it was perfectly lawful to arrest him. The trial was set for June 21st, and lasted four days. The jury hung. Four were for acquittal, two (orthodox church-members) for conviction. Here the case rests for the present. You see, these few Christians are backed up by the orthodox from the surrounding country. They are raising lots of money for them to fight the Liberals. They are determined there shall be no place on this green earth free from their filthy, soul-poisoning, hell-degrading influence. The Liberals hav treated them well, let them use our hall free of charge, given them audience, and in no way molested them. Our only offense is that we criticise their system of religion; that is the head and front of our offending.

Now it behooves us to redouble our efforts in the cause of Liberalism, for the enemy is at work, and nothing they can do will be left undone to defeat us. It is war; it is a mighty battle between error, bigotry, superstition, and the whole host of darkness against mental freedom, liberty of conscience, right, truth, and justice. Church and state must be divorced, and such instances of religious intolerance as that which has recently been enacted in our midst should serve to arouse the people to the true state of things. 'Tis the same spirit that imprisoned Galileo, burned Servetus at the stake, dragged Garrison through the streets of Boston, and those who think its fires are dead will find themselvs mistaken. The upas-tree is not uprooted, though some of its branches are lopped off, others twisted and gnarled, so that its appearance is unsightly, still it is far from dead, and possesses life and vigor, and many strokes of the iconoclasts must be wielded before it is felled.

All eyes in the Liberal ranks are upon our little town, and will watch our struggle with the monster whose insatiate maw is greedy to devour us. The orthodox world are also watching us and uniting in prayer for our destruction. One preacher predicts that Walser will not liv two years and that Liberal will be swept from off the face of the earth, for God will not permit such an Infidel town to liv. If they would only be content to leave everything to God we would hav nothing to fear; it is with his self-constituted agents that we hav to contend and war with unrelenting zeal. Liberal will liv and prosper in spite of all Christendom until it wields a world-wide influence.

We hope D. M. Bennett will visit us when he passes through our state. We would all gladly shake him by the hand and giv him a hearty welcome—would be glad to listen to the voice of one whose pen we are so familiar with.

In conclusion, I would say the Christians are flooding the papers with their version of this affair, which is very prejudiced, and are trying to place Liberals in a false light for the express purpose of injuring our town. So please publish this, that the other side may be heard. At the trial they could not bring up one mean, contemptible, or dishonest act against a Liberal, although they tried their best to do so, and we mean to keep ourselvs above reproach as peaceful, law-abiding citizens, demanding our lawful rights, and maintaining them at all hazards. Yours for truth, A. L. ANDREWS.

Michigan State Association.—Annual Camp-Meeting.

The Fourth Annual Camp-Meeting of the Michigan State Association of Spiritualists will be held on the fair ground at Lansing, commencing on Friday, August 25th, and closing on Monday, September 4th

Owing to other engagements the secretary will be unable to giv his personal attention to the meeting, and Miss J. R. Lane, 312 Woodward avenue, Detroit, has been appointed corresponding secretary for the occasion.

In view of this meeting, the appointment for a camp-meeting at Ionia in August has been canceled.

S. B. MCCRACKEN, Sec.

Detroit, July 23, 1882.

Iowa Convention and Camp-Meeting.

Let all who can bring tents and other camping accouterments. For those who hav not these necessary adjuncts of camp life accommodations will be found among the friends and at the hotels of Tama and Toledo. Col. D. M. Fox and Nettie Pease Fox, of Ottumwa, and Col. D. M. Billings, of Waverly, hav been added to our list of speakers. We are expecting a very large attendance. Let us make this the grandest convention of liberty's disciples ever known in Iowa.

We shall be prepared to supply campers with the necessaries of life, as well as the usual picnic delicacies. For particulars, address either the undersigned at Norway, Benton Co., or E. S. Beckley, Tama, Tama Co., Iowa. Come one, come all, and light anew the watch-fires of freedom.

Yours for action, E. C. WALKER, Sec.

MRS. LAKE desires to thank Mr. John H. Haslam of Calhoun Co., Ark., for his donation to the League treasury. She wishes to make this public acknowledgment because he neglected to send his address.

WE are glad to know that Dr. Foote's paper has been placed on an equality in the mail with other publications. It shows a return of good sense and exercise of fairness on the part of our post-office authorities.

Aunt Jinny.

BY "OLD VIRGINIA."

Far back in the earlier days of steam,
Ere invention had taught it the art to scream,
In the city of Parkersburg, then a town
Of small dimensions and slight renown,
Of the steamboat near the folks to warn
Aunt Jinny would blow her long bright horn.

Blow it long, and loud and shrill,
Blow it with vengeance, vim, and will,
And none begrudged the pittance small
For service rendered one and all.

An extra penny kind hearts bestowed,
Which, if they did not, their conscience owed.
With what she earned her wants supplied,
The perquisits buried her when she died.

Though the chains of the slave were heard clanking afar,
And faint in the distance the tocsin of war,
By some good fortune or kind decree
She and "her man" had been "sot free."

By that stream where the children used to play, (Commercially known as King Coal's Highway,
Not the King Cole of which ballads sing,
Though he perchance was a sable king,
But king of diamonds and smoky crown,
And greater than all from the Cæsars down).

Remembered the cabin the "old man' built,
The little low bed and its nine-patch quilt,
The flowered plates in the dresser tall
That stood against the clay-washed wall.

The bunches of hoarhound, mint, and rue,
Elecampane, and catnip, too,
Her answer to questions of childish glee,
"Honey, dem arbs is good for te."

But this relic of Time Death did not spare,
May "dat golden crown" her grey head wear;
'Tis of years a score ago, and more,
Since the dead vines fell from the cabin door,
And the cabin went with the things of yore,
But many yet think of her, aged and worn,
Aunt Jinny that blew the steamboat horn.

Startling Religious Statistics.

From the New York Sun.

The Times has gathered some remarkable, nay, astonishing, statistics of the church membership of New York. If they are accurate, they indicate an even greater decline of religious faith among Protestants than has hitherto appeared, though for ten years it has been manifest to careful observers that religious skepticism and a lack of veneration for the religious ideas of the past were rapidly increasing in New York and all our large cities, especially among the younger members of Protestant families.

The statistics of the Times show a total of Protestant church membership so small that it must startle the denominations to which we hav so often uttered the word of warning. In comparison with the whole population it is so insignificant a fraction that even Infidels must be surprised at it.

Out of 1,300,000 people, our present population as estimated by the Times, it finds that less than 100,000 are members of Protestant churches, and considerably more than a quarter of those are in one communion, the Episcopal, which a generation ago had not a sixth part of the whole. Only 90,579 persons in New York belong to Protestant churches, or about one-fifteenth of our population.

In 1845, when the population was 400,000, the Protestant church membership aggregated 51,459. In 1882, when the population is 1,300,000, it amounts to 90,579. That is, the population has increased in that time 225 per cent, while the Protestant communions hav only gained seventy-six per cent; and the average percentage of growth would be very much less were it not for the great increase of the Episcopalians. Of all the chief communions the Episcopalian is the only one which shows a proportionate increase anywhere near that of the population of the city. The Congregationalists hav more than doubled, it is true, but then they had only a little over a thousand members in 1845. The Lutherans are four times as numerous, owing to German and Scandinavian immigration, but even now they number merely 7,500 communicants. So it is with other denominations still smaller. Their handful in 1845 has doubled in 1882, but even now they muster only a very feeble force. The number of Unitarians, Universalists, Quakers, and Swedenborgians, all told, is given at 2,700.

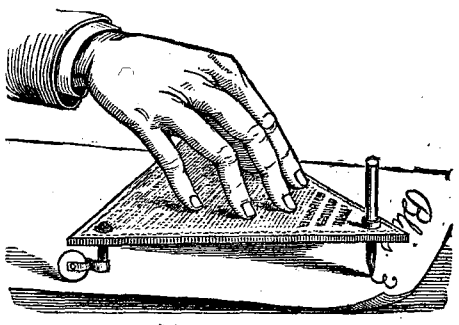
Let us compare the membership of the principal denominations in 1845 and 1882, selecting for the purpose figures published in the tables of the Times:

	1845.	1882.	Per cent Gain.
Baptists	8,874.	12,686.	43.
Congregationalists	1,087.	2,466.	126
Dutch Reformed	4,773.	4,984.	4.
Episcopalians	8,000.	25,275.	215.
Methodists	9,695.	12,814.	32
Presbyterians	13,460.	18 155.	34.

The Episcopalians gained nearly four thousand more members than all the rest put together, 17,275 against 13,346. That church has been making significant progress both in New York and elsewhere in the country.

It also appears from the statistics of the Times that all except a very small part of our Jewish population are careless about their ancestral faith. They are Materialists of the most pronounced type, with little or no interest in the supernatural. According to the figures of the synagogs the total number of their members is only 2,937, and that out of a Jewish population which our contemporary estimates at 60,000.

The Times puts the Roman Catholic population at 500,000; but that is only a loose estimate obtained from the secretary of Cardinal McCloskey, and which are based on a computation of their parishioners made in a very general way, apparently, by the priests of the city. The Staats Zeitung, commenting on these statistics, thinks the Roman Catholic strength is very much exaggerated, since the state census of 1875 gave the total number of Catholics in New York as only 162,808.



But there is no doubt that there are far more Catholics here than Protestants, if we include among the latter only those who are actually members of churches. There may not be five times as many, perhaps, but it would be safe to estimate them as being three or four times as numerous. They had only 50,000 in their communion in 1845, according to the estimate furnished to the Times; but since then has occurred the great Irish immigration, almost entirely Catholic, while Germany has sent over vast additions to their army, though the Staats-Zeitung is of the opinion that sixty per cent of our German population are altogether outside of the churches, both Catholic and Protestants.

The Roman Catholics, therefore, greatly predominate among those who profess any religion at all in New York, but more than half of the population are left when Catholics and Protestants are added together, even if we accept the estimate of the secretary of the cardinal. Against six hundred thousand of the two faiths there are seven hundred thousand people who are claimed by neither Catholics nor Protestants. Among these nonbelievers are included a large share of the most intelligent and the most reputable people in the city.

If any clergyman seeks a missionary field, if any society has money to lay out in the propagation of Christianity, where could the effort and the money be better expended than in New York?

B. FOOTE, of 120 Lexington ave., New York, to whom all letters from the sick should be addressed. In its issue for Jan. 19, 1878, Mr. Bennett's TRUTH SEEKER thus speaks of Dr. FOOTE and his medical publications: "We know him (Dr. Foote) personally and intimately, and we say with all the assurance that knowledge imparts that he is a man of the highest incentives and motivs, whose life has been spent in instructing and improving his fellow-beings by giving such information as is well calculated to enable them to be more healthy, more happy, and to be better and more useful men and women. His medical works possess the highest value, and hav been introduced and thoroughly read in hundreds of thousands of families, who to-day stand ready to bear willing testimony to the great benefit they hav derived from the hygiological, hygienic, and moral lessons which he has so abl mparted."

A TRUTH SEEKER

Around the World.

Illustrated with forty cuts, and with a steel plate engraving of the author

BY D. M. BENNETT,

Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, author of "A Truth Seeker in Europe," "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," "Champions of the Church," etc., etc.

THREE VOLUMES FOR $5.00.

The Most Instruction for the Least Money of any Book of Travels yet Written.

In 1880 the Freethinkers of the world held an International Congress at Brussels, to which Mr. Bennett was sent as a delegate. He took the occasion to make the tour of Europe, and his observations were embodied in "A Truth Seeker in Europe" (price, $1.50). The letters were also published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and the readers were so well pleased with them that the proposition was made that he make the journey around the world, and giv the world the benefit of a Freethinker's observations. The proposition was accepted if the ones desiring such a work would advance five dollars each, the volumes to be dedicated to them. On July 30, 1881, Mr. Bennett began the journey, sending letters back to be published. The work will make

THREE VOLUMES OF NEARLY 900 PAGES EACH.

Those sending in five dollars before the completion of he work will hav their NAMES INSCRIBED IN THE DEDICATION OF THE VOLUMES.

The first volume describes Scotland, Ireland, England, including also an account of the Freethinkers' International Congress at London, in 1881, Holland, the Netherlands, Germany, Austria, Greece, Turkey. Smyrna, Ephesus, Rhodes, Cyprus, Beyrout, Baalbec to Damascus.

There hav been mahy books of travel printed but none like this. IT IS THE ONLY ONE OF ITS KIND.

Mr. Bennett has a shrewd habit of seeing everything going on, and in his book he has faithfully chronicled the habits and customs of the different people of many places he visited. The every-day life of laid before the reader by one who has them and beheld them with his own eyes. We feel sure this work is greatly superior to any account of a journey around the world we now hav.

ALL THE VOLUMES WILL BE ILLUSTRATED

Which adds greatly to the interest of the work, and with the close description will present Old-World places in a very familiar light.

The volumes separately will be $2. Those sending $5 now will get the first volume by return mail and the other two as soon as issued, which will be in a few months, or just as soon as they can be got ready. Those sending the $5 will hav their names in the dedication of the second volume.

Vol. I. mailed on receipt of $2.

A Short History of the Bible,

Being an Account of the Formation and Development of the Canon.

By BRONSON C. KEELER.

Price, cloth, 75 cents. Paper, 50 cents.

This book should be read by every clergyman, layman, scholar, and Liberal.

I hav read Mr. Keeler's book with great pleasure and profit. He gives, in my opinion, a clear and intelligent account of the growth of the Bible. He shows why books were received as inspired, and why they were rejected. He does not deal in opinions, but in facts; and for the correctness of his facts he refers to the highest authorities. He has shown exactly who the Christian fathers were, and the weight that their evidence is entitled to. The first centuries of Christianity are filled with shadow; most histories of that period simply tell us what did not happen, and even the statements of what did not happen are contradictory The falsehoods do not agree. Mr. Keeler must hav spent a great deal of time in the examination of a vast number of volumes, and the amount of information contained in his book could not be collected in years. Every minister, every college professor, and every man who really wishes to know something about the origin and growth of the Bible should read this book.—R. G. Ingersoll.

as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excesses in maturer years, or other causes, and producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams). Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, &c., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case of some of them were in a terribly shattered condition—had been in the Insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness, Fits; others upon the verge of Consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

SYPHILIS positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system; GONORRHŒA, GLEET, Stricture, Orchitis, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

Middle-Aged and Old Men.

There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuation of the bladder, often accompanied by a slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen, will appear, or the color will be of a thin or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and torpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the organs.

☞Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable and correspondence strictly confidential.

Gems of Thought.

THERE lives more faith in honest doubt,
Believe me, than in half the creeds.
—Tennyson.

PUTTING aside the outrage offered to God, by supposing him to make the innocent suffer for the guilty, and also the loose morality and low contrivance of supposing him to change himself into the shape of a man, in order to make an excuse to himself for not executing his supposed sentence upon Adam; putting, I say, these things aside, it is certain that what is called the Christian system of faith, including in it the whimsical account of the creation, the strange story of Eve, the snake, and the apple, the ambiguous idea of a man-God, the corporeal idea of the death of a God, the mythological idea of a family of gods, and the Christian system of arithmetic, that three are one and one is three, are all irreconcilable, not only with the divine gift of reason that God hath given to man, but to the knowledge that man gains of the power and wisdom of God, by the aid of the sciences and by studying the structure of the universe that God has made.—Paine's Age of Reason.

IF men were no better than their religions, the world would be a hell indeed.—Prof. Clifford.

WHO shall number the patient and earnest seekers after truth, from the days of Galileo until now, whose lives hav been embittered and their good name blasted by the mistaken zeal of bibliolaters? Who shall count the hosts of weaker men whose sense of truth has been destroyed in the effort to harmonize impossibilities—whose life has been wasted in the attempt to force the generous new wine of in science into the old bottles of Judaism, compelled by the outcry of the same strong party.—Huxley.

WHAT didst thou, O Church, for Galileo, who saw
Through Nature's veils the great organic force—
Who sought and found the all-pervading law
That holds the rolling planets in their course?
When didst thou fail to check the flowing source
Of truth, whose waters needs must inundate
The theologic dikes that guard thy estate?"
—The Church, by C. P. Cranch.

CHRISTIANITY teaches that men are "saved" through Christ. Moral goodness will not do. The thief, the robber, and the murderer may go straight to heaven by repentance at the last moment. The noblest minds must suffer eternally if they believe not in Jesus. This doctrin certainly givs a license to crime. It makes Jesus a scapegoat for rascality and wickedness. It depreciates the value and the importance of moral goodness. Indeed, "the plan of salvation" has all the worst features of a bankrupt law. In the past especially, Christendom has been filled with men who hav not tried to liv pure and good lives because they believed that moral goodness would not save them. There are still those who intend to get all the advantages of a sinful life, and, at last, to "cheat the devil out of his dues" by availing themselvs of the bankrupt scheme of redemption.—B. F. Underwood.

AND now, auld clouts, I ken ye're thenkin',
A certain Bardie's rantin', drinkin',
Some luckless hour will send him linkin' [tripping]
To your black pit;
But, faith, he'll turn a corner jenkin' [dodging],
An' cheat you yet. —Burns.

So great is always the mental distress consequent upon the loss of intense and positiv beliefs, however narrow they may be, that the minds, thus bereft of them, is at first much more keenly alive to its loss than to its gain. To the believer in the highly poetical polytheism of the Greeks, the rude dispelling of his illusions must hav been attended with great mental pain. So also to one who held the crude conceptions of the Universe which prevailed before Copernicus, the great change effected by telescopic discovery must hav brought with it a kind of terror. The sudden expansion of his notions of the distance and nature of the celestial bodies, and the consequent insignificance of this earth, thus shown to be one of, the smallest objects in the stellar universe, must at first hav produced despondency and sorrow.—Stoddard's New Faith.

I HAV no opinions that I would not most willingly exchange for truth; I may be sometimes wrong, I may be sometimes right; at all events discussion may be provoked, and as this cannot be done without thought, even that is good.—Colten's Lacon.

To allow a crime to be committed when you can prevent it, is next to committing the crime yourself.—Ingersoll.

IT has been well said, that "we must follow Truth though she lead us to Hades or even to Gehenna." The noble quest in which Science engages is the quest not of faith or of consolation, but of truth; and with the scientific philosopher, loyalty to Truth is the first principle of religion. The disagreeableness of a well-supported conclusion furnishes no sort of justification for not accepting it, save to those minds which are irreligious as well as unscientific. He who is loyal to Truth will never harbor the misgiving that her paths may lead to Hades; he will fearlessly follow the guidance of Science, never doubting that consolation must come of knowing the truth.—John Fisher.

ETERNAL Truth shines on o'er Error's cloud,
Which, for a little, veils the living light.
Therefore, though the true bard may sing aloud
His soul-song in the unreceptiv night.
His words—swift, arrowy fires—must fly and light,
Sooner or later, kindling south and north
Till skulking Falsehood from her den be hunted forth. —The Church, by C. P. Cranch.

WE, having caught a glimpse of the beauty of Truth, deem the possession of her worth more than all the world beside, and we hav made up our minds to work ungrudgingly, asking for no reward beyond the results which spring up from our labor—we will spread the gospel of Freethought among men, until the sad minor melodies of Christianity hav sobbed out their last mournful notes on the dying evening breeze, and on the fresh morning winds shall ring out the chorus of hope and joyfulness, from the glad lips of men whom the Truth has at last set free.—Annie Besant's Christianity and Freethought.

Odds and Ends.

THE Washington Critic publishes pictures of all implicated in the assassination of President Garfield. The six doctors are very properly given a more prominent position than the other assassin, Guiteau.—Texas Siftings.

A GENTLEMAN from Navada stepped into a Philadelphia tonsorial saloon to hav his hair cut. The officiating artist, having enveloped his victim's neck in towels and compressed him securely in the chair, opened the conversation by saying:

"Your a little nervous, sir, I perceive. Allow me to say that our 'Capillary Elixir' not only covers bald heads with a luxurious growth of hair, but calms the mind and restores the whole nervous system to a healthy equilibrium. What do you do for nervousness in Nevada?"

The representativ of the Comstock looked up scerenely and answered:

"We usually go out and kill a barber."

"And Moses knew that the land which had been promised to Abraham's children was a goodly land, and if the thing came off he could place a million talents of Egyptian money at seventy-five per cent."—Exodus.

"And when Jonah had satisfied himself that the whale contained many vessels of oil, he tarried till he was opposit to Jaffa, and crawled straightway into the throat of the leviathan and choked him. Then he lifted up his voice and cried aloud 'Enough—let thy servant get out, and take advantage of the market.' And it was so."—Jonah.

"And she clutched his garment, but Joseph said, 'Let go, I pray thee.' And he cried mightily to to heaven with one eye, and watched old Potiphar out of sight with the other. And he sat him down, still winking, and did write the account himself lest the ungodly who come after should mock."—Exodus.

HOW SILLY 'TWOULD BE.

"You hav heard," said a youth to his sweetheart, who stood
While he sat on a corn-sheaf, at daylight's decline—
"You hav heard of the Danish boy's whistle of wood;
I wish that Danish boy's whistle were mine."

"And what would you do with it? Tell me," she said,
While an arch smile played over her beautiful face.
"I would blow it," he answered, "and then my fair maid
Would fly to my side and would there take her place."

"Is that all you wish for? Why, that may be yours Without any magic!" the fair maiden cried;
"A favor so slight one's good nature secures,"
And she playfully seated herself by his side.

"I would blow it again," said the youth, "and the charm
Would work so that not even modesty's check
Would be able to keep from my neck your white arm."
She smiled and she laid her white arm round his neck.

"Yet once more I would blow, and the music divine
Would bring me a third time an exquisit bliss—
And would lay your fair cheek to this brown one of mine:
And your lips stealing past it would giv me a kiss."

The maiden laughed out in her innocent glee—
"What a fool of yourself with the whistle you'd make!
For only consider how silly 'twould be
To sit there and whistle for what you might take."

A YOUNG man with a nose like a razor and an eye which would hav raised a blister on sheet iron on a hot day, halted a pedestrian on Gratiot avenue, and stated that he was trying to raise money to reach the bedside of his dying sister in Chicago. He was too proud to beg, but if the citizen would giv him a quarter he would show him a trick worth five dollars.

"Vash ish dot drick?" queried the citizen.

"It is to make ten cents go further than a dollar. You can play it on the boys, and make ten dollars a day."

"My frendt, I never blays mit der poys."

"Yes, but you can hav lots of fun, you know."

"I vhas no handt for fun. If I ever git off some shokes I never laff."

"Yes, but this is something new. When you come down to the grocery of an evening you——"

"I doan' come down. I vash home on der shteps all der eafnings."

"But you could hav a little fun with your neighbors."

"I told you I vash not a funny man. I likes to schmoke und read der morning papers."

"Vell, I don't want to beg, and I am offering you the trick very low in order to get home and see my sister die. Hav you a dying sister?"

"I doan' expect I hav. Vash is dot dricks?"

"To make 10 cents go further than $1."

"Und vhill she do it?"

"She will."

"Und five cents goes petter ash a dime?"

"That's the ratio."

"Und notings at all goes petter ash 5 cents?"

"I—I—I think it does."

"Vhell, you shust consider you haf all der notings efer was und you vhill be in Chicago to-morrow! Git my love to dot dying sister, und tell her dot you saw me well. PRICE, $3.00 per annum; single copies, seven cents. Specimen copies sent on receipt of a two-cent stamp to pay postage.

The Investigator is devoted to the Liberal cause in religion; or in other words, to universal mental liberty. Independent in all its discussions, discarding superstitious theories of what never can be known, it devotes its columns to things of this world alone, and leaves the next, if there be one, to those who hav entered its unknown shores. Believing that it is the duty of mortals to work for the interests of this world, it confines itself to the things of this life entirely. It has arrived at the age of fifty-one years, and asks for a support from those who are fond of sound reasoning, good reading, reliable news, anecdotes, science, art, and a useful family journal. "DESIGN" IN NATURE.

REPLIES TO THE

"Christian Guardian" and "Christian Advocate."

By ALLEN PRINGLE.

This pamphlet was considered necessary because the paper attacking Mr. Pringle refused to publish his reply to it. Its criticism was upon Mr. Pringle's argument against design in nature, and this work contains both the attack and reply. It is valuable, as it presents the strongest Christian evidence for the existence of God with the complete and overwhelming refutation.

THE

BIBLE—WHENCE AND WHAT?

BY

Richard B. Westbrook, D.D., LL.B.,

A theologian of high degree, and a counsellor learned in the law, on the origin and character of the Bible.

The author, though possessing all the prerogativs of a clergyman, repudiates the title "Rev." as a relic of Brahmanical caste and Roman sacerdotalism. He is entirely independent of ecclesiastical supervision and censure.

The questions, Where did the books of the Bible come from? What is their authority? and, What is the real source of dogmatic theology? are treated fearlessly in the light of history, philosophy, and comparativ religions. It is impossible to giv even a condensed statement of what is itself a marvelous condensation.

WHOLE LIBRARIES ARE HERE CONCENTRATED INTO ONE LITTLE BOOK.

The author's conclusions are, of course, against the supernatural origin and infallibility of the Bible, while the dogmas of the dominant theology are shown to be priestly perversions of the ancient mythologies.

The principles of natural religion are ably stated, and the claims of true morality are warmly adpocated.

The strong commendations of the secular prass show that is just the book for these times of agitation and "revision."

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Vol. 9. No. 31. { PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY D. M. BENNETT. } New York, Saturday, August 5, 1882. { SCIENCE HALL, 141 8th St., NEAR BROADWAY. } $3 per year.

Notes and Clippings.

A GOOD farm in Indiana has been allowed to run to weeds for five years because of a belief that it is under the curse of a former owner, whose ghost walks the fields at night and would make it unpleasant for a tenant.

THE enormous number of baths taken each week at the public bath-houses, often reaching between two hundred thousand and three hundred thousand, and counted for the whole season in millions, shows not only how popular they are as amusements, but how vitally important to the cleanliness and sanitary welfare of the population as a whole.

THE Mazzini monument in Genoa was unveiled on June 22d. As the covering fell, and the sad, noble face and form were revealed, a solemn silence fell on the multitude. Many wept, and then arose a tremendous shout which rent the air. Garibaldi's hymn was pealed out. Meanwhile the banner of unredeemed Italy was unfurled at the foot of the monument, but before the police could intervene it was hauled down and passed from hand to hand in safety. Garibaldi's hymn was repeated, and the procession dispersed.

WHILE the pope was taking his usual drive in the Vatican gardens the report of a gun was heard close at hand. The coachman took fright, whipped his horses, cried out, "Help! Assassins!" and drove full speed into the courtyard of the papal palace, causing great consternation among the guards, who ran for their arms and barred the gates. The guards went in quest of the supposed assassin, and soon returned to the palace with a dead cat, which the keeper of a neighboring vinyard had kept. Does the pope's conscience make him a coward?

D. M. BENNETT, the venerable editor and proprietor of the New York TRUTH SEEKER, who has a national, if not a world-wide, reputation in journalism, will pay a visit to Michigan in a few days. As he is on his way home from a twelve months' trip round the globe, and from the many solicitations received from the friends of freedom in this state, he has consented to stop over one day in Jackson and giv the Wolverines a little history of the antipodes. He is now in Wisconsin, and will make but one stop in Michigan—on the 23d.—Adrian Evening Mail.

SOME important telephone results hav been lately obtained by M. Van Rysselberghe, the Belgian meteorologist. He has succeeded in eliminating from telephonic communication through a wire the inductiv action of a neighboring telegraph wire (which givs a crackling kind of noise in the telephone). Moreover, he can employ the same wire at the same time for both telephonic and telegraphic work. Thus, in a recent experiment, a message was sent from Brussels by the Morse telegraph to the directing engineer of telegraphs in Paris, and an oral message sent by telephone was distinctly heard while the Morse receiver was in action. At the forthcoming exhibition in Munich telephony is to be tried between that town and Dresden, a distance of about 343 miles.

ON Friday evening Mrs. Dr. Severance very pleasantly entertained a company of friends at her residence on Grand avenue in honor of her guests, Mrs. H. S. Lake and Mr. Peck, of Chicago. The entertainment consisted of music by Severance & Willlams's orchestra, and songs by Messrs. O. A. Severance, Clarence H. Williams, Mr. Peck, Miss Lillian Stillman, and others. A fine recitation by Mrs. Lake was greatly enjoyed, and altogether the evening passed very delightfully. Among the guests were Dr. and Mrs. H. S. Brown, Mr. and Mrs. O. A. Severance, Mrs. T. W. Williams, C. H. Williams, Messrs. C. G. and Omro Severance, Mr. and Mrs. Hunting, Mr. and Mrs. McAlstine, Mr. and Mrs. Spencer, Mrs. Ormsby, Mrs. Edinger and daughter, Prof. and Mrs. Ainsworth, Mrs. J. B. Smith, and others.

ON the 11th and 12th of last month, Siena, Italy, was visited by a series of alarming earthquake shocks. The soldiers were all turned out of the barracks, and the people rushed out of the houses on to the Lizza for safety. The houses rocked; the plaster came tumbling down the chimneys. The shocks were repeated, some strong, some weak, throughout the day at intervals of a quarter to half an hour. The bells were rung; the thrice-holy Madonna del Vuoto was uncovered. Some of the nobility, afraid of their own houses, had their carriages dragged on to the Lizza and slept there in the open air. At two in the morning there came a shock as strong and terrifying as if a mine had been sprung under the city. After that the force of the concussions decreased.

THE sale of an advowson at a London auction mart was attended by representativs of the Curates' Alliance for the Abolition of Purchase in the church of England. Upon the lot being put up the Rev. G. Hennessey called out, "Withdraw the advowson;" to which the auctioneer replied, "No, I will not withdraw the advowson, but somebody may be withdrawn presently." The reverend gentleman again demanded the withdrawal, upon which the auctioner informed him solemnly that if he was not quiet, "as sure as he was a living man he would hav to go out." Mr. Hennessey, however, still continued to interrupt the proceedings, and replied to the remonstrance of one of the spectators by declaring that this was "the only effectual way in which they could protest against the sale of souls." Upon the auctioneer once more warning the clerical agitators that "they might find themselvs going down the steps of the building involuntarily and very quickly if they persevered in obstructing the sale," they quieted down, but the advowson was not sold.

THE liquor trade seems to hav good reason for alarm at the total-abstinence wave which is sweeping the West. In Kansas the prohibitory law has driven the traffic out of sight and made it so dangerous that only reckless men will engage in it. In Iowa the recently adopted constitutional amendment has been declared valid by the courts, and the next Legislature will be compelled to enact a statute to wholly prevent the manufacture and sale of spirituous beverages. In Indiana a prohibitory act has passed one branch of the Legislature, and will unquestionably become a law. Connecticut has a new law requiring the names of five taxpayers on every petition for a license; and as no name can appear on two petitions, this greatly restricts the number of bar-rooms. The noted Pond law of Ohio has been declared unconstitutional, but new legislation against rum is being arranged for next winter. Michigan has imposed an immense license tax, intended to close the small saloons. Anti-treating laws in Nebraska and Wisconsin having been nullified by court decisions, the enemies of alcohol are getting ready for something more stringent. The question of prohibition will be an important one in the fall elections of North Carolina, Illinois, and probably several other states. Even in Kentucky—a great producer of whisky—a formidable agitation is in progress.

A REVIVAL of the efforts to abolish Sunday bathing at the seaside camp-meeting resorts has broken out with new fervor. Original enactments against Sunday immersion in the surf were very strict, and for some years were rigidly enforced. Latterly the better judgment of the managers has winked at the offenders, who thought it no more sin to wash in the sea on Sunday than to wash in their own bath-tubs, which they would do if they were at home. But now it is decided that to take a surf bath is to break the Sabbath. At some of the camps by the sea a patrol is organized to warn the brethren of the consequences of transgressing the law. At one of these places a portly and somewhat stern official appeared on the beach while a pleasant party of half a dozen good Christians were enjoying their morning dip in the salt water. He ordered them to come out, which they refused to do. Then he told them that if they would not come out he would carry their clothes away. They dared him to do this at his peril, and gave him to understand that if he touched a single garment of theirs they would pick him up and souse him in the sea without giving him opportunity for a change of apparel. The old man hesitated a little while, and then made up his mind that if he did not want to become an involuntary Sunday bather the best thing he could do was to go away. This he did, telling the bathing brethren, as he mournfully turned his back on them, that he believed them to be men of sin. But he molested them no more.

A FISH story comes from the vicinity of Sea Girt, N. J. It is stated that one day the family of a much respected clergyman, living in a cottage near that fashionable resort, were without meat or fish for dinner, and were driven to the probability of having to dine on cabbage and other vegetables. About ten o'clock in the morning a large fish-hawk was seen to swoop down to the sea and rise with a fish in its beak. It is well known that this is the manner in which the fish-hawk does his marketing, and having thus secured his prey, takes it home to his wife and chiidren in their nest on top of a high tree. It so happened that this fish-hawk had caught too large a fish. It was a ten-pound bluefish, and it struggled violently for liberty when captured by the hawk. Presently, just as the hawk was flying over the poor clergyman's back yard the fish got the better of him, and hit the hawk such a powerful blow with his tail that the hawk was glad to let him drop. The fish suddenly descended among the clergyman's wife and daughters, who were sitting in the shade of a tree outside the kitchen and preparing their frugal meal. They accepted the fish as a gift from heaven, whence, indeed, it seemed to hav come, so unexpected and startling was its descent from above. The clergyman's family called in two or three of their neighbors and enjoyed with them a substantial fish dinner. The poor fish-hawk had to make other provision for his family in the tree top. This is only a fish story, yet it is said to be vouched for by several excellent and trustworthy people.

THE exposure of the drunken debaucheries of Rev. Timothy O'Connell, rector of St. James Episcopal church at Fremont, one of the largest parishes in Nebraska, is creating considerable sensation. An afternoon paper publishes his record before coming to Nebraska. In 1876 he was married to Helen Jones at Huntington, N. Y., and went to Cornellsville, Pa., where he was frequently drunk and abused his wife. He had delirium tremens, and was twice put in an insane asylum, but the last time made his escape, his wife going home to Huntington. O'Connell went to Nebraska City, Neb., and after a while quietly obtained a divorce from his wife on the ground of desertion. She knew nothing definit until after it had been obtained, she being informed by letter. An attempt was made to reopen the case, and affidavits were filed for that purpose, but they were stolen. One affidavit was that of Mary Rogers, who charges him with having seduced her in November, 1876, at the house of his wife's father at Huntington, N. Y., where he was visiting. It is claimed, also, that he threatened the lives of Bishop Kerwood and wife of Pennsylvania. Whether his character was known to the bishop of Nebraska is not positivly stated, but he succeeded in being appointed district presbyter, and last spring he obtained charge of St. James parish at Fremont, Nebraska. Mrs. O'Connell's sister livs in Omaha, and her sister's husband has from time to time told different church people and others of the character of O'Connell, but the general public were ignorant of the man's history.

News of the Week.

ANOTHER anti-monopoly journal, called Justice, has been started.

J. N. CRAFTS, a Presbyterian deacon, of Franklin, Pa., is a defaulter to the extent of $65,000.

THE flouring mills of Hecker & Co., in this city, were burnt on the 31st ult. Loss about $500,000.

ONE of the big operators in wheat made $525,000 on a "deal" lately. And the workingman pays it in the end.

ANTHONY COMSTOCK is raiding the pool sellers of this city. They accuse him of many things not supposed to be compatible with decency.

THE President will veto the River and Harbor bill. It is thought the robbery is too apparent for even a professional politician to approve.

JOHN L. SULLIVAN, the notorious pugilist, has been fined in a Boston court for being drunk and using obscene language. Sullivan is a good Catholic.

THE death list in this city last week was unprecedentedly long, owing to the extreme hot weather, the mercury ranging continually among the nineties.

WHEN Vanderbilt travels he rides in a car that cost $40,000. When people travel who pay their fare they are forced to ride in much less expensiv vehicles.

GENERAL GRANT has written a letter to the House chairman of Committee Affairs to say that he thinks the Japanese indemnity fund should be returned, with interest, to Japan.

REV. CHARLES E. STOWE, nephew of Henry Ward Beecher, is in trouble with the deacons of his church because of his liberality in belief. He believes in evolution and several other heresies.

THE striking freight handlers are still out. Although the railroad monopolists raised freight two and three cents per hundred pounds, they decline to concede the advance of three cents per hour, which the strikers deemed it necessary to hav in order to liv.

THE Egyptian imbroglio is as far from settled as ever. Arabi Bey is stirring up the Egyptians to a national war with considerable prospect of success. The sultan of Turkey is lukewarm toward England, and intimates that he will only obey united Europe. Meanwhile, the English keep control of Alexandria, and promptly shoot all thieves and incendiaries they catch.

AT Bigelow's Garden, a pleasure resort in Worcester, Mass., a sacred concert by the Worcester Brass Band was stopped by the city marshal, and the proprietor, J. H. Bigelow, directed to appear in court to answer a charge of doing business on the Lord's day. The garden is fitted up with revolving horses, swings, fountains, and flower-beds, and is run in connection with the Rink as a pleasure resort. Concerts hav been repeatedly given in the Rink on Sunday evenings under the head of "sacred concerts."

CEPHAS M. WOODRUFF, of Newark, N. J., was an elder in the Presbyterian church of that town. He was also the executor of a brother elder of the same church who died in 1871. Woodruff settled up the business, and then became business manager for Mrs. Porter, the widow of the brother eider. He frequently prayed with the lady before talking business matters with her, and had her confidence until two or three years ago, when she sued him to recover several thousand dollars, which, she alleged, Woodruff had embezzled. The decision of Vice-Chancellor Van Fleet has not yet been given. It is expected to be in Mrs. Porter's favor, but Mr. Woodruff's estate is insolvent, and she will hav to take her chance with other creditors.

A Truth Seeker Around the World

A Few Days in China.

HONG KONG, April 16, 1882.

DEAR LOVERS OF TRUTH: I closed my last letter as we were nearing this port. The strong head winds and the fog at night retarded us for a few hours, but early on the morning of the 13th we reached the outlying islands, of which there are many, and saw large numbers of Chinese sailing craft, including junks and smaller vessels and fishermen's boats. The junks and sailing boats are rather clumsy looking—wide in proportion to length, the stern rising several feet higher than the middle portion. The sails are of bamboo matting, square in form, with five ribs of bamboo poles running obliquely, the whole reminding one of the wing of an immense bat. The smaller boats were very numerous, and the Chinamen in them seemed very intent at fishing, while the larger crafts were conveying merchandise of various kinds to and from neighboring localities.

The islands of the Chinese coast are far from beautiful. They are naked and abrupt masses of rock, protruding from the surface of the ocean, with little covering save a reddish clay in places, and with no vegetation. The crests and peaks are sharp, angular, and serrated, looking as though some great upheaval had taken place here perhaps hundreds of thousands of years ago, the fused or plastic rocks quickly congealing in their present rugged form. These outlying sentinels do not impress the beholder that they are guarding the "Flowery Kingdom," for not a flower or a tree of any size is to be seen on many of them. They differ in size, some being very small and some from one to fifteen miles in circumference, and their altitude varies from three to fifteen hundred feet. No signs of inhabitants were to be seen on the most of them; on one or two are a few dwellings, being level enough near the water to admit of buildings, and a bare possibility of growing some vegetation. Probably they are chiefly the homes of fishermen.

Half a dozen or more very small steamers, which the English call "steam launches," came out to meet us, and accompanied us in. About 10 A. M. we reached the company's wharf in the harbor of Hong Kong, and found everything wearing the appearance of life and activity. The city is on an island some twelve miles in circumference, also bearing the name of Hong Kong. Victoria Peak, immediately in the rear of the city, reaches some eighteen hundred feet in hight. The town, partly built upon the hillside at the base of the Peak, and partly on the narrow strip of level land next to the harbor, is not much seen as approached from the China Sea until very close to it. The harbor consists of an arm of the sea, nearly a mile in width, between the island and the main-land opposite the point of the southern Chinese peninsula, which has the same precipitous and naked appearance as the neighboring islands.

Here the British flag waves, reminding one of the extensive domain which bows in submission to it; beginning at Gibraltar, taking in Malta, Cyprus, Egypt (upon which the British hold a mortgage, almost amounting to an ownership), Adin, and the neighboring islands, the whole of India, the best part of Burmah, Ceylon, Penang, and Singapore, and now Hong Kong, and further on Shanghai, to say nothing of Australia, New Zealand, the southern portion of Africa, and very extensive possessions in North America. Truly it is said "the sun never sets off the British possessions." That little nation certainly wields more power than any other upon the face of the earth.

HONG KONG

Is comparatively an English city, though in China, and nine-tenths of its inhabitants are Chinese. There are some ten thousand Europeans here, including the military, numbering about two thousand; there are a few Arabs, Parsees, etc., with some 140,000 Chinese. The town is well built, even including the native quarters. The city has had a rapid growth, being less than forty years of age. After the English conflict with the Chinese in 1842 the town was started, and is now a very important commercial and military point. A great amount of shipping is done here, both East and West; like Singapore, it being a free port, so that there is no obstruction to trade. The exports and imports are large. We found the harbor pretty full of steamers, ships, etc.—some forty of the former, and more than thirty of the latter, not including some fifty small steamers, and hundreds of small sailing vessels and boats for running about the harbor and visiting the various steamers and ships lying therein. Among the large steamers some eight or ten are men of war of different European nations, which are stopping here temporarily. In many of the small boats, or sampans, Chinese women are to be seen as frequently as men; in fact, their boats are their homes, and it becomes as much the business of the women to help in rowing, sculling, steering, etc., as the men, and they evince a marked degree of skill and activity in that line. I have noticed them also on lighters, conveying freight to the steamers and ships; they take an active part in the work the same as the men, often with their little babes strapped to their backs, looking as contented and peaceful as the best disposed American babies when being rocked in a cradle. While the mother is vigorously rowing, the babe at her back may be seen fast asleep, though the sudden motion of the mother's body seems nearly enough to break the child's neck; but it is used to it, and does not mind that rough-and-tumble sort of life. While the mothers are walking along the streets the babes are often seen part asleep, with their heads dropping backwards in what would seem a very uncomfortable positson; but their sleep appears as sweet as that of a young prince or that of a child of a millionaire. And, what is also very cheering, the mother and children look very healthy.

Of course, the sights of Hong Kong had to be investigated. Many of the numerous Chinese stores and mechanic shops must be visited. The stores are rather capacious, especially when compared with the stores of India, and they are neatly kept, well attended, and fully supplied with native and foreign goods, in the buying and selling of which Chinese merchants are very proficient. I saw a store with the name Yan Kee over the door, but could not believe it was the original.

In the mechanic shops all the various branches are being conducted with vigor and skill. The making of camphor-wood boxes, to be used as trunks, is extensively carried on, as well as nearly all the ordinary mechanical trades, too numerous to mention. Industry and activity are the rule throughout. The markets are well supplied with vegetables common in our own markets, but I think they must be brought from the main-land, as there is little land on the island suitable for gardening. The cabbages, squashes, cucumbers, radishes, lettuce, etc., look as fresh as though just from the gardens. Fish are caught hereabouts in great abundance, and are used in vast numbers, composing, as they do, a considerable proportion of the Chinaman's diet.

The mode of conveyance about the town is by the Japanese jinriki-sha and chairs, carried on the shoulders of coolies. The first is a genteel, light, two-wheeled carriage, or hand-cart, which I mentioned in Singapore. Some will hold two persons, but are more comfortable for one, and with such a load the Chinese coolie trots off on the smooth roads nearly as fast as a horse. I rode in one several miles. They are brought from Japan, where they are much used. The chairs are like a sedan-chair, and differ from the palanquins of India in having two poles to be carried by in place of one, and are usually without a top, while the palanquins are inclosed and suspended from the carrying-pole. With the chairs, one pole is on each side of the chair, the ends resting on both shoulders of the carriers. I could not help noticing the difference in the ease with whith the Chinese seem to carry these chairs compared with the Hindoos, with their palanquins. Two Chinamen walked off with these chairs with a heavy man in it with far more apparent ease than four Hindoos with the same load in a palanquin. The Chinaman is far more muscular than the Hindoo. Ascending and descending the cross streets running up the hill is, of course, attended with some difficulty in either mode of conveyance, but the coolies manage it well; they even carry persons in these chairs to the top of Victoria Peak, eighteen hundred feet high, and so steep that it is hard work for a person to climb it on foot.

I visited the Botanical Gardens, and found them very interesting in trees, plants, and flowers of tropical and European varieties. Many of them are extremely beautiful. The garden is on a partially level terrace, some two hundred feet above the main streets of the town. In this vicinity are numerous fine residences of wealthy Englishmen, as well as the governor's house and the general's. They are sufficiently elevated above the water level to give a commanding view of the harbor and shipping. The government buildings and soldier's barracks are large and fine-looking. At the parade grounds, at the eastern end of the town, I saw the military out, and a number of the soldiers running races, jumping hurdles, etc. The English are very fond of such athletic sports; I see them everywhere.

The museum in the Town Hall is well filled with native manufactures, models of ships and boats, weapons of warfare, natural history, including a full variety of the birds, butterflies, insects, shells, snakes, etc., of this part of the world, with skeletons of many larger animals; also many specimens of the rocks, minerals, ores, and woods of the locality. The military stores kept here by the British government are large, this being the depot for army and naval supplies for this section, including Singapore and Shanghai.

The cemetery of the city, called "Happy Valley," located in a snug nook between the high hills in the rear, a mile or so east of the city, is delightfully adapted for the purpose. It contains many fine monuments, commemorating departed admirals, generals, and captians, with very many of the "rank" and "file" who have succumbed to the unhealthiness of the climate and the engagements which took place in the contest forty years ago. For a city so young the cemetery contains a great number of graves, and seems to confirm the assertion that "Hong Kong is the graveyard of England." Many who came out to engage in business and service early laid down their lives, for I noticed that very many who were buried in "Happy Valley" were in the prime of life. Dr. Young tells me the decomposed granite of the country when dug up sets free a noxious gas or miasma, which has been very fatal to Europeans, but that it is now much less sickly than formerly. The unevenness of the ground in the cemetery is tastefully employed to make the locality romantic and picturesque, and graves are seen on these various altitudes. The peaceful surroundings seem to imply that it is really a happy valley, compared with the struggles and turmoils of life. Here at least "the weary are at rest." The Chinese cemeteries are farther away and are always located on the hillside, and without decoration save the somewhat neat and modest circular appearance of the fronts, something in the shape of a horseshoe, and looking as though a vault was in the hillside containing the departed friends. Elevated localities are selected, and on the hillside they are sure to have dry graves. The Chinese greatly venerate their dead, and they seek to have the grave such as will long preserve the bodies in good condition and keep water from finding access.

Among the places visited about town was an unoccupied lot of an acre or so where were many groups of Chinese, each group having as a center a nostrum seller, or doctor, having Chinese signs and show bills around him, with numerous bottles of his remedies, which he seemed to be praising in high terms to his audience in such eloquent manner as to effect some sales. Others were pulling teeth, applying liniment to lame backs and sore shins. Some were musicians, and attracted dense crowds by singing in the native tongue, accompanying the same by striking on a small gong. The whole was not without interest, for it was a kind of "Vanity Fair," showing that the Chinese have charlatans and venders of marvelous "curealls" the same as other nations.

There is one American house in Hong Kong, that of Russell & Co., who seem to be doing an extensive business in exporting, importing, and as agents for ships, and steamers, and banking. There were formerly other American houses here, but the vicissitudes of trade compelled them to suspend. There are many heavy English firms with fine stores and good stocks, but the bulk of the business is performed by the Chinese. Some of them do a heavy exporting and importing business, and have become very wealthy. Several lines of steamboats engaged in the coast trade are owned by Chinese merchants. I heard an English officer of a steamer say, "The Chinamen were rather slow to adopt our modes of business, but at last they learned; now they are going ahead rapidly, and bid fair to run us out." The Chinese are satisfied with small profits, and can do business much cheaper than the English.

THE CHINESE NATION.

Now that we have got within the Chinese islands and the mainland is scarcely a mile from us, with an old walled city inside the hills on the peninsula not another mile away, it is quite correct to say that we have reached the "Celestial Land," the "Flowery Kingdom," the ancient "Cathay," or modern China, with its 5,000,000 of square miles and 400,000,000 people, the most populous as well as the oldest nation in the world—a nation indebted to no other for its civilization, its art and literature—a nation which claims an existence of forty thousand years, and some say even of millions. However unsupported these extravagant claims of antiquity may be, it cannot be denied that the Chinese are a very ancient people. They have no traditions of Noah's flood (though they claim to have had a flood of their own), and it is almost a certainty that they descended from neither of the sons of that old, mythical shipbuilder and navigator; and in the Jew book there is no reference to this people, and no allusion given that can have any application to them. They are undoubtedly older than any of the nations mentioned in the Jewish scriptures, and are wholly disconnected from any nation known to the Jews. Meadows, in his work on China, places the reign of Fu-hi 3327 before the Christian era, since which time a continuous history is claimed. It is well known that Confucius lived five hundred and fifty years before our era, and that he revised the old sacred writings of "the Kings," which were at that time very ancient, and he often spoke of those who had lived and taught long before him as "those of ancient times."

Sochee Chunder Dutt, who has written much on the Asiatic nations, and is also a believer in Bible story, is decidedly of the opinion that the Chinese did not descend from the family of Noah. He says: "In reviewing the facts we find no account anywhere of the descendants of Noah having proceeded to China to people it. We do not lose sight of the two assumptions frequently advanced that China was probably planted by the Tartars descending from the steeps of the Imans, or by the Kshetryas on being expelled from India, both assumptious being based on the supposition that the Hindoos and the Tartars derive their descent from the stock of Noah, which is in itself erroneous. Even apart from the objection, neither of the hypotheses seems to us to have any good foundation to stand upon. The Tartar invasion assumed by Father Martini, were it possible to corroborate it by better evidence than has yet been advanced in its support, would still prove nothing as respects the first, simply by proving too much; for, if the invasion alluded to took place in the reign of Shun, its date was necessarily much too early for any branch of the family of Noah to have peopled Tartary, and then extended to China. I do not believe in any such invasion, for the simple reason that the Tartars could not have developed themselves sufficiently at the time for such a purpose. I believe that both China and Tartary had then already ceased to be thinly peopled—for I am not wedded to the dogma that all races of men descended from Noah, to commence with, and I doubt greatly if either son was in those early times strong enough to send out emigrants or raiders in any direction. In the Tartar accounts we read that Oghuz Khan was the first who made himself master of Cathay; and, if we take his era approximately at between 1800 and 1600 B.C., it brings us very near to the time when the Tartars began to be troublesome on the borders of China, in the reign of Changting, 1562 to 1648 B.C. But the Chinese accounts show that on that occasion the Tartars were repulsed; and even if it had been otherwise, the era for planting China had then gone by.

"The other hypothesis is also open objection of an unaccordance with dates. The descent of the Chinèse from the Kshetryas has been supported by the text of Menu, which says that 'many families of the military class, having gradually abandoned the ordinances of the Vedas, . . . lived in a state of degradation, such as the people of Pandraka and Adra, those of Dravira and Camboja, the Yavanas and Sakas, the Paradas and Pahlavas, the Chinas and other nations;' and Sir William Jones, referring to the story of Yayati, an Indian prince of the Lunar race, having banished his son Druhya to the eastward of India with a curse that his progeny would be ignorant of the Vedas, says that this Druhya was probably identical with Fohi, who is generally recognized as the progenitor of the Chinese. In refutation of this supposition, it will perhaps be sufficient to point out that, by the Chinese accounts, Fohi lived long before the deluge, which did not occur till the reign of Yaou, while Druhya, by the Hindoo accounts, lived some generations after Satyavrata, the Noah of the Hindoos. It may be further mentioned that the Chinese accounts distinctly make Fohi a native of China, born in the province of Shense, in the northwest province of the empire. His birth was, of course, miraculous; he was too great a man to be allowed an ordinary birth, and the story mentions that his mother was embraced by a rainbow, but that rainbow, mind, had no connection with the rainbow of the deluge, for the simple fact already stated, that Fohi belonged to an anterior age.

"Rejecting both the above assumptions, then, we may take it for granted that China was not peopled by any descendant of Noah; in fact, all her stories go to prove that China was well peopled before the flood; that the flood, when it did come, did not destroy all her inhabitants; that all the damage it did to the country was repaired after the labor of a few years. It follows, therefore, that China was planted in regular course by an independent set of first parents, especially given to the country from the beginning; i. e., that the Chinese are an aboriginal race occuppying their own country from the first dawn of time [the commencement of the human race], a conclusion fully borne out by the history of their civilization, and even by their outward appearance. They have mixed long, very long, with the Moguls and the Tartar, and with those of the Hindoos they have no affinity whatever."

Further on the same writer says: "The proofs establishing the remote antiquity of the Chinese exist in their own records, which have not been found untrustworthy; in the corroborative testimony of such equally ancient records of the Hindoos as existed (e. g., the passage from Menu which has been already cited); and in the existence among the Chinese, to this day, of such arts as picture-writing and hieroglyphic-painting, which generally indicate an old existence, and which were only equally well known, one to the ancient Mexicans, and the other to the ancient Egyptians, from neither of whom could they have been borrowed.

"In respect to the extent of Chinese civilization, if it was not very great in the abstract, it cannot be said to have been very inconsiderable when we remember that such as it was, it was almost entirely of indigenous growth. By her position China has always been what she is at this moment, more or less cut off from the rest of the world; and yet was the country always provided with everything that could possibly be required for the comforts of man. Literature and philosophy were early cultivated by the inhabitants; theology and ethics also; nay, even astronomy, music, and magic; and all this without neglecting agriculture, medicine, navigation, commerce, and the mechanical arts. Step by step, and one step at a time, was the golden rule they followed, as is shown by the facts which their historians have taken so much care to record. The efforts of the first two dynasties were mainly confined to the clearance of the country, the formation of villages, and the introduction among the people of agriculture and the pastoral and domestic arts. Suju, who immediately preceded Fohi, is said to have invented knotted cords, as the first crude attempt of his age for recording ideas. Fohi invented symbols, and substituted them for the knotted cords. Hwang-te reduced the symbols to characters, which were afterward improved in the reign of Lew-pang. Throughout the reigns of Fohi, Shin-nung, and Hwang-te, the growth and progress of the sciences and arts were especially fostered. Then followed the age for laws, regulations, and political institutions, under Yaou and Shun—Yaou being the first legislator, while Shun gave effect to those of his predecessor's ideas which he did not live to carry out. Of Hwang-te it is said he cut through the mountains to facilitate commerce, that he discovered the mariner's compass, and that one of his ministers, Yonge-heng, discovered the polar star; and all this, be it remembered, before the deluge, which found the rest of the world plunged generally in barbarism and crime. In after years many of the emperors are described as having been good astronomers themselves, and as taking great personal interest in teaching astronomy to their subjects. A tribunal of history existed to compose accurate accounts of each reign, the first portion of whose labors was published in 97 B.C., by Izeemat-seen, in the reign of Woote; and if all these annals be not altogether trustworthy, surely no other Asiatic country ever made such effort to arrive at the truth. The very assortment of the classics of the nation attests to a considerable progress in letters among them. The divisions were five, namely, (1) Shu-King, which was historical; (2) Shi-King, which was poetical; (3) Yi-King, which referred to sciences, but now little understood; (4) Chung-Ciou, which related to government; and (5) Laki, which had reference to moral duties. Of the perseverance of the people a standing proof exists in the great wall of China, carried over mountains and across rivers for more than a thousand miles, its hight varying from fifteen to thirty feet, whilst its breadth affords space enough for six horsemen to ride abreast upon it. Of their general aptness almost every manufacturer of China affords ample evidence, being nearly as good as the similar productions of Europe. The manufacture of gunpowder is said to have been known to the Chinese long before it was discovered in the West; it is certain that the art of printing was known to them at least two hundred years before the birth of Christ, and the manufacture of paper from an earlier date; and, more wonderful still, they knew, as observed, the use of the mariner's compass from the time of Hwang-te, which must have been of inestimable benefit to them in their rude excursions on the ocean, carried on in square-built ships made of pieces of wood sewed together with the strong thread of the cocoanut, which were mainly directed to different points by the flight of birds and by periodical winds. In the excursions the Indian ports were particularly sought for; and it is well known that at Ceylon the Chinese trader met the Persian capitalist half way to dispose of his silks—a proof in itself of very considerable progress for the age."

In summing up his able remarks on China, the same writer says: "The evidences of civilization in China are undeniable, even though that civilization be of a rather humble and distorted character. It is pertinent, therefore, to ask how that civilization was attained. Neither Greece nor Rome nor Persia was self-civilized; nor can any country of modern Europe lay claim to that distinction. But the Chinese, like the Egyptians and the Hindoos, commenced the world without extraneous help, and even more especially than the Egyptians and the Hindoos, who may have copied from each other, attained what civilization it can boast of by their own exertions. They have possessed for ages many very curious and useful branches of art, and have greatly excelled in them; but no one has helped them to them; they have not learned them by imitation. Several of these arts have since been introduced into Europe, but the excellence of the Chinese, in some of them at least, has not been surpassed. Mechanical skill has been carried to perfection among them; their ingenuity and skill are unequaled. Their long bridges, great roads, and pyramidal towers are architectural and engineering evidences of this skill, industry, and ingenuity. They dig canals, form gardens, and level mountains more patiently, perhaps, than any other nation. They are also inimitable manufacturers of porcelain and bronze, excellent carvers in wood and ivory, very superior workmen with silk and cotton, and this, considering their peculiar position, and exclusiveness, is certainly amazing. The fact is, they are able to adapt themselves to any and every condition of life, and always do so without hesitation. There is a strange union of the past and the present in their character, as in everything else about them, and, while wedded to the past ordinarily, they never flinch from accommodating themselves to the present whenever it is of service to them to do so. This is a very favorable trait in them to notice, and promises to carry them through as long a future as they have had of the past."

In love of education perhaps no nation presents a better record, and in no nation is more attention paid to it. Here learning is the only road to places of power, of trust, and honor. A man who cannot pass the most thorough examination in literary branches stands no chance of reaching any commanding position. In no country are there more profound teachers in the various literary branches or a greater number of advanced students. Here knowledge is not only highly respected, but is absolutely required of all those who would occupy the better positions in society or hold any posts under the government. Even the lower classes are pretty well educated, but it must be admitted that here, as in the oriental countries generally, females are disregarded in this respect, it not being deemed essential that they should be learned. Females of the higher classes are somewhat educated, but those of the lower classes are not.

Anson Burlingame, when he headed a Chinese embassy to our country in 1868, made, in a speech delivered in New York, the following tribute to Chinese learning and civilization:

"China is the land of scholars and schools; a land of books, from the smallest pamphlet up to the voluminous encyclopedias. It is a land where privileges are common. It is a land without caste, for they destroyed their feudal system over two thousand years ago, and they built up their grand structure of civilization on the great idea that the people are the source of power. This idea was uttered by Mencius between two and three thousand years since, and it was old when he uttered it. . . . They make scholarship a test of merit."

To give some idea of the voluminous character of Chinese literature, I will copy the statement made by others, that the Chinese dictionary is a work of one hundred and fifty volumes, and the history of China is a work of three hundred and sixty volumes, while the works in the various branches of literature are almost without number. The catalogue alone of the works in the emperor's library at Pekin is said to occupy one hundred and twenty volumes.

THE RELIGION OF CHINA.

Like other nations, China has had its gods and religions, though it does not seem that she boasts of so great a number of gods as India or Egypt. They were thousands of years ago worshipers of the forces of nature, which in time they invested with personality, but they generally recognized one supreme deity, whom they regarded as the creator of the world and the special friend of their nation. One of the names of this deity was Tien, or Chang-ti, a supreme being who commands right deeds, pure thoughts, and constant watchfulness. Their worship has been mainly devoted to their ancestors, whom they hold in great reverence. Probably there is hardly another nation that cherishes the memory of their progenitors with such devout reverence, and this has been the case for thousands of years. It is the duty of sons to honor the memory of their fathers, and so fully is this observed that it amounts to sacrilege if a son neglects this binding obligation. Meetings are often held at the graves of the departed, and here their highest worshipful feelings are poured forth.

China has three great systems of religion—Confucianism, Tanism, and Buddhism, and, what is remarkable, they have existed peacefully together more than two thousand years; they have not quarreled and fought as have the devotees of other religions, but the three systems have been so equally regarded that it is not unusual for the three systems to be embraced and sustained by the same individual.

Confucius (Kong-foo-tse) is regarded by the Chinese as their greatest philosopher, and it is very doubtful if the world has produced a greater teacher or one who founded a better or purer religion. He was born 552 years before Christ, and not far from the time when Cyrus became king of Persia, and the return of the Jews from Babylon. His birth and that of Buddha were but a few years apart, so that these two great teachers and founders were upon the earth at the same time. He became fatherless at an early age, but his mother trained him with tender care and encouraged his natural taste for learning. At the time he lived China was divided into several petty kingdoms, which were bitterly contending with each other for supremacy. When he attained the years of manhood he received a governmental position in his kingdom, but he became so wearied with the incessant contentions that he retired from public service and devoted himself to teaching his band of disciples and the multitudes who gathered around him to listen to his moral precepts and instructions. The purity of his life and the excellence of his doctrines brought around him many grave and thoughtful persons, who became greatly attached to him as faithful followers.

When about fifty years of age he accepted the office of minister of state, and his ministration was marked with great wisdom, prudence, and success. But after all the excesses of the court upturned his good laws and provisions, and he was again compelled to resign his post and retire to the humble life of a religious teacher. Reverses came upon him as he advanced in years, and he experienced the unpleasantness of the friends of prosperity turning away from him; but he remained true to the great moral principles he had long enunciated, and a faithful band of followers remained loyal to him.

His system has been called, not a religion, but a code of morals; it is, however, doubtful if a better religion has been inculcated, for it instructed men how to lead good lives and how to deport themselves in all conditions and circumstances. He enjoined all to be sincere, just, loving, careful in rendering to others what was due them. If his precepts are obeyed, an almost faultless life will be the result.

To me his system of religion and his teachings appeal with special favor, because mainly free from the mythical and the supernatural. He had little to say about gods and devils, and very little about any other state of existence. His doctrines were eminently of a practical character, relating to the details of life as between man and man. No great religious teacher has been so free from superstition, and so solely directed to the improvement of character. Well would it be if the whole world were faithful followers of his precepts.

The latter portion of his life he spent in editing the sacred books of his country, and in writing some additions to them. These books were five in number, called the Kings, and have already been mentioned. They are of great age, and by good judges believed to be as old as the most ancient Vedas. These books were deeply studied by Confucius, and he strongly urged his listeners to obey their precepts.

At the age of seventy-three he closed his life, having spent fifty years in public instruction. He is regarded as the patron saint of the empire; the finest temple in the country is erected over his grave, and thousands of others are in various parts of the empire. His religion is the state religion, and all candidates for official positions are required to commit to memory his excellent maxims. His name is greatly revered by the better portion of the Chinese nation, and offerings are made to his memory at the two yearly festivals, when thousands of animals are sacrificed, and thousands of pieces of silk are burnt. This is unquestionably an absurd way of honoring his life and teachings, but it seems to comport with the sense of propriety of the Chinese, who hold to much that is superstitious and devoid of reason.

As samples of the sayings of Confucius I will subjoin a few:

Shall I teach you what knowledge is? When you know a thing to hold that you know it, and when you do not know a thing to allow that you do not know it; that is knowledge.

To see what is right and not to do it is a want of courage.

Coarse rice for food, water to drink, the bearded arm for a pillow—happiness may be enjoyed even with these; but without virtue both riches and honor seem to me like a passing cloud.

Grieve not that men know you not; grieve that you know not men.

A good man is serene; a bad man always in fear.

In the Book of poetry are three hundred pieces, but the design of them all may be embraced in that one sentence, "Have no depraved thoughts."

I daily examine myself in a threefold manner in my transactions with men; if I am upright in my intercourse with friends, if I am faithful, and whether I illustrate the highest virtue in my conduct.

Faithfulness and severity are the highest qualities.

When you transgress do not fear to return.

Learn the past and you will know the future.

Not to correct our faults is to commit new ones.

Be rigid to yourselves and good to others.

Fix thy thoughts on duty; practice without ceasing the virtue of humanity; and if you have leisure cultivate the arts.

Return bad treatment with equity, and remember kindness with kindness.

Never do to others what you would not have them do to you

LAO-TSE,

The founder of Tauism, was born fifty years before Confucius, and lived till after the latter became a man. They had an interview on one occasion, but Lao-tse was so deep and metaphysical that Confucius was unable to comprehend him. But by some the elder is considered the greater philosopher and more original thinker of the two. He was abstruse and deep, and less practical than Confucius, still rationalistic. He believed strongly in Tau—the spirit of truth and reality, or the deity whose essence is truth, and hence his system is called Tauism. Though this teacher has been considered very rationalistic, his system has strangely become mixed up with magic, idol-worship, and other senseless beliefs, and its priests are said to be ignorant and full of superstitious absurdities. As I understand it, it is the Tauists who most worship images or idols. Those who worship in Joss-houses are said to be Tauists. Here are specimens of the teachings of Lao-tse:

There is something chaotic in nature which existed before heaven and earth. It was still. It was void. It stood alone and was not changed. It pervaded everywhere and was not endangered. It may be regarded as the mother of the universe. I know not its name, but give it the title of Tau. If I am forced to give a name for it I say it is Great. Being great, I say it passes away; passing away, I say it is far off; being far off I say it returns.

Now Tau is great; the earth is great; a king is great, In the universe there are four greatnesses, and a king is one of them. Man takes his law from the earth; the earth takes its law from heaven; heaven takes its law from Tau, and Tau akes it from what it is in itself.

To produce and have not, to act and expect not—this is sublime virtue.

He who is self-displaying does not shine; he who is self-praising has no merit.

The unwise are full of ambitious desires, lusting for the stalled ox, or for sexual enjoyment. The wise conquer themselvs, putting away all impurity, all excess, and gaiety.

There is no greater misery than discontent; no greater sin than giving rein to lust.

Tau, the spirit, is permanent, yet undefinable.

The sage wears a coarse garment, and hides his jewels in his bosom. He grasps nothing, and therefore loses nothing. He does not copy others. He recompenses injury with kindness, and excels in forgetting himself.

BUDDHISM

Was introduced into China in the year 65 in the first Christian century, over four hundred years after its existence in India. Several mandarins were sent to India to learn with respect to the religion of Buddha, and upon their return they taught the same, and it was largely embraced. Over one-third of the people of China are said to be Buddhists. Their name for the great teacher is Fo. It is to be regretted that this religion has been corrupted with gross superstitions and absurdities. This system of religion is perhaps about the only thing that Chinese have borrowed from other nations, and far better would it have been had it been kept at home.

CHINESE WHIMS AND USAGES.

Notwithstanding its three rather sensible systems of religion, like nearly all other countries, the people of China entertain a great number of absurd myths, and a belief in many species of invisible existences, and in the occult or magic powers which they are supposed to influence. The myth-making disposition has been common to all nations, especially before enlightened by the better teachings of science and truth. There is scarcely a European nation that has not abounded in beliefs in the strangest myths and absurdities. The Scandinavian countries and Germany were especially the field for a belief in elves, hulders, dwarfs, sprites, imps, ogres, wraiths, brownies, fairies, and witches, with an almost endless catalogue of good and bad omens and charms, controlled by invisible powers. The same was to a great extent true of the British islands. The people of those countries were formerly full of those superstitious beliefs and whims, signs, and omens in reference to thousands of things. An account of the myths and folklore of the European nations is sufficient to fill several volumes.

Christian countries have been by no means free from these enslaving superstitions. St. Chrysostom and many of the early fathers found it necessary to inveigh in measured terms against the absurd superstitions and whims which prevailed in their day. In the eighth century a council of church dignitaries, Pope Gregory III., Charlemagne and his successors, and the abbots and bishops of Scotland and France, vehemently denounced the same absurd class of beliefs. Even Martin Luther, the father of Protestantism, entertained many very ridiculous notions. It is recorded of him that he believed in the existence of a stone to be found in eagle's nests which possessed the power of detecting thieves. He expressed his belief, among many other superstitions, that three toads spitted on a stick drew poison from wounds; that the swan sings sweetly just before death; that the hand of a king or an elector possessed the power to cure scrofula by the touch; that the thirty-eighth year of a man's life was one of peculiar danger. He believed strongly in the existence of a personal devil, and that he could be seen by human beings. At one time he thought the devil came into his study and he threw his inkstand at his satanic majesty. He was full of superstitious beliefs. The great prevalence of a belief in the existence of witches, which for hundreds of years prevailed all over Christian Europe, and the millions that were made to suffer the most cruel deaths are sufficient proof of the rule of superstition and mistaken belief that has existed in Christian countries. Nothing in the world has been so shockingly monstrous. The same belief had its run in the taking of life, and causing great wretchedness. If we find superstitions still lingering in less favored nations we have little ground to point the finger of condemnation at them.

The Chinese believe strongly in astrology, lucky and unlucky days, geomancy, divination, influence of the dead demons, portents, signs, omens, etc. These have to do with all the affairs of life, beginning before the birth of the child and continuing till death, and even after placed in their graves. Certain days are lucky to be born on, and others unlucky; they have modes of ascertaining the sex of the child to be born, of frightening away the demons that wish to put in an appearance at the time of birth; they have queer ceremonies of binding the wrists of new-born babes, of cutting the cord of the feet, rocking an empty cradle, etc. Shortly before the birth of a child a ceremony is performed by a priest for the purpose of frightening away the demons who are believed to haunt the mother for the purpose of destroying the life of the child. The priest recites a portion of the sacred writings, then ten or twenty pieces of a certain kind of grass, cut about an inch long, with several likenesses of crabs cut out of paper, are put in a censer and burned.

The ceremonies pertaining to marriage are equally whimsical; the first, sixth, and tenth days of the month are considered the most lucky for marriage. When children are betrothed, a pair of fowls, ducks or geese, and a few pounds of vermicelli are sent by the bride's parents to the bridegroom's family, who return the male birds and retain the female. Betrothals are managed by agents or go-betweens, and the principals have little or nothing to say about it. The first thing to be done is to consult the horoscope of the young lady in order to compare it with that of the proposed husband, and if the indications are favorable and the preliminaries are happily arranged certain presents take place between the parties of such articles as have a symbolical meaning. If any unlucky accident happens during the three days allotted for final consideration, the negotiation is broken off. If they are all right, four large needles, with two red silk threads inserted into two of them, are usually thrust through the wedding cards. The red thread is supposed to represent that with which the feet of all mortals are tied in the spirit world—those who are doomed to be husband and wife by unalterable fate. A similar thread is used to tie together the cups out of which the two drink. When the bride and bridegroom meet for the first time it is not uncommon for the attendants of the bride to request the bridegroom to rub her feet, under the belief that it will prevent their aching in future. When the ceremony of marriage is performed rice is thrown over the pair as an omen of affluence and plenty in the coming years. This is much the same custom as that practiced by the Parsees, the ancient Persians, and in some of the countries of Europe the practice formerly prevailed of throwing baked cakes upon a newly-wedded pair, for the same purpose of invoking plenty for future years. When the Chinese bride is conveyed to her husband's abode, great care is taken that her feet are not permitted to touch the threshold of his house, and for this purpose red carpets are laid over it. She is also lifted out of the sedan chair over a pan of charcoal placed in the court, and afterward taken to her chamber. Three days after marriage she is allowed to pay a visit to her parents' abode; the bridegroom follows and is regaled with three cups of tea and three pipes of tobacco; there is a charm in the number three. The chair in which the young wife is conveyed has painted on it as a charm the image of a Tauist priest who, according to the legend, succeeds by his magical power in counteracting the influence of evil spirits who lie in wait on such occasions to harass and make ill the bride. It is customary for the bride to present the husband with a pair of shoes as an indication of her submission to him. These shoes are carefully preserved, and never given away like other worn-out articles.

The whims and superstitions with regard to the dead are very numerous. The mourning at funerals is kept up for three days, and is manifested by loud howlings, the beating of gongs, and the firing of crackers. These are used alike in demonstrations of joy and sorrow. If the mourning parties are able they can hire professional howlers to do the mourning for them, but it is imperative that it be kept up. When a man loses his father he closes out his business and secludes himself from the world for three years. This applies to the highest officials in the government as well as to those in common life. This observance often causes the greatest inconvenience. The dead are buried in their richest garments of silk, and the wealthy are often laid in their graves with as many as five jackets and three pairs of trousers. The corpse is bound with long strips of cloth, two of which must be white and one red. After thus swathing, the ends are tied in an "auspicious knot," and as many of these ominous knots are tied on various parts of the body as these strips will allow. White is the color used in mourning. If a cat or a dog by chance passes over a corpse it is a very bad omen, and the animal must be killed at once. If a pregnant animal of any kind passes over the corpse it is believed that the dead person will arise and pursue the living and strangle to death the first person he is able to catch. It is a common custom for two coins (cash) to be placed in the sleeve of the dead man and then tossed out to see what his state of feeling is. If both coins turn up obverse or reverse it is understood that the dead man is at peace; but if one comes up one way and the other differently something wrong has been done and the departed is not at rest. These coins are religiously preserved, and after the burial are used as a means of divination to learn the wishes of the dead man relative to his business affairs and family arrangements left behind. After the death of a person, if the windows are small a hole is made in the roof to allow the spirit an aperture large enough to take his departure. This usage is in keeping with a similar old custom in Scotland and the Scandinavian countries, where a like course was pursued. An extensive belief prevails in China that the spirit of the last person dying in a given locality is compelled to keep watch around the place of burial until another person dies and relieves him. So strong is this belief that they refuse to rescue a drowning man, or others meeting death by accidental causes, lest the last person who died and is keeping watch will thereby be wronged, and, in his indignation, will pursue the man giving aid and cause him serious injury. This absurd belief has its counterpart in Scotland, where it was formerly strongly claimed that the spirits of the dead had to keep watch in the same way; and when two persons died in a neighborhood on the same day there was often a great struggle on the part of the living to see which should be buried first and thereby be saved the unpleasant task of watching. The contests in many instances of this kind were so severe as to lead to blows. The Chinese entertain the belief that food, arms, clothing, and money furnished to the dead and buried with them can be used by them, and in this respect the superstitions of many other tribes and peoples fully agree; for instance, at the funeral of the red Indians horses and dogs are sacrificed for the use of the departed; a similar custom prevails among the Aztecs; camels were the funeral sacrifices of the Bedouins, and many tribes supply their dead with food of various kinds, placing the same upon their graves at certain times after interment.

The Chinese beat gongs and make other noises to frighten away the demons and evil spirits who are disposed to annoy the souls of the departed. On the sixtieth day after death the family place on a table a number of plates containing offerings of food, etc., accompanied by the never-absent incense. They also place on the table a washbowl full of water, in which is floating half a duck's egg. A duck made of bamboo and paper, on which is placed a paper image of a human being, is also put in the water. The image represents the dead, the duck his means of transport, and the shell a boat on which to cross the Chinese Styx. The Chinese theory of death is that it takes place in accordance with the reckoning of heaven, exercised through the power of the god or goddess controlling the special disease with which the person suffered. To this power, therefore, prayers and oblations are addressed, and if they prove unsuccessful the petitioners comfort themselves by regarding it as an unalterable decree of fate. In this respect their belief is not unlike that of Western nations. The Chinese have a great aversion to touching a dead body or disturbing in any way the graves of the dead, believing that thereby the spirits of the deceased are disturbed, in which case the dead will haunt them and cause them harm. Their term for the dead, or the state of the dead, is Fung-Shuey, and this they never wish to have disturbed. Seventeen years ago a short line of telegraph was suffered to be constructed by the English on Chinese soil, but the Celestials soon took up the idea that it disturbed the Fung-Shuey and it had to be removed. It was the same also with a few miles of railroad which was subsequently constructed; that was found to disturb the Fung-Shuey, and had to be taken up. In this way the great reverence which these people entertain for the dead often stands in the way of their progress and prosperity. But at present there are signs that their prejudices toward these modern improvements are giving way, and that they will ere long be introduced again in the country. The present prime minister of the empire is a progressive man, and is struggling hard against the prejudices of his countrymen to introduce some of the modern improvements of the West. He has been able to show to the government that the existence of the telegraph alone in the empire a few years ago when war was imminent with Russia would have saved the country fifty millions of dollars in preventing the needless transportation of troops, ammunitions, etc., to the northern frontier. The conveyance of intelligence by the antique modes of canals, etc., is quite too slow for these days, and the moving of forces and ammunitions to the north long after the need for them ceased, causes even the obtuse minds of these orientals to perceive it.

UNLUCKY DAYS.

Every seventh day with the Chinese is regarded as unlucky, and also as suited for silence and mourning. The number seven in this regard is thought to have arisen from the four changes of the moon, the same as in the observance of the same number among the Jews and other nations. The seventh, fourteenth, twenty-first, twenty-eighth, and thirty-fifth day after a person's death are specially observed for mourning ceremonies. The seventh day is the critical one in fevers; the seventh evening of the seventh month is the great worshiping time for women. As every seventh day is regarded as an unlucky day with the Chinese, so Christian nations seem to have adopted a similar idea that every Friday is an unlucky day, on which no enterprise must be undertaken, no journey begun, no building raised, no voyage commenced, and even no visits of courtship be made. The Chinese also divide the three hundred and sixty-five days of the year into sets of twelve days, each being under the supposed influence of a certain planet, a certain zodiacal sign, a certain terrestial element, and one of the twenty-eight "lunar mansions." In their almanacs the unlucky days are marked that all may know when not to commence important enterprises.

But New Year's day is exceptionally a lucky day, on which it is eminently proper to present religious offerings and vows to heaven, to put on full dress, fine caps, and elegant attire; at noontide on that day a person should sit with his face to the south; it is a most auspicious day to make matrimonial matches, pay calls, get married, set out on a journey, order new clothes, commence repairs to a house, to make contracts, collect accounts, etc. There is also an analogy in this respect between the Chinese and Western nations, who regard New Year's day in a similar light.

PORTENTS AND OMENS.

Upsetting an oil jar or spilling oil is regarded by the Chinese as an omen of ill-luck, in the same way that spilling salt is regarded among Western nations. The crow is a bird of evil omen, and the crowing of a hen is regarded with special horror, and the fowl is disposed of at once as soon as she evinces a disposition for crowing; but it was not the Chinese who got up the couplet "A whistling woman and crowing hen are neither fit for God or men." The Chinese regard comets and eclipses as harbingers of evil, and they say "the longer the comet's tail the greater the evil," thus showing that the principal danger lies in the tail. With regard to eclipses the popular belief is that the sun or moon is then being devoured by a huge dragon, and they resort to beating gongs and firing crackers to drive it away, but many other nations have entertained very similar notions.

The Chinese have great faith in dreams, and believe them to be instigated by gods or departed spirits. To dream of a bear is the sign that a son will be born; of a serpent, a daughter. To dream of a white mouse indicates buried treasure where the little animal is seen. They also have multitudes of other similar signs from dreams, but it is hardly likely that they have gotten up more dream books or had more distinguished dream interpreters than Western nations, including the Jews.

The superstitions about the influence of demons, and the means of driving them away, are almost without number. The bamboo, the peach, and the willow-tree are believed to possess special power in driving away demons. The dry bamboo, however, is supposed to attract devils, while a branch of the green tree is carried in the hand in funeral processions for the express purpose of driving away devils. The willow is also used to assist in raising spirits. The plum-tree is also believed to possess similar powers, as well as several plants. The articles used as charms to ward off demons and evil spirits are almost without number. Charms written on red and yellow paper are thought to possess peculiar efficacy. Pictures of the gods on paper are supposed to possess great power; these are pasted up over the doors, on the bed-posts, worn in the hair, and used in many other ways for the great influence they are supposed to possess. Amulets of the metals particularly, cash, and articles made from the same, are much worn to obviate the effects of evil spirits.

Spiritualism is strongly believed in among these people, and professional mediums—generally women—are enabled to make a good living in being employed in calling up the spirits of the dead, in visiting their places of abode, and communicating what they have to say. A magic pencil, made of the twig of a peach-tree, by certain incantations is made to write in the sand much as the planchette does among us. Chiromancy, or palmistry, or fortune-telling by the lines in the hand, is as much resorted to as among the Gypsies of Europe. The Spiritual mediumship spoken of, or rather the strong belief in it, has existed many centuries in China, and is consequently far older than with the Western nations The belief in ghosts and apparitions is very rife in this land of superstition. It has been said "China is full of ghosts." Scarcely a popular play is presented upon the stage of their theaters in which a ghost does not appear and play a conspicuous part to aid in righting the wronged or to punish the guilty. Their stories and tales also abound in ghosts and apparitions. The tales about the ghosts of murdered men and suicides are almost without number. Haunted houses are strongly believed in, and the most frightful stories are narrated about such ghostly appearances. They even believe that their gods or idols have ghosts, and walk about the streets of the city on certain occasions. They also believe in the ghosts of animals, and that they sometimes appear to the living from whom they have received cruel treatment. But with all this it is hardly possible for them to entertain more absurd and monstrous notions than have been indulged in in Christian countries.

There is scarcely a form of disease known in China that is not believed is often produced by the evil influence of demons and devils, and of course they have numerous formulas and rites for exorcising these evil beings, and thus rescue the afflicted from their evil control. In this respect they cannot be excelled by the most pious Christian exorcists, or perhaps even by the founder of Christianity himself, who was such an adept in casting out devils and finding them to be the cause of insanity and other diseases. The Chinese find that their sick men "have a devil" as often as those the most full of faith in other parts of the world. They also believe in witches, which sadly afflict poor mortals, and that these witches often enter into cats and foxes when not in human beings. But as absurd as these beliefs are they have not been so cruel as to put thousands, yes, hundreds of thousands and millions, of poor innocent persons to death because they were believed to be under the influence of witches, as has been the case in Christian countries.

As a natural consequence, being in the old line of credulity, these people believe strongly in elves, fairies, and brownies, many of which are little dwarfs in human shape, not more than a foot in hight, who have the power of making themselves visible or invisible at will, and who are simply playful in their character, or malignant, as the case may be. The tales and recitals of these singular little folk are very numerous and much like those which for centuries abounded in the northern countries of Europe. The Chinese fairies bear a striking resemblance to those of other countries; they usually appear to simple-minded people as extremely beautiful young women, who allure their victims across a fairy bridge over a mystical stream into fairy-land, where they are entertained in various curious ways; and when after a few days they express a desire to return home they are permitted to do so, when, to their great consternation, they find that seven generations have passed away in their absence and all their relatives are dead and forgotten. These tales, fully believed here, throw Rip Van Winkle and his nap of twenty years far in the shade.

Where faith and credulity are so abundant as in the Flowery Kingdom there is hardly any limit to this great Christian virtue. They most readily believe in the existence of dragons, monstrous serpents which live for many centuries and have the power to assume human shape when disposed to do so, which faith would do credit to those who believe in the existence of the unicorn and of St. George killing the dragon. The Chinese also have the orignal sea-serpent which occasionally finds its way over on our side of the globe; but here his great snakeship attains to much greater length, requiring a junk several days to sail the entire length of him. Thus it is to be seen that when the Chinese get up a sea-serpent he is a snake fully calculated to excite great marvel. Moses with his brazen serpent, Hercules with his hydra, Apollo with his python, Cadmus with his dragon, Sigurd with his Fafner can hardly equal the extraordinary size and length of the Chinese serpents and dragons. When a monstrosity is to be invented who shall say it shall not be of the most astonishing character? Perhaps one of these Chinese snake stories will be acceptible as a sample of what this people are capable of doing in this line:

"Hang-chow is a most beautiful place. The residences of princes and nobles are here, and beautiful flower gardens and ancient temples are squatted all over the place. Among these the garden of Prince Chow was pre-eminent for beauty; but Prince Chow had long been dead, and his beautiful garden was deserted by mankind. In it were altars, pavilions, and mountains, almost equaling in splendor the gardens of the imperial palace. Here there resided a huge black serpent, which had been in this place more than eight hundred years, and could also ascend into the clouds and take the human form. One day she saw a large white serpent coming towards the garden, and she strove to prevent the entrance of this white serpentine visitor. Her words were these: 'Whence comest thou to invade the privacy of my garden? Dost thou not fear my wrath?' The white serpent who had assumed the human form, as had the other, merely smiled and said: 'Don't talk about your power, but pay attention to what I am going to say. I am a powerful white serpent, come from the mountain cavern of the winds, where I have resided more than eighteen hundred years; but because I am not so powerful as I could wish I have determined to change my abode, wherefore you must let me take up my residence in this garden; besides this, why should we quarrel, being both spirits in the form of serpents?' But the black snake was not so easily pacified, and angrily exclaimed: 'This is my garden, and you are a spirit from some distant place; how then do you dare thus to deprive me of mine own? If, moreover, you think yourself more powerful than I am, let us contend together three times for the mastery.' The white serpent smiled slightly and said: 'It is no desire of mine that we should contend together, as I do not wish to injure one of my species; but since you so much wish it, I will contend with you, but on this condition only, that whoever shall be victorious in the strife shall be the mistress, and that the conquered one shall always act as slave.' The black snake, still angry, snatched a sword and cut at the white serpent, but she, drawing two swords, put them before her in the form of a cross. In a few minutes the superior talent of the white serpent became evident, for by muttering a powerful spell the sword was snatched from the hand of her adversary by some invisible means, and she was left defenseless. The black serpent at this was very much frightened, and, kneeling down, respectfully addressed the other, saying, 'Do not contend any longer; I acknowledge you as my superior, and am willing to serve you as your slave.' Matters being thus settled so satisfactorily, the mistress and the servant entered the garden together."

Perhaps I am not a good judge of snake prowess, but it seems to me this white female snake must be nearly equal to the noted snake of Eden which entered into the fruit business some six thousand years ago, which so completely frustrated the deep plans of his creator; though I am constrained to admit that the Eden snake had the greater powers of persuasion. But it must be confessed that these Chinese snakes are, all things considered, at least equal to the Jewish.

Mermaids are also believed in here, and numerous very plausible stories are told of the deeds of their men-fish. I saw in the Hong Kong museum a fine specimen of the mermaid, but whether like that imported by Barnum from Japan or some other country—the body of a fish with the head of a monkey sewed upon it—I am unable to say.

THE POWERS OF NATURE,

As in many other countries, are greatly revered in the celestial land, and are doubtless, here as elsewhere, the foundation for the belief in gods and demons which has so extensively prevailed. The sun, moon, and stars, thunder and lightning, wind, water, and fire, have either been personalized or believed to be under the control of special gods or demons. The moon enjoys a prominence in regard to the numerous traditions as believed of her inhabitants and powers. They also hav an old man of the moon, a moon goddess, a lunar frog, a toad, a hare, etc., and such myths have more or less resemblance to the legends existing in Europe and America, and handed down from our forefathers. The sun, though in a lesser degree, is the subject of similar beliefs. Planets and other stellar bodies are devoutly believed in, the stars, as among Western nations, the embodiment or homes of heroes or demons. So also with other cosmical phenomena; unable to comprehend the great truth that all these operations are brought about by great and unerring laws, the superstitious Chinese are easily induced to believe that the forces controlling them are personal gods and demons. According to their theory of cosmogony, man is intimately identified with the powers of nature, he being a miniature heaven and earth, that in order to be conversant with the science or civil government one must study celestial and terrestrial phenomena, some of which are regarded as being manipulated by good beings, but the far larger share by evil deities or demons.

The Chinese Old Man of the Moon, Yue-lao, is believed to hold in his hands the power of predestinating the marriage of mortals—so that marriages, if not, according to the native idea, exactly "made in heaven," are gotten up in the locality supposed to be between heaven and earth. He is supposed to tie together the future husband and wife with his invisible silken cord, which never parts so long as life exists. Thunder and lightning are regarded as manifestations of supernatural anger. Meteors are regarded with superstitious reverence, and the most absurb legends are entertained as to the supernatural power they have manifested. Mountains are believed to be the homes of divinities and demons. The god of one of the principal mountains regulates the punishments inflicted on sinners, both in this world and the next. Four other divinities are believed to preside over the other lofty mountains of the country. The typhoons and furious winds are supposed to be produced by powerful dragons flying through the air, sometimes called "bob-tailed" dragons. They have a rain-god who attends to sending showers with which the earth is blest. Earthquakes are believed to be the direct expressions of supernatural personages. Volcanoes are regarded in the same light. Waterspouts are held to be the result of fighting dragons who have their furious contests in the air. They have several legends giving accounts of their terrific engagements.

The miracles believed in in China are literally without numbers. It has been said that the Romish church is hung with miracles, and in the same way China is hung with legends of miracles. If it is a virtue to believe in supernatural occurrences the Chinese must be superlatively virtuous. But this excessive faith in miracles, portents, signs, omens, demons, dragons, evil spirits, brownies, and all the rest of the category of supernatural monstrosities, is a terrible curse upon this otherwise sensible and deserving people. They are to be commiserated for the onerous slavery under which they struggle in this respect. Hardly an hour passes in their lives but what they are subjected to some imaginary danger, the wrath of some exasperated demon, the effects of some evil genius, some foreboding portents and bad omens—enough, it would seem, to destroy all the pleasures of life. And still it is curious to note how these absurd notions and beliefs have their counterparts in the superstitions that have been cherished in Christian nations. Alike they have been slaves to the grossest superstitions and the most absurd fears.

CHINESE HISTORY

Is too voluminous—extending over more than five thousand years—to be attempted in a letter like this, and I will not inflict it upon you. I will simply remark that the history of this country has been divided into four periods—

1. The Mythical Era.
2. The Ancient Period, as distinguished from the first.
3. The Middle age.
4. The Modern Period.

The first extends far back into the dim past before real history existed. The first emperor in this era is said to be Pwan-koo, who was born when the heaven and the earth were still not separated. After five successive reigns came Fohi, who, as already observed, is credited with being the real founder of the Chinese empire, and with having instituted marriage, educated his subjects in making nets, building houses, domesticating animals, etc. He commenced the second dynasty, and was succeeded by Shinnung, who in turn was succeeded by Hwang-te, who introduced the art of writing; the first to build palaces and found cities.

What is called the ancient history of the country, as distinguished from the mythological period, began with the reign of Yu, 22 B C. He commenced a new dynasty, called Hea, which continued four hundred and thirty-eight years. Yu was a great prince, but his successors in the same dynasty did not greatly distinguish themselves. Next came in the Shang dynasty, which continued for six hundred and forty-four years. Two or three of the emperors of this dynasty were men of ability, the others only ordinary rulers. In this period, about 1562 B. C., the Tartars on the north began to annoy the Chinese by making inroads into the empire, and were repelled with great difficulty. About this time many emigrants left the country and settled in Japan.

About 1122 B. C. a rebellious noble, Woowany, founded the Chow dynasty, which continued eight hundred and sixty-seven years, during which time much trouble was experienced by rebellious petty chiefs and internal dissensions. About 1001 B. C. the Tartars again appeared on the frontier, and these inroads were kept up at intervals for several centuries. In the latter part of this dynasty, and at the time when the country was divided into several governments, Confucius was born, 552 B. C., and about 370 B. C. Mencius was born, who, as a teacher and philosopher, was only second to Confucius.

The Chow dynasty was overturned, and the Tsin succeeded, continuing forty-three years. The second emperor was one of the most vigorous that ever reigned in the country. He drove back the Huns, a branch of the Tartars, and built the Great Wall all along the northern frontier to keep them out. But he made himself infamous by waging a war against literature and learned men, and causing many thousand volumes of books to be burned. This dynasty was ended with him, and the Han dynasty inaugurated by Lew-pang, a captain of a troop of robbers, continued four hundred and twenty-two years. In the reign of Lew-pang the art of printing was discovered. The third in succession was Leu-how, the first female that ever reigned in China. She was a woman of talents, but noted for her cruelty. Her successors were weak, and the Huns again continued their depredations, and they had to be bought off with presents and blackmail; and not satisfied with money, these savage robbers demanded a tribute of maidens, and many females of the highest families had to be surrendered. In the reign of Woote, 140 to 88 B. C., another application for females was rejected with indignity, and a vigorous attack drove the Huns back, who were defeated in each subsequent attack. Woote showed himself a friend of learning. About 50 B. C. the Huns and other Tartar tribes up to the borders of the Caspian Sea, tired of fruitless struggles, submitted with one accord to the Chinese emperor, so that nominally the whole of Tartary became a part of the Chinese empire.

After this internal dissensions became abundant, and continual wars were carried on between the leaders of the various factions. This state of things allowed the Tartars to re-assert their independence and resume hostilities. But the new emperor, Kwang-woote, from the years 25 to 57 A. C. united the government and repulsed the Tartars. The last reigns of the dynasty were again replete with internal dissensions, and in the mean time the Tartars pressed continually on the frontiers, though, fortunately, the boldest of the tribes, the Huns, had turned their faces westward and toward the nations of Europe through the Alani and the Ostrogaths. The character of the Chinese nation is said to have been formed during the Chow and Han dynasties. Learning was revived; the invention of paper and printing gave great facilities in this direction. Provinces were added on the north, and consolidated in the government, which were ever after retained.

The middle age of Chinese history commences with the second Tsin dynasty, which began in 264 and continued one hundred and fifty-six years. This dynasty was more noted for internal dissensions, wars, bloodshed, and a chronic state of disaffection than for firm, good government. The Sung dynasty succeeded next, but not very much can be said in its praise. The last prince in the line was assassinated, when the Tse dynasty succeeded under Seaou-taouching, who was an excellent sovereign. A few able rulers were successors. About 620, during the Tang dynasty, China experienced much trouble from the Turks, who had originally operated under the Tartars at the foot of the Imans, as slaves occupied in digging iron, but having since asserted their independence, were allured by the luxuries of China to the desire of settling in it. They were, however, easily bought off with bribes, on receiving which they bent their course westward, where they established the Turkish dominions, which they still hold. But civil wars again cursed China, exhausting the energies of the country and bringing it to the verge of ruin. The emperors were imbecile. In 943, in the reign of Chuh-te, the Tartars again invaded China with a large army, and proclaimed an emperor of their own selection; but the succeeding sovereign drove the Tartars back. The second Sung dynasty which followed reigned for three hundred and nineteen years, commencing with 960, and the first prince did much toward subjugating and uniting the contentious provinces; but their deadly enemies, the Tartars, continued their harassing incursions. To drive them out the emperor Ningt-sung invited the assistance of the Mogul Tartars, who accomplished all that was wanted of them, but kept all their conquests to themselves, which laid the foundation of the Yuen or Mogul dynasty, by which the Sung dynasty was eventually overthrown.

We have seen, then, that the connection of China with the barbarians commenced in the sixteenth century before Christ, after which the inroads of these hordes continued at intervals for more than twenty-five hundred years. The Huns were the first, and they continued their depredations till they wandered Westward into Europe. The Tartars were equally merciless, and the result was the more peaceful Chinese were obliged to pay a large price for the quiet which their arms were hardly able to procure. Not only were very large sums of gold thus paid over, but, as observed, heavy instalments of fine silks and young, beautiful women. The Tartars were an ugly race, and their females unattractive, and they were consequently reserved for domestic labor, and their ugly lords were only too glad to obtain the more comely Chinese women for bosom companions. A supply of women for their beds was the customary tribute exacted by the barbarians, and a poem is still extant in which a beautiful Chinese princess is made to bewail the hard lot in being compelled to live in the tent with an ugly Tartar with only raw flesh and sour milk for food. Woote, of the Han dynasty, was the first to refuse this tribute, and his arms and his policy were both vigorously employed in backing his refusal with effect. But the demand was revived and acceded to after his time, and this accounts for the frequent depredations of the Tartars, and why they so often peacefully retired after obtaining the tribute they demanded.

The third race of invaders, the Turks, gave but limited trouble, for like the Huns they also went west after they had been bought off. The fourth were the Moguls, who were specially organized by Chingez Khan, to dilate in all directions—Batou Khan spreading desolation into Poland and Germany on the west, Halaku overrunning Persia, Palestine, and Armenia on the south, Sheibani penetrating into the frozen regions of Siberia, and Kublai Khan, the greatest of them all, taking possession of the Flowery Land. The ancestors of Chingez Khan had been tributaries to the Chinese emperors in respect to the lands they held in China after driving out the Tartars; even Chingez himself held a title of honor and servitude. But this did not prevent him from leading two distinct expeditions against the empire, the first of which was bought off by the surrender of the imperial princess and five hundred other maidens, and in the second of which he annexed the five northern provinces to his dominions. A few years later the whole of China was taken by Kublai Khan, the magnificence of whose court is recorded in the wondrous stories of the travels of Marco Polo. The seat of government was removed from Nanking to Peking, and Polo was employed in several missions of high trust in the interior of the empire. The dominion of Kublai was very extensive—more so than that of the British or Russians to-day, as it stretched from the Pacific Ocean to the Dneiper, and from the Frozen Sea to the Straits of Malacca. The conquered races submitted to him with willingness, because he was exceedingly humane in his treatment and relieved their needs with a most generous hand. In the midst of this greatness, however, the mutinous spirit of his own countrymen caused him the greatest trouble, and presaged the early fall of the Mogul dynasty. Nevertheless all the Mogul princes who sat on the throne of China, short as their tenure of office was, governed well—much better than the Chinese emperors themselves who had been in power immediately before them. Kublai restored the old Chinese constitution, and he, as well as his successors, submitted to the laws, the fashions, and even the prejudices of their subjects, to please them. They also restored letters, commerce, and justice; improved the face of the country by the excavation of canals, and did all they could to promote the general prosperity and strengthen the peace of the country. Unfortunately, in a short time, they themselves were enervated by luxury—usually fatal to indolent people—and they were the victims of the same vices as had been their predecessors. From living in tents, as had been the wont of their races, they adopted the customs of the Chinese and lived in houses, and indulged in all the pleasures of Chinese life; and becoming educated in the customs of the Chinese, they easily succumbed to them. Even the disciplined army which they brought with them was soon vitiated and made effeminate by the luxury, abundance, and sensuality all around them, and into which they readily plunged. The government of the emperor Tohwan-temur was easily overthrown in 1368, by Chooy-nen-Chung, the son of a poor laborer, who introduced the Ming dynasty. This first foreign yoke imposed on the Chinese was within a period of ninety years thus overturned. The Ming dynasty ruled with vigor for two hundred and seventy-six years, and the country was prosperous under its domination. But it was overthrown in its turn in 1644, the conquerors this time not being the Moguls but the Mant-Choo Tartars of the Tungoosian race, who were assisted by the Moguls. The Chinese have since been unable to free themselves from the Tartar power, and the present ruling dynasty in Tartar; and perhaps it is better so, for in this way the vast Tartar territory is permanently under the same government with China, and a state of general prosperity has prevailed in the vast domain.

A VISIT TO CANTON.

A trip to this ancient and strictly Chinese city was of course the first thing in order after looking over the city of Hong Kong. Canton is ninety miles from Hong Kong, and is reached by steamers running up the Canton or Pearl river. I selected the Han-Chow, a moderate-sized steamer, built in Hong Kong and owned by a Chinese company. For nearly forty miles the route lies among barren islands of rock and sterile clay like those around Hong Kong. There is nothing beautiful in the appearance of these islands, though their precipitous steeps and ragged and towering crests are picturesque. Very few inhabitants are living upon them, as they possess not soil enough to admit of cultivation. At the mouth of the river on either side are rather formidable-looking forts, which bothered the English somewhat when they tried to make the ascent of the river in 1842. The Chinese had stretched a heavy chain across the river a few feet below the surface, and when the English man-of-war ran against it at first they hardly knew what the matter was, and while they were thus delayed the guns from the forts were peppering them warmly. It was not long, however, before the English found out the nature of the obstruction and removed it, when there was little further difficulty in reaching Canton.

After the valley of the river proper is entered the signs of life and fertility are abundant. On either side is a rich plain, highly cultivated in rice and other crops, which look green and flourishing. Fruit trees are abundant, prominent among which are the Li-chu trees, which bear a red fruit nearly as large as a plum and in appearance somewhat like a strawberry; the natives make great use of them in preserves, etc. These trees are often seen set out in orchard style, and their reddish blossoms, which are now out in full array, present a lively appearance. Many peach-trees and fruit-trees are also seen all along on dry elevations. The low rice fields cover hundreds of acres, and they are larger and more extensive than I have before seen. The vegetation presents a different appearance from that of Java and Singapore. The banana-trees are plentiful enough, but the cocoanut and other palm-trees are scarcely seen. The vegetable growth is not so profuse and luxuriant as near the equator, we now being over twenty degrees from it. The temperature is also considerably lower, and the nights and mornings feel somewhat cool. This change is an agreeable one, for the tropical heat day and night for months becomes tiresome.

A range of hills from five to eight miles from the river runs along the valley and hems it in. Those on the right hand as we go up are the highest, and present a rocky, sterile appearance so general with the islands. This sterility, however, is made up by the luxuriance of the valley. The river is full of Chinese junks and smaller square-built sailing craft, with their crude bamboo sails and cross-ribs, like a bat's wing, and besides these there are thousands of sampans, some with sails, some without (the latter for local use), but nearly all having a crowning bamboo roof running fully half the length of the boat, making a secure shelter from rains, night air, and the burning sun. As a rule these boats are the homes of those who occupy them. Thousands of the celestials seem as busy as bees, rowing and sculling and manning the sails of these numerous boats, carrying produce to market, transferring goods, and going from place to place. Numerous steamers of various sizes are also plying this busy stream, some from Canton up the various branches emptying into it, some from Hong Kong and Macoa, a city of considerable consequence, located on the coast west of Hong Kong. Pearl River averages more than half a mile in width, and in several places the stream divides into two or more channels, and these. with the tributaries and the numerous canals which branch from it, make the region a well-watered country. When it is remembered that such an institution as roads, whether by rail or for carriages, is scarcely known in China, the multiplicity of boats to traverse the rivers and numerous canals can be well understood. The river has not the pearly, transparent appearance which its name would imply, but, like the Ganges, the Nile, and the Jordan, is as turbid as is the Ohio at high water. I have not since leaving home seen a river so clear and transparent as our glorious Hudson. I think the name of Pearl River was given to this fine Chinese stream from the oysters which exist in places in it, whose shells yield the highly-prized pearl. The river abounds in fish, and considerable quantities are taken alive in tanks to Hong Kong, though salt-water fish are very plentiful there.

PAGODAS.

The river scenery is diversified by a towering pagoda now and then standing on some elevated land not far from the river, and some of them two hundred feet in hight. They are usually octagonal—though sometimes round—and nine stories high, with a scolloped or turned-up roof between the stories. At a distance of five or ten miles they look like the hugh chimney of some manufacturing establishment, but, like the minarets of Mohammedan mosques, on a nearer approach they prove to be of no use save as monuments of superstition. The idea that pagodas are temples in which worship is performed is a mistaken one, for no kind of service takes place in them, neither can they be ascended like an ordinary tower. They are from ten to twenty feet in diameter at the base, and seem to be mainly solid, and for no purpose save to stand as sentinels for the use of the gods, the devils, or the dead, as the case may be. The superstitious Chinese have a belief that the Fung-Shuey—the spirit or repose of the dead—are at peace and rest when in a state of balance or equilibrium, and the great source of disturbance and untranquillity of the departed is caused by this balance being jostled or interferred with. The great office of the pagodas is to preserve this equilibrium and thus secure the continued quiet of the Fung-Shuey, as well as to have a favorable influence upon the gods or presiding spirits in the localities where the pagodas are built. It is a most sad thing with them to have the pagodas thrown down or disturbed, for thereby the Fung-Shuey are seriously annoyed. I am informed that some of these pagodas are sixteen hundred years old, and on the summits of two or three of them I saw what looked to be trees nearly twenty feet in hight, and the information I have is that they are the result of the seeds dropped there by birds and which took root in the moldered rock and material of which the pagoda is composed. It indeed looked singular to see trees of considerable size growing on such a tower two hundred feet from the earth.

Nearly half way to Canton is Whampoa, a town of several thousand inhabitants, but not looking much like a European or American city. The buildings are mainly one story in hight, and make no pretensions to architecture. The streets are narrow and not elegant. The English formerly had a military station here, but it has been abandoned several years. On the hillside in the vicintity are extensive Chinese cemeteries; and it is said that the Chinese assemble around the graves of the dead there in numbers amounting to fifty thousand. They believe that the tutelary gods of the locality on such occasions conduct back the spirits of the dead to their former homes and friends.

It requires something more than eight hours for the steamers to make the distance from Hong Kong, while something less suffices to return. As we neared the city the number of boats, large and small, greatly increased, and I observed that the pictures which are given of the appearance of Chinese craft are very correct. The wide, high-ended, square, clumsy-looking junks, with a railing more than a foot wide on each side to walk upon, look different from the craft of any other country.

We had no sooner cast anchor in the river opposite the center of the city than a score or two of smaller covered boats, already alluded to, were all around us, wishing to convey the passengers to the shore; and, what seems a novelty, the larger proportion of the watermen are women, and they are such plump, healthy-looking bodies that it does one good to look at them. A couple of young female Celestials applied their arts to me to induce me to take their boat to the Canton hotel, assuring me in very "pigeon English"—with the "English" far less conspicuous than the "pigeon"—that they had "goodee boatee," and only charged the moderate price of ten cents. I assured them they were the "gals" for my money, and one of them catching up my little parcel I followed them down the gangway, across two or three other boats, into their own snug and cleanly craft, and in less than two minutes, one at the oar in front and the other sculling aft, I was not long in reaching the landing of the only hotel in the city, claimed to contain two millions of people.

Canton is in north latitude 23° 7′, and extends for a distance of four miles along the northern side of Pearl River, a considerable suburb called Honan being on the opposite side.

THE POPULATION IN BOATS.

I am constrained to inform you that the women who largely manage these boats are neatly dressed in dark blue, brown, or deep purple pants and loose frock reaching to the knees, without belt around the waist, coming up high in the neck; the goods are glazed, catching little dirt, and they look as tidy as though clerks in ribbon stores; their long, full suits of glossy black hair are neatly combed and done up in good taste, with becoming puffs over the ears, and adjusted neatly at the back of the head. They have a fashion of making it project three or four inches from the head; the hair is gummed or waxed so it keeps its place without the slightest disarrangement, causing the wearer to look as neat as though just out of a band-box. It is quite interesting to see how expertly these women handle the oars, with what agility they step around, using the bamboo poles to prevent bumping against other boats and to give "a good send-off" when starting out. The boats are from fifteen to twenty feet in length, six feet wide, the prow usually wedge-shaped and the opposite end square. They have an arched roof ten or twelve feet in length, the same being made in sections so as to be drawn out when desired, or placed one over the other when but little roof is needed. The oars and poles have a place at the edge of the roof and it is amusing to see how deftly they are taken down, used, and returned to their places.

These boats are not operated by women exclusively, but many of them are; and there are no boats that has not one or more women. The boats are the homes of these people. Here they are born, here they grow up, here they pass their lives, and here they die when the voyage of life is over. Here they have their snug furnaces for cooking, their convenient places for keeping food, extra wearing apparel, and various utensils (not numerous), and everything as neat as though just out of the store. On several occasions I took the liberty of looking into these convenient receptacles, and was highly pleased to notice how cleanly and orderly everything appeared. The way the children are managed is interesting to observe; the youngest is fastened on the mother's back, somewhat like a papoose, and held in place by a wide bandage of cloth around its little body, where it quietly remains while the mother is pulling at the oar for dear life, the body swaying suddenly back and forth vigorously at the arduous task, and the little, quiet infants sweetly sleep while their heads look to be about to be snapped off by the mother's sudden motions; children somewhat larger are sitting near the ends of the boats, and are either tied fast for safety, or have a section of bamboo attached to them to prevent their sinking should they fall overboard. The dog and cat not unfrequently are also taken along, and in a few instances I saw chickens, likewise. The children of both sexes are put at the oar as soon as large enough, and it is very common to see both boys and girls not ten years of age tugging away at the oar. It is not unusual to see mother, daughter, and grand-daughter on the same boat, the two older acting as navigators, while the youngest is taking passage via "pig-back." Seeing such great numbers of these river boats, I inquired of a Chinaman, who could speak a little English, how many there were.

"Oh," said he, "there are millions of them." But he hardly realized how many millions imply, but there are ten or twenty thousand of them, I have not the slightest doubt; the floating population of Canton amounts to fully fifty thousand; the river is full for miles up and down, and the numerous slips and canals are swarming with them. There are also long streets of larger boats like barges which are permanently anchored and fastened together, with a walk in front. They are fully occupied, and do not leave their place at any time; they are constructed for residences only. The people who inhabit these boats are a class by themselves, and legend says their progenitors hundred of years ago were driven to the water, and their descendants have not since been allowed to live on land. It is said that many of them do not pass so much as three days on the land in an entire year, and that they seldom go ashore save to purchase needful supplies. I can testify to their pleasant dispositions and general behavior. I wish our American women were as healthy and robust as these Chinese sisters are.

I do not recommend any of you to make a journey to Canton for the sake of stopping at the Canton Hotel, but if it so happens that any of you do come I wish to speak favorably of this hotel, for it is better than might be looked for under the circumstances. It is kept by a Portuguese who has been in the country sixteen years.

SEEING THE CITY.

It were folly to think of seeing Canton without a guide, so the services of Ah Cum, a rather intelligent Chinaman, were secured, and chairs secured for himself, myself, and Mr. Clarke, who was in company with me in this exploring expedition. This was the first time during my journey that I had been conveyed much distance by human muscle, but in Canton this is the only mode of conveyance. The streets range in width from four feet to twelve, by far the greater number being nearer the smaller figure. Wheeled carriages are entirely out of the question. Here in this city of nearly two millions there is not a carriage of any kind, not even so much as a wheelbarrow or baby-wagon. All those who ride, all freight, including brick, stone, sand, dirt, and merchandise of all kinds, are carried on men's shoulders. I was on this notable day carried not less than fifteen miles in this manner. It seemed a little wrong to be thus transported, but there was no other way, and I had to submit, especially when there were scores of coolies clamorous for the chance of carrying me. The price of a chair and three coolies all day is one dollar and a half. I must speak in the highest terms

THE TRUTH SEEKER.

D. M. BENNETT, EDITOR.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY AT $3.00 PER YEAR.

The largest and cheapest Radical Journal published in Europe or America, containing seven hundred square inches more reading matter than any other journal of its kind.

NEW YORK SATURDAY, AUGUST 5, 1882.

Home Again.

DEAR READERS: It is with pleasure that I announce to you that I am home once more. I arrived here on Sunday morning, July 30th, just a year from the time I left home, there not being a variation of fifteen minutes from the exact year. I return in good health and spirits, no visible change having taken place, unless, as several friends insist, I am two or three years younger than when I took my departure twelve months ago.

If there is such a being as a Special Providence who supervises all the affairs of this world and takes good care, not only of those who remain at home, but those who travel in distant lands, then it must be he has kept watch over your humble servant, for I hav, with the exception of a couple of days of partial illness in the fore part of my tour, been remarkably well, though I hav wandered in different lands and climes and hav partaken of a great many kinds of food. I hav also been favored with almost interrupted good weather, enjoying twelve months of continuous summer, and hav not found it necessary to ever carry an umbrella.

I feel that there is considerable hard work in me yet, and I shall not flinch from letting it appear. I very cheerfully resume the old place in THE TRUTH SEEKER office, and will let you hear from me from time to time, as in days of yore.

You sent me around the world, possibly to see if I could not increase my faith in gods and devils, in which faith I was manifestly deficient; but I am unable to report that I hav, upon my return, any more faith in the supernatural and the impossible than I had on the day I left. So if you sent me to obtain an increase of godly or devilish faith, the mission has been a signal failure. I trust, however, that in other points of view, good results may grow out of the journey I hav just completed, and that you will not hav occasion to regret sending me away from home.

I return with renewed faith in the eternal powers and principles of nature, in the superiority of good lives, in acts of kindness toward our fellow-beings, and in efforts to spread the light of truth over the dark spots of the earth. I shall continue to do what lies in my power in this direction.

I hav, while on my thirty thousand miles of journeying, felt sustained by your sympathy and remembrance, and hav felt a constant desire to return to you, to again engage in the work of mental liberty and human progress. I gladly devote the remainder of my life to the dispensing the great truths I deem most essential to the human race.

I thank those who hav so kindly welcomed me to American soil. I hav been greatly flattered by those who hav traveled twenty-five, fifty, and one hundred miles to take me by the hand and to speak to me the words, "Welcome home." I beg those to pardon me who hav invited me to their homes to speak words of welcome to me, and whose invitations I found myself unable to accept, it being utterly impossible for me to visit all the towns to which I was invited. I hope at a not distant period to visit many places where I found it impossible to call, and to take my numerous friends by the hand. I will before that attend the Watkins meeting, where I hope to meet large numbers of truth seekers who are resolved to remain faithful to the cause of truth while life endures.

I am glad that THE TRUTH SEEKER has been so ably and satisfactorily conducted in my absence, and that its thousands of friends hav been loyal and true to it in their support. More than words of thanks are due to my faithful wife, who has remained at home during my long absence and every day applied herself to the interests of our cause. Eugene has done splendidly.

I did not wish during my first week at home to urge a word about money matters, but I cannot do less than say I feel sorry that so many allow themselvs to be in arrears for the paper we all so dearly love. In looking over the list I regret to see that great numbers hav been careless in this regard; and this has caused a stringency here at home which I will be glad to hav relieved. The expenses of THE TRUTH SEEKER alone are over three hundred dollars per week, which has to be paid in cash. The issuing of the fat volumes of Round-the-World travels, together with the illustrations they contain, is very expensiv, especially as the volumes contain each three or four hundred more pages than originally intended. The postage alone on the two volumes that hav now been issued amounts to over five hundred dollars. It can be understood that much money is needful to meet the numerous large bills.

Every patron of THE TRUTH SEEKER can easily see by noticing the tab upon the wrapper of his paper, when his subscription expired; and I earnestly wish that so many would not be willing to let six, nine, and twelve months pass away without renewing and paying their just indebtedness. Let me urge those who are thus in arrears to remit the amount they owe, reaching to the close of the present year. This act of justice will afford great relief in this office, and is only the right thing to be done. To those of you who are in arrears let me particularly request your attention to this little matter.

May we all liv to see many years of health, happiness, and usefulness. Sincerely yours, D. M. B.

The Kalamazoo Banquet.

ROCHESTER, N. Y. July 26, 282.

DEAR EUGENE: Upon returning to Kalamazoo from Jackson I found friends at the station waiting for me with a carriage. I was escorted to most comfortable quarters at the Kalamazoo House. The remainder of the day was occupied in attending to the calls of friends and in visiting them. My reception came off in the evening, William Shakespeare presiding. I will not take the time to detail the same, but instead will give you the report which the following morning appeared in the Kalamazoo Daily Gazette, the same having been written out by its editor, who was present:

Last evening a few friends of Mr D. M. Bennett, editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, tendered that gentleman, who is now upon his return to his home in New York, from his trip around the world, a complimentary banquet at the Kalam zoo House. The affair was impromptu and of a private nature, the suddenness of its conception and carrying out preventing the notifying of many who would hav been glad to be present.

The following gentlemen composed the party: N. Stearns, B. Bannister, William Shakespeare, L. C. West, John Galligan, H. M. Porter, C. B. Allen, L. G. Bragg, J. W. Fletcher, H. P. Kauffer, and J. C. Perkins. After an hour's pleasant conversation in the parlor, about half-past nine, an adjournment was had to the dining-room, where a splendid banquet was spread. In fact the affair was gotten up in a style never excelled in Kalamazoo, and stamps Mr. R. P. Emerson as the man for an emergency, the notice given him by the committee who had the matter in charge being very limited. The tables were spread in good style, the fruits, flowers, glass, and silverware being arranged in artistic combination.

The menu presented below was prepared by Mr. Thos. Collins, the eminent chef de cuisine of the Kalamazoo House:

Vanilla Ice Cream.
Apples, Peaches. Bananas,
Old Government Java Coffee.

After doing justice to the viands, the chairman of the affair, Mr. William Shakespeare, called the meeting to order and spoke as follows:

Gentlemen: We meet to-night, not to rejoice that we are better than other men; not to devise ways and means to make our fellow-men uncomfortable, either here or hereafter; not for the purpose of perpetuating any pet superstition that is intended to degrade and pauperize the human mind; and last, we are not here for the purpose of eulogizing or commending the bigotry of a New York or Delaware judge. But, gentlemen, we are here to honor one who has taught that all men are equal; that the greatest good we can do our fellow-man is to make him happy here, and trust the powers that be for his future happiness. We are here to honor one who has suffered for opinion's sake; who has been a martyr to Freethought. We are here to do honor to free speech and D. M. Bennett, 'our guest.'"

In response to the toast "Our Guest," Mr. L. C. West said:

"Mr. Chairman and Gentlemen: The names of men who hav suffered for opinion's sake are engraved in letters of blood upon the pages of history. As we read them, and thought dwells upon the awful deeds committed by fiendish man upon his helpless fellow, in the name of him who is represented as all kindness and goodness, a feeling of thankfulness envelops our hearts that the perpetrators of them are not of the present age, that their fetid bones are dissolving and commingling with the offal of the past. But, with this satisfying thought, we overlook the fact that a like spirit is rife to-day in this enlightened age, and in our own great land of boasted liberty, that acts alike censurable in their intent, if not by the same torturing means, can be committed in a free republic. Our honored guest with us here to-night has been, and is, a victim of the nineteenth century Christian inquisition. He has endured physical and financial sufferings for entertaining doubts and expressing opinions contrary to those taught by ignorant so-called prophets of the dark ages. Two years hav but elapsed since he was liberated from a garrisoned dungeon in the great state of New York, in which he was plunged by a horde of blind fanatics, because in his search for truth he had ventured to ask of the gods a few plain questions they could not answer. We delight in honoring our guest because by his sufferings the pathway of other thinking minds is made lighter and less dangerous, because he with an indomitable will and a patience surpassing that of characters in fabled history has hewn a broad highway through the flinty rock of superstition, and by the light of his pure life and the power of his pen has frightened away the bears hiding in the dark treacherous passes, so that any man may walk therein with greater safety, whether he goes shouting glory! glory! or walks quietly along inhaling the beauty and fragrance of nature's grandeur about him; and that his prattling grandchildren may follow along the way and frolic and laugh if they will, without meeting with quite so terrible a fate as the innocent ones of sacred story. When I think of our present freedom compared with that of the past, that every mind may launch an exploring bark out upon the prolific sea of thought, and impart to earth whatever products their researches may find, without danger of hanging to the gibbet or burning at the stake, I feel like pronouncing with sublime reverence the name Thomas Paine; and as we come down the scale of years and ponder over our own experiences, and think of the opprobrium cast upon men for daring to differ from the long established views of others, we exclaim with honest gratitude and pride, Bennett, Ingersoll, Chainey, and the lamented Emerson. To these distinguished and talented men our greatest praise is due, for by their deeds and words they hav so revolutionized public sentiment that it is now almost respectable for thinking minds to be known as such among men.

"May the days of those among them now living be many and prosperous, and their last long sleep peaceful and happy."

Mr. Bennett being called upon responded very happily, saying that he felt deeply the honor which was bestowed upon him, and related in a running manner many of the things concerning the religions of the Orient, which had impressed him in his travels, dwelling particularly upon the evidences that he found, of all the ideas and usages of the Christian church existing in those countries a thousand years before the coming of Christ.

He also related the causes which led to his arrest and imprisonment about three years ago at the instigation of Anthony Comstock. The gentleman was listened to with great attention. He is a pleasant speaker, evincing in his speech a cultured mind, to which had been added the experience of extensiv travel.

In response to "Freethought," H. M. Porter spoke as follows:

"Gentlemen: Keeping pace with time, intellectual culture, knowledge, and moral worth advance with the freedom of thought The new truths of one age become the superstitions of the next. The regal garments with which the fathers clothe the cherished idols of their hearts are by their children trailed in foulest mire. Knowledge meets the hosts of error intrenched behind the bulwarks of ignorance and superstition, and slays it with a single stone. Credulity falls in a combat with faith, and faith is fast crumbling before the searching onslaught of reason and science. The hell paved with infants' skulls has already become a green and grassy dell where the hand of tenderness and love can gather flowers. All honor then to the noble men and brave reformers of both ancient and modern times who hav counted as naught honor, reputation, and life, who unflinchingly hav drunk the poisoned cup, endured the cross, braved the tortures of inquisition, welcomed the fagot, and who through hard toil and hard fare hav braved the living martyrdom of the modern Christian penitentiary, that kingcraft, priestcraft, ignorance, and superstition might be banished from the world and their places filled by the living light of science, virtue, and mental freedom."

After the close of the remarks the party adjourned once more to the parlor, and spent a short time in that pleasant converse which comes with other post-prandial good things.

Mr. Bennett leaves this morning for Rochester, and expects to be in New York city on Sunday, so that he will hav been absent on his trip around the world exactly one year.

I will add that the principal professions were represented by those who thus honored me, and that the eatables were all that could be asked for; the folly of introducing the use of wine or spirits on the occasion was not committed, and the evening was extremely enjoyable.

I came on here without stopping, save a few hours at Niagara Falls, to view once more that grandest of all cataracts in the world, and which I had not visited for more than thirty years.

My reception here takes place to morrow afternoon and evening. On Sunday morning I will reach home, making exactly a year from the time I sailed on my Round-the-World journey. D. M. B.

Reception at Rochester.

The honors done me at Rochester were three-fold, and most satisfactory to me. Meetings were held, July 27th, in the Odd Fellows' Temple on Main street at 3 and 8 P M. At the last named every seat was filled. Both meetings were presided over by D. C. Farlin, M. D. Effectiv and excellent speeches were made by Mrs. Amelia H. Colby, Jay Chaapel, Prof. A. L. Rawson, Dr. D. C. Farlin, and others. Mrs. Olive K. Smith sang "Beautiful Hills" in exquisit style. I made some remarks at both meetings.

On the following day, pursuant to an invitation from my sister, Mrs. L. A. Allen, nearly a hundred friends of mine met at the "Sea Breeze," a popular place of summer resort on the shore of Lake Ontario, seven miles from Rochester. Here an excellent dinner was partaken of, a meeting was held in a neighboring grove, where more speechifying was done, after which a pleasant steamboat ride up Irondequoit Bay was enjoyed, interspersed with several beautiful songs by Mrs. Olive K. Smith and Mrs. David Cosad, accompanied by the piano. The exercises of the day were closed with a dance at the "Sea Breeze." The whole day was highly pleasant and enjoyable.

A more full account, with a report of these meetings and speeches, will be given in due course where it belongs in the history of the journey across the continent. D. M. B.

THERE is neither space nor time in this issue to giv an account of the Reception Banquet given to the returned editor of this paper on Thursday evening, the 3d inst. A report of the same will appear in our next.

The Slade Exposure.

I cannot regard the article from the Belleville, Ontario, Daily Intelligencer as strictly fair, nor does it attempt to explain the phenomenon of independent slate writing, which is the most peculiar manifestation that takes place in the presence of Mr. Slade. Some allusions to Slade are also made in the article entirely foreign to the subject, and which seem to be prompted by a spirit of decided unfriendliness.

I will briefly repeat here what I hav published in full before, that I hav visited Mr. Slade and hav, in his presence, witnessed phenomena which I was positiv were not the result of fraud or trickery. Writing has taken place on a slate while held in my own hand, and when no other person touched it. I distinctly heard the writing while being done, and felt the vibration produced by it. A message was also written on the same slate while lying upon the table before my eyes and with no one touching it. I looked at the slate closely before the writing took place and found it entirely clean. I heard the pencil moving and immediately took up the slate and saw the message that had been written on the under side of it. This was in broad daylight and without the slightest chance for fraud or collusion. My coat was several times visibly moved. I was partially lifted, chair and all. A marble-topped center-table was whirled around when no one was within ten feet of it, and a large easy-chair was also whirled and thrown to the floor. A heavy fall-leafed table rose twelve inches from the floor by three of us placing our hands upon the top of it, after which it slowly and smoothly revolved in the air and resumed its place upon the floor. I subsequently placed myself upon the table, and with the hands of Slade and my friend upon the table, I was lifted twice from the floor, table and all.

I do not say these phenomena were performed by spirits, but that intelligence was connected with them, and that they were performed by a power which I do not understand, and which the Intelligencer account of the movement of Slade's foot and cane by no means explains. While I cannot say that Slade was guilty of no dishonesty in Belleville, I am sure there was no trickery on his part in my interviews with him. I feel that simple justice demands me to say this much.

In addition I will call attention to the hundreds of other reliable persons who hav witnessed the Slade phenomena, including the writing on slates while held in their own hands, upon their arms, shoulders, or heads, and on the inside of slates firmly secured together. I hav heard many truthful persons relate these truthful experiences, and among them may be mentioned the learned German Professor Zollner, who perhaps, may be regarded as astute as the Belleville critics.

JUST received from Burnz & Co., 21 Clinton place, New York, "Pro and Con of Spelling Reform," an address delivered before the Ohio State Teachers' Association, by Prof. O. E. Vaile, of Cincinnati. This is a thorough and masterly dissertation on the proposed revision of English orthography, and should be carefully read by parents and teachers, and all interested in popular education. Price, 10 cts.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM, the eloquent ex-minister, of New York city, will deliver two lectures at the Watkins Freethinkers' Convention, one entitled "The Supreme Thing," the other "The Spirit of Humanity in American Poetry." Judge C. B. Waite, of Chicago, the author of "The History of the Christian Religion," will lecture on "The Orthodox Scheme of Salvation."

Borrowing Thunder.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Circumstances having rendered it advisable on me temporarily to suspend (that is, for a few weeks) the publication of my paper, This World, I should be obliged if you will allow me to address a few words to American Secularists through the medium of THE TRUTH SEEKER. The subject upon which I write is not, perhaps, of great importance; of that, however, I will let your readers judge for themselvs.

I believe that—among the American Freethinkers at least—my opinions respecting the Free Religious Association, its "platform" and "system," are tolerably well known. Of one thing I am certain, namely, that I hav pretty openly avowed those opinions, and hav freely expressed my thorough conviction that the thing called "Free Religion" is little, if anything, more than a feeble attempt to impart vitality to the ashes of superstitions which the majority of Freethinkers hav repudiated for ever. In one characteristic feature the leaders of Free Religion closely resemble those more orthodox religionists, by whom they are held in derision, as being "neither fish, flesh, nor good red herring," and that is in their intolerance, conceit, and dislike of adverse criticism. An amusing, a most amusing, example of this may be seen in the Index of July 6th, in an article signed "B. F. Underwood." I hav somewhere read of one of the semi-savages who fought against Troy that he was seen at his best when shooting his arrows from behind another warrior's buckler. Something like this is the case with Mr. Underwood when he avails himself of the congenial cover of the Catholic Review to make a sly attack on myself. I am delighted to know that the Catholic Review abuses me as only a rigidly orthodox paper can abuse, and to find myself termed a "vile imitator" of Ingersoll, and accused of witless blasphemy, uncultured vulgarity, and talentless audacity.

All this is right enough from the Catholic Review. As I myself do not fight Christianity with rose-water nor shoot at it with a child's pop gun, neither do I expect Christians to abstain from their favorit weapons of calumny and vituperation in their allusions to me and my work. If they praised and soft-sawdered the lecturer of Paine Hall there would be serious grounds for a strict self-examination on my part; since, however, they abuse me, I know that I am doing my appointed work in some degree as it ought to be done.

Mr. Underwood, however, pretends to be really anxious that the Roman Catholics of this country should learn to draw certain distinctions. His cultured heart (they cultivate the heart in the F. R A., some critics aver, at the expense of the brain, but let that pass) would be deeply pained that "an ignorant, vulgar fellow" (myself) should be taken "as the last development of Freethought and as an illustration of the natural result of a movement inaugurated by scholarly and pure-minded men," etc. Without troubling you with many extracts from Mr. Underwood's fearfully long-winded sentences, I I will ask leave to assure both Catholics and non-Catholics that I heartily desire never to be mistaken for a Free Religionist. Though not particularly fond of sectarian names, which only tend to accentuate our divisions, I would, if a name were necessary, call myself a Secularist. This designation has now become recognized in Europe, where the meaning attached to it covers the whole position I occupy as a public teacher. For me, and for those who think as I do, "Free Religion" is a paradoxical term, inasmuch as what is universally called "religion" cannot be free, because it is the enslaving, voluntary or involuntary, of the human mind to its own fancy-created figments.

Putting aside Mr. Underwood's reference to "scholarly and pure-minded men" (he being assuredly no competent judge of what the world terms scholarship), I would point out that the names he uses (some being illustrious, others not so) are scarcely those of the leaders of Freethought in any part of the world. Like other smatterers and reechoers, Mr. Underwood livs in a very limited intellectual horizon. With all respect to the memory of the naturalist Darwin, he was notoriously a mental reservationist, as he himself confesses in his "Descent of Man." However respectable his motivs, advanced Freethinkers will allow that all mental reservation is injurious to mental liberty and favorable to superstition. I am, according to Mr. Underwood, "but a recent convert from theology, the spirit of which still clings to me." I am glad to know that I am a convert, that I hav really and truly and completely turned away from the old prison-house. In this respect I differ from the leaders of Free Religion; I am not like Lot's wife, walking backward, casting regretful, longing eyes to the old city of corruption I once dwelt in. In the name of the Freethinkers of the world I indignantly repudiate the notion that any half-way house exists between religion and irreligion. Having rejected the theology of Christianity, I refuse to create another imaginary deity and profess to make it the guide and director of my life. I believe that the surest of all ways to retard the progress of humanity is to cling in the slightest degree to the terminology and the methods of Christianity. I believe that Christianity, the religion of the man Jesus, was founded upon imposture—the imposture of a disturbed imagination—and I absolutely refuse to use the names of God and Christ as though the former were aught but a term for an unknown entity or nonentity, or the latter aught but a fanciful title for one who was nothing more than a well-meaning maniac. This, Mr. Editor, may sound to Mr. Underwood like the spirit of theology, but I think your readers will scarcely so consider it.

In conclusion, let me add that I am not intolerant by nature—quite the reverse. Let any Free Religionist who likes attack my views fairly and squarely and I shall read what he writes with attention and respect. I hav nothing, however, but profound contempt for that method of controversy which Mr. Underwood has adopted, namely, that of taking up another person's mud balls to throw at me in the hope that some of them will stick. Personally I am not desirous of combat, nor do I care much for any attacks made upon me, but I do feel that it is my imperativ duty to defend the cause I advocate when it is misrepresented and maligned. That cause has been advocated by Voltaire, Toland, Paine, Collins, and a host of others, each and all of whom were ages in advance of the half-way house of Free Religion, and whose names will shine resplendent when such "scholars" and intellectualities as Mr. B. F. Underwood shall hav faded into utter oblivion.

Yours respectfully, G. CHAINEY.

A Letter from London.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: "Now comes the tug of war." A declared enemy of Charles Bradlaugh, and consequently a most fervent Christian, one who is reported to get his living by company-mongering (not a very reputable occupation, but profitable), and known as Sir Henry Tyler, M. P., has, with the approbation of the public prosecutor, issued summonses against the proprietor, editor, and printer of the Freethinker for publishing "a blasphemous libel" in that paper. The case came on for hearing before the Lord Mayor on Wednesday, and, after much discussion, was adjourned till Monday next. The solicitor for the prosecution stated his intention of applying for a summons against C. Bradlaugh as tenant of the publishing office. How the affair will terminate it is impossible to say, but there will doubtless be a good fight. It will be watched with great interest by all, more particularly by Freethinkers.

It is nothing in favor of the orthodox party that in such prosecutions as these they always work with remarkably dirty tools, and there are always plenty of disreputable scoundrels, prominent champions of the faith, who can be found ready, for a consideration, to appear as principals.

This Tyler has made himself conspicuous on several occasions in the House of Commons by asking the secretary of the education department if he could not prevent Dr. Aveling, Mrs. Besant, and the Misses Bradlaugh from teaching science to public classes, and, failing to get his way, he has altered his tactics and will find a more pliable individual in the Lord Mayor of London, who is a pious man, and consequently a stanch upholder of all the corruptions existing in the city of London.

As I told you in a previous letter, the godly folks hav been starting a lot of papers to prove that their religion is the only true one, and as they hav foolishly been trying to prove their case by argument, the natural result is that they hav ignominiously failed, and several of the papers hav come to grief for want of subscribers, and therefore, as they cannot make any headway by argument, persuasion, or ridiculing Freethought, they hav had to fall back on brute force and hav dragged forth from obscurity an almost obsolete act of Parliament to serve their purpose. How they must gnash their teeth when they reflect that they cannot now burn or torture their opponents, and doubtless regret that the days of the Plantagenets and Stuarts are gone to return no more. It is a great pity that all the disbelievers in Christianity do not openly avow themselvs; they would be an overwhelming body.

The chief swindler in that gigantic fraud, the Salvation Army, has appealed to the British public for the sum of £16,750 to enable him to buy the lease of the Grecian Theater, and seems to be well assured he will get it. The Archbishop of Canterbury started the list with £5. The queen was appealed to, but only sent them her blessing. Last month they held an all-night meeting, the doors being closed from 11 P. M. till 5 next morning. As ticket holders only were admitted, and no report was given as to what the proceedings were, we can only conclude it was a repetition of the orgies of the early Christians. These Salvationists are certainly a bright lot; young girls are induced to leave their homes to join them, several suicides hav taken place amongst the members, and many of them thieve everything they can lay their hands on. In fact, they are so often before the magistrates that a column is set apart in the organ of the army to repudiate all the members who get convicted. Whenever one of these rogues happens to get caught and punished it is at once stated that he never had anything to do with the cause. If you join the army, the only sin you can commit is the one of being found out in any act of rascality.

One of the chief men belonging to the Christian Evidence Society having lately died, a public appeal has been made for money to support his family. Clearly his friends do not believe that "the Lord will provide;" in fact, you never do find a professed Christian who is willing to trust anything to the Lord he is always bragging about as being such a great friend to all his worshipers. None of them in their hearts really believe that there is such a person or thing, or they would giv him a chance to see what he could do. In truth you may put them down as "whited sepulchers." Yours fraternally, J. D.

HOW TO GET THERE FROM BOSTON.

Inquire at Fitchburg Railroad depot, 250 Washington street, for excursion tickets No. 83, to Watkins Glen. Price, $18.25 for the round trip. You go by Fitchburg Railroad to North Adams, then by Troy and Boston Railroad to Troy, then by N. Y. Central and Hudson River Railroad to Geneva, thence by Seneca Lake steamer to Watkins. Return by the same route. This is the best arrangement up to the present time. If any better is made I will notify New England people through the Liberal papers.

EXCURSION TICKETS.

Excursion tickets can be procured at every station on the Pennsylvania Railroad, the Philadelphia and Erie Railroad, and the Northern Central Railroad, also on the Lake Shore and Michigan Southern Railroad; but in most cases it is cheaper for our Western friends to get excursion tickets in the first instance to Chautauqua Lake. In all of the above cases, excepting Chautauqua Lake, an order from me is needed. The N. Y. Lake Erie and W. R. will sell excursion tickets from all principal depots without orders from me.

THE BENNETT DINNER AT WATKINS.—THE WIDOW'S MITE.

At Forestville, N. Y., there is a fine old widow lady, who has for many years been a stanch Infidel. To-day's mail brought me the following letter from her, with $1 inclosed:

"Friend Green: I send you $1 toward getting up the Watkins dinner for our old friend, Bennett. We ought to hold a day of rejoicing that our old Infidel friend has got back all right. I hope every Liberal will do the same.

"Truly yours, MRS. S. W. BENNETT."

I hav put it down in my book as the "widow's mite."

HUNDREDS of Liberals will be pleased to know that Mr, and Mrs. G. H. Walser, of Liberal, Missouri, will be at the Freethinkers' Convention. Many will go to Watkins to make their acquaintance. He comes to Watkins in the interests of the National Liberal Orphan Home.

FOR the benefit of the Liberals in the northern part of the state, please say that during the Convention the Seneca Lake Steam Navigation Company will make special rates of $1 for round trip from Geneva and Watkins and return, and will run a special boat on Sunday. H. L. GREEN.

of the three faithful fellows—two before me and one behind—who carried me that day. They walked along briskly all day and acted as though one hundred and seventy-five pounds was not much of a burden. The chairs are of the kind used in Hong Kong—neatly constructed of bamboo, with a slim pole on each side, one resting on each shoulder of the coolie. The second one in front has a strap across his shoulders. The poles spring a little, so that the riding is easy and pleasant. The coolies in passing through the narrow and crowded streets keep up a constant shouting to those in the way to stand aside, and in streets but four feet wide it can easily be understood there must be necessarily some jostling. When carriers are met with other chairs or commodities the passage is not easily made; and turning corners in such narrow streets can only be effected with great care; in many places it was "a rub and a go."

Such riding in such streets was a decided novelty, and I saw more on that busy day than I will be able to describe to you. I passed thousands of stores, supplied with Chinese merchandise of all kinds, and numerous mechanic and artisan shops where all sorts of wares were being manufactured. The stores invariably present a very neat appearance, ranging from fifteen to twenty-five feet in width, with an average of thirty feet in depth, with often a rear room about the same size. A majority are one tall story in hight, with a skylight in the roof, giving the stores a cheerful appearance. A portion are two stories in hight. We were shown into several large-sized rooms on the second floor, where rich goods are kept.

One can hardly realize that these narrow passages are streets in a great city; they seem more like contracted passages in an immense house, for to considerable extent they are partially covered in with boards or other obstruction to the sun's rays. The long perpendicular signs in vermilion, gold, and black, hanging at the entrances, covered with huge Chinese characters, with large-sized paper lanterns and globes, with the tinsel and glitter inside, give the streets a decided "celestial" appearance. They are mostly found with neatly-cut blocks of granite, twelve or fifteen inches wide, and long enough to reach across the majority of the streets, presenting a smooth surface to the bare or sandaled feet of the thousands of pedestrians who perambulate them. The sewers of the city are on the surface, and immediately under this pavement, and not subterranean as in our large cities. As a consequence, I noticed in a few instances odors arose which were not the sweetest perfume, but as a rule the streets are very clean, and with but few offensive smells. The streets have gates which are closed at ten or eleven o'clock at night, so there is little chance for passing from street to street; to obtain passage through the gates the assistance of a policeman has to be called into requisition. So great is the industry of this people that thousands of mechanics and artisans work till past midnight.

The variety of avocations pursued in this vast beehive is very great, as must be well understood. Here in some of the finer streets are dealers in silks, which is a special manufacture in Canton, jewelry in great variety, fine embroidery on silk, paintings on paper and canvas, metal wares of all kinds, woodwork, cabinet ware, leather goods, and ornamental work of all kinds. Artisan's shops abound in great numbers and variety. I saw the richest figured silks being wove, the finest jewelry being manufactured, figures and ornaments in jade-stone being cut. I can hardly remember all the goods sold in the stores and made in the workshops, but in addition will mention the lacquer ware, ivory, carved and worked in all shapes and devices, grasscloth goods, clothing, tea, tobacco, porcelain and chinaware, shoes, furniture, tinsel ornaments for temples and altars, bronzes, cornelian and other precious stones, silk edgings and laces, damask goods, buttons, fans of various material, tortoise-shell goods, silver ornaments, trunks of various materials, glassware and rock crystal, confectionaries, bake-shops, restaurants, markets, etc. But everything is done by hand. Though I visited scores of artisan-shops, and looked into hundreds of others, I saw not a steam engine, not a horse-power, but everything being done by muscle power, including planing and cutting brass, iron, etc. The Chinese must be credited with being excellent workmen and with performing with great skill the multiform arts they prosecute.

Of course the names of the merchants, the kinds of goods they sell, and the names of the streets are all in the mysterious Chinese characters, which to western people are as silent as the sphinx, but when interpreted they are found replete with "celestial" conceptions of beauty and blessing. Thus Canton boasts of its Peace street, Bright Cloud street, Street of Benevolence and Love, Longevity street, Street of Heavenly Peace, Street of Early Bestowed Blessings, Street of Everlasting Love (what a lovely street!), Street of the Ascending Dragon, Street of the Saluting Dragons, Street of the Reposing Dragons (I had rather give the dragons a wide berth), Market of Golden Profits (the purchaser might possibly fear from this name that the profits might be too large), Gate of Virtue, Street of One Hundred Grandsons, Street of One Thousand Grandsons (an abundance of small children might reasonably be expected in these streets), Street of a Thousandfold Peace (what a very happy street!), Street of Refreshing Breezes, Street of Five Happinesses (reasonable people should hardly ask for more), Street of a Thousand Beatitudes (none but a celestial could endure so many), Street of Ninefold Brightness (rather hard, perhaps, on the eyes), Street of Accumulated Blessings (who would not like to live on such a street?), Street of Continual Delight (there should not be a vacant room in that street). Take it all in all it would seem that to be a citizen of Canton ought to be next thing to a residence in an orthodox heaven, were bowing, wearing golden crowns, psalm-singing, and harp-playing are so extensively indulged in.

Nearly all the stores and place of manufacture have rooms in the rear for residences, so that their homes are convenient to business. The more wealthy merchants, however, have homes in the more fashionable portions of the city, where they have fine entrances, grand courts, servants in livery, and all that sort of thing. In most of the stores a teapot full of tea is kept warm by padded cushions, and customers are welcome to a cup of tea ("cha"), and a delicate little China cup stands ready for him. The teapot has to be replenished several times through the day.

A CHINESE GRISTMILL.

Among the places visited early in the day was a flouring mill, with twelve run of stones, which is a novelty in its way. The stones are not run by water nor steam, but by ox-power. The twelve run of stones are in a line, and to each upper stone is attached a lever some eight feet in length; to each lever an ox is hitched, and round and round he tramps in a circle twelve or fifteen feet in diameter. The eyes of the oxen are covered with pads, so they can see nothing, and to each one is attached, under the belly, by straps, a receptacle holding about a gallon to catch such fluids as the oxen may be disposed to void while "swinging round the circle." This provision is made in the interest of cleanliness. The oxen apply themselves patiently to their monotonous toil, requiring little urging or attention, and are changed every four hours. The rotation of the stones is so slow that no curbs or covering are required, and the flour is seen slowly making its egress from the circumference of the stones as the ox pursues his winding way. But one run of stones in one of our large flouring mills would turn out more flour in a given number of hours than fifty of these ox-mills can accomplish. It is the duty of one or two Chinamen to do the sifting and bolting. The first is done by a double treadle, with a foot on each; and by throwing his weight first on one foot and then the other the sieve is made to work back and forth. The fine bolting is done on a plan similar to our own, the bolt being turned by hand. The entire operations seemed very primitive compared with our flouring mills. One or two men were dressing stones (four feet in diameter), using a steel chisel and hammer in place of the pick used by our millers. The stones are a kind of burr, somewhat like ours. The wheat ground here is grown further north in the country, and is of good quality. The bread made here is very fair.

I saw numerous shops where rice was being divested of its outer hull by its being pounded with a heavy wooden hammer in a large wooden mortar. The hammer is raised by a Chinaman stepping on the end of the lever to which the hammer is attached; bearings being nearer the end he stepped on than to the hammer. The weight of the man raised the hammer to its proper altitude, when he takes off his weight and lets it fall. This is repeated thousands of times in a day. Half a dozen or more are following suit in the same room, and there are numerous shops of the same kind. The men are naked, except a very slight covering of the privates.

I visited early in our circuit a splendid Chinese club-room, a large building, divided into rooms, and the whole richly decorated with vermilion, gold, carving, images, etc. Refreshment rooms were attached, and the appearances warranted the belief that the celestials have a good time there. I am sure there is nothing like it in America.

THE TEMPLES AND THE GODS.

Canton has not nearly so many temples as Benares, though it has one hundred and twenty-five or more. I shall not undertake to describe all of them to you, and for two reasons: 1. I did not visit them all; and, 2. I don't think you would care to hear about so many, had I seen them all. I must, however, tell you about some of them. The first one visited was the Buddhistic Temple of Five Hundred Genii or Saints, so called from the gilded life-sized statues it contains of the five hundred very holy saints and followers of Buddha, whose virtue was so great that they could perform almost any miracles they pleased. The temple, monastery, courts, etc., cover three acres, and is one of the most distinguished and wealthiest in the city. It was erected in 503 and rebuilt in 1855.

Inside the gate are immense statues of four sentinels, or gate-keepers, whose business is supposed to be to guard the entrance. In the first pavilion are three large gilt figures of Buddha. In the second is a marble dagoba in the form of a pagoda, with seven stories, in each story of which is a statuette of Buddha. This graceful construction is designed to represent the seven heavens of happiness into which faithful Buddhists are to be admitted when the struggles of life are over, particularly those not fortunate enough to attain to Nirvana. Under this dagoba some relic of Buddha is supposed to be deposited.

In the third shrine is represented sitting on a lotus throne, an avatar or incarnation of the Goddess of Mercy. Passing through a neat court, the grand hall is entered where the five hundred saints are seated upon an elevation of some five feet. The worthy desciples of Buddha are said to have numbered over eight hundred, but these five hundred are those who took up their residence in the monastery which was situated on the side of a mountain called Tin-Toi-Shan. The hall in which these noted saints are seated is arranged in aisles, with a row of the saints on each side. I have seen a list of the names of these notable five hundred, but as they are hard, unpronounceable names, I will not attempt to give them. It is a study of hours to walk before these holy dignitaries and read the different expressions upon their countenances. Some are fat, some lean, some grave, some smiling, some tall, some short, some old, some young, some speaking, some maintaining silence, but doubtless all impressed with the purity of Buddha's teachings and the necessity of yielding obedience to them. They strongly reminded me of the thousands of sad-looking saints I saw in the cathedrals of Italy, and I preceive the same kind of idolatry in one case as the other. These images are made of clay, smoothly sculptured into proper shape, and then gilded. They are said to be fac similes in features of the originals, who lived fourteen hundred years ago. It is claimed for them as apostles of Buddha that they not only had the power of treading under foot the most noxious reptiles, of subduing the ferocity of wild beasts, of dispelling birds of evil omen, but to speak in unknown tongues, to unravel obscure problems, and to perform many other miraculous deeds. Just about the same claims are set up for them as for the similar character in the Christian church.

In connection with this temple is a monastery where considerable numbers of monks reside, precisely after the manner of the Romish church, which came into being over five hundred years later than Buddhism. In the center of the large hall where the five hundred statues are is a shrine before which worship is performed. Here were three or four monks sitting upon a slightly elevated platform, chanting the ritual and keeping time by striking a bell held in the hand. The service sounded very nearly like what I have heard in many Romish churches and cathedrals, and the style of dress of the monks looked extremely like that of Romish monks. It is not strange that the Christian missionary, Father Huc, who visited this part of the world three hundred years ago, should have been struck with the great similarity between the nature and forms of Buddhism and his own system, and to get out of the awkward dilemma he found it convenient to charge that the devil had been there long before him and established a counterfeit system almost exactly like the Christian. My companion, the Rev. Mr. Clarke, marked the striking similarity, and afterward admitted that the fact had shaken his faith more than anything else he had met with. Some seventy priests are connected with this temple. In a shrine hard by is a large porcelain vase containing holy water, over which certain words have been mumbled by priests, and which makes it very efficacious in curing diseases. Many of the devout believers pay their money for this water under the belief that it will do them good.

THE TEMPLE OF PAK-TAI

Shall next have a passing description. This is not a Buddhistic temple, it belonging to the system much older than Buddhism. Pak-Tai is one of the names of one of the oldest gods in the country, who has been credited with being not only the chief ruler of the world, but the first god who descended upon the world in human form. This he has done on three different occasions, and under different names, the first time more than six thousand years ago, and the last time 2697 B. C., or a long time before Noah became a navigator. On the occasion of his last incarnation he visited the province or kingdom of Tsing-Lak-Kwook, where Shein-Shing, the queen, on coming into his presence, was "overshadowed," and in consequence conceived. It seems she went more than the usual period in that interesting condition, and at the end of fourteen months she gave birth to an avatar or incarnation of the great god who had overshadowed her. This case seems to have been more miraculous than the little similar incident which occurred less than nineteen hundred years ago over in the miserable rocky country in the western part of Asia called Palestine. In the latter case the overshadowing and conception were equally miraculous with this China incident, but when nine months had passed away, and the birth took place, so far as we are informed, it occurred in a perfectly natural manner, but in this Chinese case it was as miraculous as the conception, for an incision had to be made under the left arm of the mother, and the birth took place from under the arm instead of in the regular way. Thus it is plainly seen that there was more miracle, more supernaturalism, in the birth of a god in the eastern part of Asia than in the western.

And, what is more, at the time of the birth of this young Chinese god a cloud of rich and variegated colors overshadowed the whole nation, and the air was suddenly impregnated with the most delightful odors. Thus, again, it will be seen that there was a good deal more of overshadowing and impregnating done in China than in Palestine. And, still more, upon the birth of this Chinese god rare and precious stones came forth from the earth to mark the occurrence of this birth from under the left arm as a most important event. Shortly after his birth he also gave proof of the strength of his intellect, and of the purity of his soul. His general deportment was likewise of the most godly character; there is not the slightest intimation that he ever spoke a disrespectful word to his mother. At the age of seven years he was well versed in the different branches of literature; and as he advanced to the years of early youth he conceived it to be his duty to retire from the society of the world to qualify himself to serve the gods and promote the happiness of men. His parents were opposed to this step, but this heavenly individual was so determined in his purpose that he would listen to no opposition; and when he reached the age of fifteen years he left his home and became a wanderer on the mountains, under the expectation that he would there meet a heavenly messenger who would give him instructions as to his future conduct. It seems he was inspired from a divine source in this matter, for the heavenly messenger, named Yak-Tsing-Shing-Tsu, appeared to him among the wilds of those desolate mountains and instructed him in doctrines of a most heavenly character. The young god applied himself very closely to his divine studies; and when he had completed them, his heavenly visitant directed him to proceed to an exceedingly high mountain, called Tai-wo-Shan, situated in the Eastern Ocean, on each side of which, surrounding waters extended more than fifty thousand miles. He was further informed that when he reached that remote and lonely mountain he must take up his abode in a certain red cavern, and there pursue the studies he had thus far so successfully prosecuted, and to continue the same for a period of one hundred years. He was, furthermore, directed not to comb his hair nor cover his feet. By strictly following out these instructions he was assured that he would become fully qualified to fill the important position designed for him many centuries before.

This is a somewhat lengthy story, but it is so remarkable, and so very godly, that I must not keep it back from you. Suffice it to say this young god betook himself to this remarkable island and followed out all the instructions that had been given to him, after which the time came for him to ascend up into heaven to his father. At an early hour on the day of his ascension the sky presented a most brilliant appearance, and from it there fell a profusion of beautiful, fragant, and heavenly flowers. And the air, also, for a distance of three hundred miles, resounded with the notes of musical instruments.

It is not a little remarkable that when the time for his ascension had come he had attained to the stature of nine Chinese cubits. His face was round as the full moon, though possibly not so large as the moon. His eyebrows in shape resembled wriggling dragons; his eyes were like those of a phenix; and his skin and flesh, in point of purity and cleanliness, were like unto pure crystal. He wore a rich jade-stone hat, and his body was covered with loose flowing robes of silk. Then, standing on the summit of that very high mountain where he had resided for a hundred years, and looking toward heaven, he raised his hands in the attitude of prayer, when a host of angels suddenly came down from heaven and ministered unto him. They brought him long robes of silk, on which were embroidered in gold representations of dragons. These good messengers were also so kind as to present him with red shoes, flying swords, and a chariot of nine different colors. And, what was still more pleasant, a number of beautiful women, each of whom was mounted upon a heavenly horse, descended to his side. These beautiful creatures presented to him a dispatch (probably a telegraphic dispatch) that the gods had unanimously appointed him to the office of chief minister of heaven. They also gave him a black banner, upon which were several white stars, the same being typical of the seven northern mansions of the moon, destined for his special residence.

This heavenly personage then, Elijah-like, took his seat in the chariot of nine different colors, accompanied by the host of angels and the pretty women, and having assumed the name of Pak-Tai, ascended majestically up to heaven. This somewhat remarkable event took place on the ninth day of the ninth month of the fifty-seventh year of the reign of Hwang-te, 2,754 years before the young carpenter of Judea made a similar ascension. It cannot be overlooked that in many respects Pak-Tai was more remarkable than the carpenter—he attained to a greater size, he had richer robes, prettier shoes, more interesting company, had the luxury of a chariot of nine colors, and, upon the whole, was a good deal better looking than he who is said to have a sword coming out of his mouth, fire out of his eyes, smoke out of his nostrils, and hair like wool. There are possibly some among you who will not believe this story of the Chinese god, while so many all around you easily believe that equally impossible story about that other person who went up. Let me assure you that, so far as I am able to see, there is as much probability of the truth of one as the other. There are millions who believe the one, and there are millions who believe the other. If any difference, there are more people here in China who believe the story about Pak-Tai than there are in all the world who believe that other and newer story, and they seem to have as much good sense as other folks. Perhaps if you could only be made to believe that you would have to burn in hell forever if you refuse to believe this story about Pak-Tai, you would change your mind and at least pretend to believe it, the same as a great number of people do the other story.

But I have not told you all about this Chinese god. After he had thus triumphantly ascended up into heaven and assumed chief control there, he became his own father, and was really Pak-Tai who had begotten himself, and in this respect you will see that he again resembled the other individual I have alluded to. It is a curious thing how these gods can be one, two, or three, just as they please, and that they can be father and son at the same time. Possibly it may be a very convenient thing when a god has been duly begotten and he grows up to be a full-sized god that he can turn round and be his own father. Among all the beings which have existed, a god is the only one who can do this, and probably that is one of the advantages of being a god. But I ask you to listen further. After Pak-Tai had transferred his residence from that lone mountain to the mansions in heaven, the earth, in the reign of Yan, between four and five thousand years ago, was visited by a deluge, which did no small damage to a considerable scope of country. When the waters had abated, however, Pak-Tai descended to the earth for the purpose of teaching men how to till the ground and raise good crops, as well as several branches of mechanical arts, the knowlege of which those primitive Chinese possessed a deficiency. In this course he proved himself a greater friend to the human race than any god I now remember of reading about; for scarcely one of them, though they often come down to the earth, put themselves to the trouble of giving mankind any information that was of any practical benefit to them.

This great Pak-Tai further distinguished himself by punishing the wicked inhabitants of the earth, who, in the reign of Chan-sin, the twenty-eighth and last sovereign of the Shang dynasty, had become so corrupt and sinful that Pak-Tai, with the concurrence of his heavenly companions, took it upon himself to not only destroy those wicked men, but to overcome the host of evil spirits, by whose influence men had been led astray.

The first movement he made in his masterly enterprise was to dethrone the wicked house of Shang and to set up in its place the dynasty of Chan. In the next place, clad in black armor, he waged a bitter war against the devils and imps who had incited the minds of men to do evil. And although the devils had the assistance of a big turtle and a snake, each of great size and prodigious strength, Pak-Tai showed himself more than a match for all of them, and placed them hors de combat. He rendered the snake and turtle perfectly powerless by just placing his right foot on the one and his left foot on the other, and ever since that tramping operation was performed the snakes and the turtles, the tortoises and the dragons as well, have been entirely subservient to him. And right here I beg to call your attention to the contrast in this respect between Pak-Tai and that God of Palestine and his son, who jointly have not yet been able, after thousands of years of hard contest, to defeat one snake of their own creation. This snake is not represented as being so large as the Chinese serpent, but he was uncommonly lively and shrewd. He engaged in the fruit business, which he found already grown for his purpose, and in a few adroit operations, aided by the persuasive eloquence which had been furnished him, he entirely defeated his maker and utterly destroyed the pet plans of the God after they had been thought over and matured for a few thousand million years, at the very least, and the God has never yet been able to recover from that terrible defeat; for though the snake was sent to grass and told to eat dust, he has flourished remarkably; he has drawn the greater part of mankind after him, and has continued to defeat his antagonist in every encounter since. The moral to these god and snake-stories is this: Pak-Tai was a great deal more powerful than Yahweh, or the Jewish snake was more subtle and cunning than the Chinese snake.

Pak-Tai has continued, at intervals more or less prolonged, to come down from his heavenly abode to take a hand in the affairs of men and to punish wicked emperors who did not do to please him, and he holds power still over this sublunary world, exercising over mankind presiding watchfulness and direction. To the simple he imparts wisdom; to the virtuous happiness; to traders prosperity; and to all innocent persons protection from injustice, oppression, and wrong. He directs the course of the lightning and winds, gives rains and fruitful seasons, stavs the progress of epidemics, gives relief to those suffering from ague, and, in a word, at his pleasure lengthens or shortens the days of man. Now I submit it to you if it was not very good in Pak-Tai to direct the course of the lightning and the winds. What if he had not had the condescension to do this? Are we not left to suppose that the lightning would not have presumed to start out, that the winds would have been at a loss which way to go, and that water would not have known enough to run down hill?

From the manifold services which this god has performed his admirers and worshipers have conferred several names and titles upon him. I will not detain you by repeating all the holy epithets which have been conferred upon him, but will merely mention "Chin-Woo," "Un-Woo," "Chang-ti," and no less than Yuk-Hu-Sze-Saong-Yune-Tin-Shang-Tai, and I just wish to ask you if you do not think such names as those are an ample compensation for the services he performed? Could a reasonable god ask for anything handsomer? But his generous worshipers have not stopped at that; they have built numerous temples for him in all parts of the empire, and have placed his image in them so that the people need not forget him. A black flag is hoisted on all gala days to commemorate his wonderful power, and these are waved before his temples. On the third day of the third month in each recurring year his grateful subjects present him with a new robe, as near as possible like the one in which he ascended up to heaven nearly six thousand years ago. In the inability of his worshipers to place the robe on him direct, they place it upon the image which they have set up to represent him, and the robe is put on with great pomp and ceremony at the hour of midnight, while thousands are kneeling all around him; all who are able, attired in robes of state, and bowed down in profound adoration for the great services performed by so wonderful a god. While the robe is being placed upon him the bell and drum in the temple are sonorously sounded, and after the grand ceremony is over, the priests perform the kow-tow and the assembled multitude chant peons of praise to this wonderful god. On these occasions the temple is illuminated by large and brilliant chandeliers suspended from the rafters; and numerous cages filled with larks and other birds are taken into the temple to help the people sing praises to the great Pak-Tai, and these enthusiastic praises and rejoicings are continued for three days, during which many thousands of people prostrate themselves in devout adoration before the image that sits upon the throne. And a large porcelain vase is filled with holy water over which the priests have muttered some pious words, and from that moment it becomes charged with such miraculous power that it is held to be able to cure all manner of diseases, or at least this is so strongly believed that the faithful are willing to pay handsome sums for it, which sums enter into the treasury of the god, and are dispensed by his priests as to their holy minds seems most fit.

In this temple there are five associate gods, and prominent among them is Lue-Kung, the god of thunder. Like old Thor, he holds a hammer in his right hand and a chisel in his left with which he is able to knock out as much thunder and lightning as reasonable people desire. He has wings on his shoulders, and with these he is supposed to be able to fly as rapidly through the air as the thunderbolts which he manufactures.

In a small court adjoining the temple is a pond in which are kept five large turtles. These are sacred to Pak-Tai, and in consequence are highly venerated by the people. At the end of the square in which the temple stands a stage is erected, on which plays in honor of Pak-Tai are perfomed at intervals throughout the year. On such occasions the square is literally crowded with people, who never weary with doing honors to this favorite deity.

I have not drawn this account of Pak-Tai from pagan or Infidel authorities, but from the eminent Christian Archdeacon John Henry Gray, M.A., graduate of Christ's College, who as consulate chaplain has resided in Canton, and himself witnessed the ceremonies which he describes. Mind you, I do not vouch for the truth of a word of the story, but in my honest opinion it is just as true as any other god story that I have ever heard. They all have a great sameness in style and credibility, and are worthy to stand on the same level.

DEAR SIR: Inclosed find $5, for which please send the "Around-the-World" books. GEO. G. MEIKLE.

NEW TACOMA, W. T., July 10, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $8, for which send me THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year, and "Around-the-World" books. Yours truly. D. W. PERKINS.

VINTON, IOWA, July 24, 1882.

DEAR FRIEND EUGENE, (though I expect I might say Bennett, for I expect and hope this will find him once morewith you all): You remember I wrote you some some time ago in reference to the binding af those books, and you said send back the first volume and $3 and you would send them, bound in morocco. Well, I didn't do it, but I hav sold it with the balance of the volumes for $5, which please find inclosed, with $2 additional for mine bound in calf, which, I believe, I would as lief hav as morocco, and perhaps it won't cost quite as much. Send the balance of the volumes sold to E A. Clark this office, and ever so much obliged.

I cannot say how glad I am at dear old friend Bennett's safe arrival to his home and dear little wife. What a Liberal defeat of Comstock, Colgate, Crosby, Bundy & Co! May they hide themselvs for very shame, and be seen no more of men. I rejoice with him at the many friends he found on his journey. I see by the last paper he must hav passed through our town the morning of the 12th. Had I known it I would, at least, hav had a shake. M. BRANIN.

HO! FOR WATKINS GLEN.

ST. JOHNS, MICH., July 28, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: The Lord and everybody else willing, I, and also my wife, will attend the Watkins Glen meeting. We hope to enjoy a great intellectual feast, and if our friend Bennett managed to steal or purchase any of the gods of India or other countries, we hope that he will be sure to bring them to the convention, so that we may not fail of having a good time for the want of gods. And let us hope that the heathen's god will unite with the Christian's god and lend their influence, if they are able to aid and assist us, in trying to unshackle the brain of man and in trying to make the world better. Let all who can afford the time and cost be there.

HOME, HOME, SWEET HOME!

SNOWVILLE, VA., July 16, 1882.

DEAR FRIENDS: Since I wrote you last I hav spent some days in Baltimore and some in Washington, and had a good time in general seeing the sights and exchanging greetings with good Liberals and whole-souled workers for the happiness and welfare of humanity.

Three months of pleasant enjoyment hav passed since I left the portals of home; spring, with its tender buds and dew-tipped grass, has passed away, and summer, with its ripening grain and waving fields of corn, is here, and all things are in the glory of perfect fulness of perfection. I, too, feel full of contentment and sweet satisfaction, for I've had my pleasure trip and found all at home well and happy and apparently glad to see Elmina once more with them.

And now I want to go to work and do enough to partly make up for "lost" time. To do this I need your help. My ability to do depends on means to do with, so I hope all my special friends who are wanting Liberal books and papers will order them of me. I will be glad to furnish them at publisher's prices, or shall regard all orders as friendly favors. ELMINA D. SLENKER.

MR. EDITOR: As the six months are up for which I subscribed for your paper, and wishing to sustain the acquaintance for the remainder of the year, I will make it a fixed fact by sending you the money for it. There are a few subscribers and more readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER in this new country. The most of them admire it and feel able to defend it, and are capable of showing by words and deeds that they hav great respect for the light, life, and knowledge that are taught in its pages. It is a source of much satisfaction that we hav master minds, men and women of great abilities, who are advancing bright truths and thoughts for every one of us to analyze, try, and prove. In this there is no chance for blind belief or sophistry. How vast and varied are the fields into which the truth seekers are leading us, lighting up the pathway, and putting such implements into our hands that will enable us to survey the route with great certainty. What a vast difference between a demonstrating philosophy and a dark theology. Let us jump the chasm. Fifteen years ago I was trustfully rocking away in the "only believe" theory, but I was fairly jerked out of it by watching "him who works in a mysterious way his wonders to perform." In our little village one of his chosen ministers said in his prayer, "Henceforth, Almighty God, let thy stately steppings be seen and felt in our midst, even in Ovid." With others I watched for steppings, believing sincerely that God's works would appear grand and glorious. He soon put it into the hearts of his chosen people to build a town hall for meetings and all public purposes. The enterprise was acceptable to the town folks, and they aided in building it. About this time the Lord stepped in and moved his servants to name it the Baptist Church and be dedicated to the Lord, and it was so. And it came to pass that the Lord's people got up a Fourth of July dinner to purchase a new organ. These blood-washed children quarreled over the spoils, and a bitter war ensued where fiery darts were hurled, and spitting gods led on the Christian broods. With curses upon its altar and crape upon its doors his peculiar people were split asunder. In continuing his steppings this same prayer-making preacher was induced to make Kalamazoo College an endowment of $10,000, and also to solicit subscriptions from others to help build up this Baptist preacher factory. The subscriptions thus taken when paid had an interest taxed on them from date of subscription, all of which told heavily on that endowment fund to the honor of the honor of the Lord, the preacher. Oh, how mysterious are his ways, and past finding out. It was the Lord's doings, and all for his holy cause.

Again the Lord went down into Ovid and said to his people of the Methodist Episcopal church, "Build for me a house to dwell in, that ye may come before me in prayer and praise, and I will abundantly bless and prosper you in all your doings." And it was so that the Lord favored them greatly, so much so that they soon had much money in store wherewith to build him a house. His favored children now lifted up a great and high frame, even seventy feet from the base to the top of the timbers, and they rejoiced greatly, so that rich ones had confidence in his cause and came from their stores and farms and places of business in a holy conference and selected where the throne would be and seats whereon they would sit and worship. But the Lord was displeased with all this, and came that way in a wrathful zephyr and threw down their heaven-built walls and dashed $3,000 worth of divine confidence to the earth. His people were thrown into more dismay, but finally concluded it was "the Lord's doings and wonderful in our eyes," and then waited for further steppings of the Lord.

Divine favor began to shine again, and the town people were importuned to build to him a house of worship of smaller size and on lower ground with a plan much humbler than the first. It was finished and popularly dedicated to the Lord of Sabaoth. The Lord was greatly pleased in his heart at this, and said, "Now will I pour out for you a blessing, even a great refreshing from the presence of the Lord." There is nothing too great for the Lord to do, and the people were persuaded to ask a favor of the Lord. So these soul-saved ones took courage and besought the Lord's anointed to send them a thousand-dollar man to sprinkle them with heavenly dew. He heard their prayers and set up a revival mill in Ovid which ground away for many weeks so that more than three score of souls were saved with an everlasting salvation. They were saved from crime and lies and deception, and saved to the church. The Lord must hav stepped out, for, as we behold, lo! the most of them stepped out of this salvation. And now, even in these last days the Lord communed again with himself and said, "Surely I must again go down and visit Ovid, and try my people." And it came to pass that as he rode upon the storm he snapped his fingers charged with electric fire at his dwellings, even the houses of God, and the fires ran down the towers thereof and the walls were shattered and torn, so much so that the larger one was badly rent asunder. The confiding children of this benign benefactor all came together as of one accord before the sanctuary and cried out, "The ark of the Lord has departed, and we must worship him in another place." And some other said, "Is not this an almighty careless way of stepping?" T. L. TRAVIS.

ENON VALLEY, PA., June 25, 1882.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: In conversation with my good Methodist friend H., in regard to the nebular hypothesis, as to how far it tends to confirm the theory of evolution, and as to how far the theory tends to overthrow the doctrins or the Christian religion, the conversation finally drifted to the question as to whether one's own religious experience is sufficient evidence upon which one can rest his belief in God, Christ, the inspiration of the scriptures, etc. My friend H. said: "One who has had the religious experience such as I hav had—and all good Methodists claim to hav had, when God has spoken peace to their souls—cannot doubt that there is a God and that the Bible is his inspired word." I said: "But can you not doubt your own religious experience, your own sensations?"

H.—"No; that would be impossible."

I.—"Let us see about that. Look into a polished mirror and your own unaided sight would lead you to believe that the objects in front of the mirror were duplicated by a like number and kind of objects on the other side of the mirror; but upon calling to your aid other faculties of sense, you find it is not true, but that the mirror simply reflects the objects in front of it. One who has had a leg amputated, were he to consult alone his sense of feeling, would say that the amputated member was still there, because the sense of pain in the stump of the amputated leg is referred to the toes or foot; but upon bringing to his aid other faculties of sense, he finds that his unaided sense of feeling is not to be relied on. When one receives a blow on his 'crazy bone' his sense of feeling would refer the injury he has sustained to the little finger, the parts to which the injured nerve is distributed; but his other senses admonish him that this is not the fact. There are many other cases I could cite to you, all going to show that we cannot always rely implicitly upon our own sensations or experience. They frequently mislead us, and therefore we should learn to doubt them."

H.—"Why, man, you are crazy! Do you then claim that we should doubt our own sensations, our own experience?"

I.—"Yes; that is just what I claim, if we wish to guard against falling into error. We can know nothing positivly, absolutely—know it in such a way as to place it beyond a doubt."

H.—"What! Do you not know that you are living and standing before me now?"

I.—"No; I cannot say that I do in the sense I use the word 'know;' all I can say is that such seems to me to be the fact."

H.—"Why, you are a lunatic—you are insane! How can I reason with you when you say you do not know anything?"

I.—"One never reasons about that which he knows—knows in the sense I use that word. Absolute knowledge of anything rules out reason; therefore, your God, if he be omniscient, can not reason."

H.—"You are the most unreasonable reasoner I ever met with. You would reason one out of his senses."

I.—"Beware lest I prove you to be what you hav charged me with being—a lunatic. Why do you reason with me if I am insane; but perhaps there is a method in my madness? To doubt is to reason. By doubting one guards against being mistaken. I cannot say that I absolutely know anything. All I can say is that the preponderance of evidence, as my faculties of sense enables me to appreciate evidence, leads me, compels me, to accept certain things as true. They seem to me to be true, and yet there is not one of those things which I accept as true but that I am willing to doubt about its truthfulness, and in regard to the truthfulness of which I am free to say I may be mistaken."

H.—"Verily you are a doubting Thomas! But to doubt one's own sensation is not the same as to doubt his experience. We may receive a sensation through one of our faculties, and without the aid of our other faculties to confirm the correctness of this sensation, we may be led into an error, or we may draw a false inference from our sensation, but our experience is made up of the aggregate of all our sensations, and therefore cannot be false or erroneous."

I.—"I am glad that you concede the point that 'we may be led into an error or we may draw a false inference' by relying upon the unconfirmed testimony of one of our faculties. Please to notice that the sensation may be correct, but the inference drawn from the sensation may be all wrong. Even the aggreate of all our sensations which you correctly, I think, style our experience, may be correct, but what you infer to be the cause of those sensations may not really be the cause of them; here, I think, is where your difficulty begins. You say you cannot doubt your experience. While I do not agree with you on this point, we will, for the sake of what is to follow, accept what you say as true. The next question to determin is 'What is the cause of that experience?' You claim that the cause is God's giving you a new heart; his speaking peace to your soul; converting you. In short, this religious experience is the result of supernatural agency—is miraculous. If you can clearly establish that claim, then all the rest is clear sailing. I claim that this experience is produced by natural causes, and that all the phenomena can be explained in perfect accordance with the laws which govern the mind. Your religious experience and conversation belong to the same class of phenomena as that of table-talking, mind-reading, mesmerism, etc., and can all be explained on the same general principles."

H.—"That is what you claim. My claim is different. Do you not think that you are a little egotistical in setting up your claim against mine, especially since you confess that you don't believe anything—not even what you are saying?"

I.—"Your criticism is to the point, but you should not forget that I am not laying down the law and the gospel dogmatically. All I am doing, or trying to do is to giv you an idea of what seems to me to be in accordance with the eternal verities. You and I entertain different opinions in regard to what is the true cause of your religious experience. You claim that God has miraculously interposed to snatch your soul from hell. I cannot accept this as the true cause. I think you are laboring under a delusion."

H.—"Oh! A delusion? Everybody is wrong, and you alone are right. You think every one must bow to your doctrin no matter how unreasonable. Just think of it! Follow a leader who confesses that he don't know anything!"

I.—"You appear to be particularly sensitiv about delusions. Can it be possible that this sensitivness arises from a secret consciousness that here is the weak place in your armor? I fear it does. I would like to giv you the history of an unquestioned delusion and see how nearly it resembles your religious experience."

H.—"How do you know that it is a delusion?"

I.—"I said an 'unquestioned delusion,' and I think you will not question its being a delusion when you hav heard the history. I was called to see a woman who was suffering a good deal of pain at times. I proposed to giv her chloroform by inhalation. She consented. She had scarcely got under its influence when she began to talk about Jesus, heaven, God, angels, etc.; bade good-bye to her family and friends, expressed herself willing to go since 'Jesus had paid it all,' and so alarmed her friends that I discontinued the chloroform, and in a short time she came to herself and was all right again, only she retains a very distinct recollection of having gone to heaven, seen and talked with God and the angels, and of having a good time generally. She says, 'I was so happy.' When I asked her how God was dressed she could not tell me—she did not notice; neither could she say whether the angels had wings or not, or even feathers. I suppose she was so inexpressibly happy that she never thought of taking notice. Now here is what I would call an unquestioned delusion. In what does it differ from your religious experience?"

H.—"Why, in this: The chloroform was the cause of this delusion, but my religious experience is not a delusion because I know God has spoken peace to my soul. I know that God has pardoned my sins and accepted me as one of his children."

I.—"I beg your pardon, but, with all respect for your convictions, I must say you do not know, you simply think you know; in this lies your delusion. You say that the chloroform was the cause of all this delusion on the part of my patient—a very obvious cause. No one questions that this was the cause of her delusion, but in your case the cause is not so apparent. This is the principal difference between your delusion and hers. Now, if you will take the trouble to study the law of mind, as it is applicable to mesmerism and other kindred phenomena, I think that you will find a cause (although perhaps not so obvious) for your religious experience without appealing to any supernatural agency whatever. You religious experience may be real, but you are laboring under the delusion that it is caused by a miraculous interposition of God's grace. With the woman who took chloroform her sensations were delusiv; but with you, your sensations may hav been real, but your attributing them to a supernatural agency is delusiv. Now, so far as you are incapable of doubting, of reasoning, on the possibility of your being deluded in regard to the cause of your religious experience, do I claim that you are insane—a lunatic. So you see that, according to our different ways of reasoning, we are both a little off, and perhaps we are."

So we parted. Now, Mr. Editor, the foregoing is a rough draft of a conversation which took place after our Liberal friend, ex-Rev. J. H. Burnham, of Saginaw, Michigan, had delivered his lecture on the "World's Infancy" in our town on the 26th of last May. I would like to hav it published in THE TRUTH SEEKER if you deem it worthy of a place in its columns. H. NYE.

CHEYENNE, WYO. TER., July 20, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find a scrap cut from Mind and Matter of about three weeks ago. It seems that when a man, however honest or honorable before, commences to advocate an ism he must descend to falsehood, slander, and defamation:

"It would seem that Occultism, Blavatskyism, and Olcottism hav found the end of the rope of humbuggery, which they set out to twist in America and in India. Referring to this fact, the R.-P. Journal says: 'The Pundit of the Somaj informs the public that neither Col. Olcott nor Mme. Blavatsky knows anything of Yog Vidya (occult science) as practiced by the Yogis of old; that they may know a little of mesmerism, as well as the natural and physical sciences (taught in the Bombay institutions), especially the science of electricity; and that they may know the art of clever conjuring (by having subterranean or hidden electric wires, or other hidden apparatus). But for them to say that they perform their phenomena without apparatus, without any secret pre-arrangement, and solely through the forces existing in nature (electricity), and by what they call their "will power," is to tell a lie.'

"Thus ends another attempt to supplant modern Spiritualism by fraud and deception. Nearly six years ago, through the Banner of Light, we exposed the barefaced pretensions and deceptions of this brace of discomfited humbugs. We hav followed their doings in that land of priestcraft, India, and are not in the least surprised that they should be kicked out of India by the Brahman pontiff as being unworthy of his toleration."

The above you personally know to be false and defamatory; and what adds to the mendacity of the editor, it is copied from a paper which he affects to despise for its duplicity and falsehood. Now I hav carefully read every Theosophist that has been published since Col. Olcott and Madam Blavatsky went to India, and I fail to see that they are being likely to be kicked out of India, but, on the other hand, they hav been received with open arms by the educated and intelligent Hindoos. Notwithstanding the slight kicks administered by the editor of Mind and Matter and the Rev. Joseph Cook, their popularity is increasing.

As to their attempt to supplant Spiritualism, I hav seen nothing of the kind in their published speeches or writings. They differ from the Spiritualists in regard to the forces that produce the so-called spiritual phenomena, which they hav a perfect right to do until Spiritualism proves itself more infallible than it is at present.

I hav taken and read every number of Mind and Matter from its first issue, and am sorry to see its editor borrow its slanders from so ignoble a source, as though he was incapable of writing originals.

As to the difficulty between Dyanand Saraswati Swami and the founders of the Theosophical Society, it is but slight, as I understand it. The learned pundit felt aggrieved because the Theosophists receive into their society orthodox Brahmans instead of confining admissions to the Swami's own sect. Besides, the Swami has admitted that the occult powers of Madam Blavatsky are yoga, which the editor of Mind and Matter well knows, if, as he says, he has "carefully followed their doings in that land of priestcraft, India." And surely the present attitude of the Spiritual papers and Spiritualists toward each other and toward their mediums will fully warrant the conclusion that they are controled by superhuman, elementary, or earth-bound spirits rather than beneficent human spirits. W. R. FRINK.

FARMINGTON, UTAH, July 8, 282.

MR. EDITOR: In writing this letter I feel that I am only discharging a duty to myself and also on behalf of all the Liberals of Utah (and they are many) who may hav been members of the Mormon church, and who are willing to accord to all men, Mormon or non-Mormon, every right and every privilege they claim for themselvs. I am led to write this way in consequence of a letter over the signature of W. R. Frink, of Salt Lake City, published in THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 1st, which, in addition to his very rancorous throws at Mr. E. L. T. Harrison, of Salt Lake City, makes a big try to throw dirt on all who hav ever had a connection with the Mormon church. He says, "The apostate Mormon is the same individual still, and generally has the same conceit that his particular ideas of Liberalism are right, and is Liberal only so long as any one will think or act as he wishes, hence Liberalism is very much divided in Utah."

I am not acquainted with Mr. Frink personally, but while in Salt Lake City yesterday I, being interested, took the trouble to make inquiries about him, and learnt that while he is a man of considerable scientific acquirements, he is quite rabid on the Mormon question and considerable of a Mormon-eater, and holding to the impression that no good can come out of Nazareth, of course there can be no good and true Liberal that was ever a member of the Mormon church. I was a member of the Mormon church twenty-seven years, in England twelve years, and the balance of the time in Utah. During that time I was no drone, but a worker, and was held in good esteem among them; but in the course of time the light of reason and rays of Liberalism shone in on my mind, and to-day I claim to be a Liberal in the true sense of the word, because I am willing to accord to others all the rights and privileges which I demand for myself, and I know of many who hav once been of the Mormon faith who are willing to do the same, while I am sorry to say I know of some who hav once belonged to them who act and talk as though they thought the Mormons hav no rights which they should respect. From what I can learn Mr. Frink has never been connected with the Mormon church, still I fear he belongs to this latter class, though I hope not, and, if not, I would like to know that I had made a mistake. There are all shades of Liberals, as there are of everything else; and what I would like to see is that where they cannot agree they should be willing to disagree, and yet at the same time organize on a platform so broad, with its planks so few, that all can come in and be mutually educated to the full standard of Liberalism; and while I am speaking of organization I would suggest that I can think of no organization that comes so near filling the bill as the National Liberal League. I do not think there can be anything in its planks or demands that any Liberal can object to; and while I am much pleased with the progress this society is making, I cannot but express surprise that it has not made much more.

Although I hav now lengthened out my letter considerably, I do not feel it would be just for me to close without saying a few words for Mr. E. L. T. Harrison. Till a few weeks ago I was no more personally acquainted with Mr. Harrison than I am with Mr. Frink; but while I hav only known Mr. Frink through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER, I hav known of Mr. Harrison as a man with others prominent and of long standing in the Mormon church, and whose every personal interest and prospect in life was apparently linked in with it; and yet in the face of all this—and it was more than any person outside of Utah can well comprehend—dared to come out in the interest of Liberalism and Freethought and be the pioneer and the John the Baptist for us who hav come out since, and made it possible for us to do so. I could say a great deal more than this for Mr. Harrison with others. I hav no doubt, like the rest of us, he has had his faults, but is living to learn. One thing he has learnt lately is that our friend, D. M. Bennett, is not the bad man he has been taught through the Bundy paper to believe he was. He had confidence in Bundy, and only saw Bennett through Bundy's barnacles; and believing Bennett to be the man he [Bundy] and others represented Bennett to be, I do not wonder at his saying he did not want to know him. Who would want to know such a man they would make Bennett to be?

But a happy change came over the scene. Bennett appeared amongst us after his trip round the world; he was introduced to Mr. Harrison and related to him the injuries and wrongs he had to suffer from Christian persecutors, hissed on by professed Liberals who should hav stood by him and been his friends in his hour of trial. Mr. Harrison was convinced, and in a very substantial manner manifested his friendship for him by assisting to procure the Liberal Institute for him to lecture in, acting as chairman at Mr. Bennett's reception in Salt Lake City, and by making a short, well-studied, and appropriate speech when introducing him to the audience. In closing, I will just say that Mr. Bennett's visit in Utah was quite a success, of which we, the Liberals of Utah, feel proud. As ever,

Truly yours, WALTER WALKER.

BAXTER SPRINGS, KAN., July 16, 282.

BRO. BENNETT: I hav followed you round the world in THE TRUTH SEEKER to Ceylon with great pleasure and profit to my mind, and hope that you are now happy among your friends at home. In early life I was deprived of the conditions to get an education. I had to hoe a hard row in my early life, to battle for bread and a future home, and all my associations were amongst the ignorant and bigoted, and when priestcraft held the field unmolested and inhumanly triumphant.

Since I began to read THE TRUTH SEEKER and other Liberal papers and books and works on natural science I hav added much to my store of knowledge, the clouds, fogs, and mists of ignorance, superstition, and bigotry are dissipated, and in the light of truth and freedom my life is now worth something. Having lived to sixty-five, I cannot expect to liv many years longer. But oh how much longer and better I could hav lived, how much more life would hav been to me, could my mind hav been thus instructed and Liberalized long, long ago!

Orthodoxy and priestcraft are fast losing their hellish and inhuman sway in this region of rapid growth and enterprise, and there is an increasing demand for Freethought literature and science.

I hav, with both mind and pocket, done all I could to help you and your paper, and I am glad to see the good effects produced. May you yet liv many years to continue your noble work and enjoy its fruits!

H. CRUM.

SNOWVILLE, VA., July 18, 1882.

DEAR TRUTH SEEKERS: I shall be glad to hav all my friends and the friends of the aged and helpless to join the Tuttle Club, each to pay twenty-five cents a month, paying $1 for four months, or in any way they prefer, but paying it regularly, so there will be a sure pension for the old couple. All donations will be acknowledged in THE TRUTH SEEKER and Investigator.

I got sixteen dollars for Hacker in one week, while only fifty cents came for Tuttle, yet the latter is equally needy and has equal claims upon us as Liberals. Yours anxiously, E. D. SLENKER.

AYER, MASS., July 24, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: By reference to the date of my last payment for the very valuable and interesting weekly visitor, THE TRUTH SEEKER, I see I am delinquent for one year, and some time on the second year.

I hav no apology to offer, but hope I am alone in thus trespassing on your confidence. Enough of such customers would ruin any good cause. THE TRUTH SEEKER is as well worth the cost as any literature extant.

I inclose you $7: $6 for the paper, and $1 for the Jeremiah Hacker Fund, the veteran and worthy pensioner. It is to be hoped that many will "lend to the Lord," and in no way can they do it better than to remember Bro. Hacker by bestowing material aid. E. MYRICK.

SUTTON, NEB., July 10, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $1, for which you will please continue to send me THE TRUTH SEEKER, as my time expires this month. A trial of the paper has convinced me it is worthy of every true Liberal's patronage.

I hav read many of Mr. Bennett's works, also the works published at your office, and must say that I am deeply interested in them. My one wish would be to hav the best works of Liberalism if I were able to invest. However, I shall make an effort to secure the volumes of Mr. Bennett's journey around the world.

There are but few outspoken Liberals here. I, for one, say just what I think, regardless of their sneers and scorn. I don't believe the Bible is of divine origin. It seems to me none but the most ignorant can. All the clergy between here and THE TRUTH SEEKER office could not change my belief.

Yours for truth, MRS. RETTIE SPORL.

The Corsair's Wife.

BY ALHAZA.

Sparrows are chattering round the eaves,
The cool whispers, through dark-green leaves,
Like a farewell.
He said he thought of me many a time,
He sent me gems from a golden clime,
And a farewell!

They bring me buds and blossoms gay,
He took my heartsease all away,
With a farewell;
They talk of spring, but every bell
Rings through my bosom, like a knell
And a farewell.

The greensward wears a golden smile,
Where glides to the sea the sacred Nile,
With a farewell;
He stood by many a golden strand,
But his heart was in his nativ land.
Oh, farewell!

I am too proud to whisper o'er
The vows he breathed. He comes no more
With a farewell;
He finds pale gems where moans the sea,
Where death is waiting now for me.
Farewell!

I see the wave, the curling mist,
The corals by the pale foam kissed
With a farewell;
And gliding near the phantom white
That leads me to my home of light.
Farewell!

The Modern Robber.

SON.

"Oh father! how I long to see
A robber brave and bold,
Who with a manner fierce and free
Could tie a traveler to a tree,
And confiscate his property,
As in the days of old."

FATHER.

"My son, you really shock my ear
With longings so grotesque
Your reading has been bad, I fear;
We never hav such robbers here.
Though ours make millions disappear,
They are not picturesque."

SON.

"The things Jack Sheppard used to do
I've read about in books,
And Claud Duval and Turpin, too,
And all that gay, romantic crew—
Oh, let us seek a robber, do!
And notice how he looks."

FATHER.

"These robberies, though bravely done,
Were small affairs indeed;
And since you seek a robber, son,
Go look for him at Washington,
If you can learn his name from none,
You'll find it in my screed." —Sun.

A Call for the Sixth Annual Congress of the National Liberal League.

All citizens of the United States who believe in the fundamental principles of our republic—separation of church and state; equality of all citizens before the law without distinction of creed or race or sex; justice for all and privileges and monopolies for none; the need of universal secular education, free speech, and a free press, as the basis of universal suffrage—are invited to join the National Liberal League and to appear or to be represented in its Sixth Annual Congress, to be held in St. Louis, Missouri, on Friday, Saturday, and Sunday, September 29th, 30th, and October 1st, 1882.

The League has for its objects and has sought to carry out the principles above stated by securing,

1. THE TOTAL SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE. This is the first and chief object of the League, and includes, among other things, the taxation of Church property and the suppression of sectarian appropriations; and, as necessary to that general object, the League insists upon,

2. The protection of all citizens in their equal, religious, civil, and political rights, without regard to religious belief or want of such belief.

3. The universal, secular, and scientific education of the people, so as to emancipate them from the prevalent superstitious "religions."

4. The impartial secular administration and enforcement of the laws by secular authorities only, who shall be directly responsible to the people.

5. The inviolability of the Mails, and their impartial administration for postal purposes only.

6. A free press and no censorship by churches through amateur societies under state laws, nor through postal officials under United States laws.

Year by year we find that the above principles and measures are openly or covertly violated more and more in every state and by the general government, and chiefly through church influences. Any sect, church, or "religion" that militates against these principles openly or covertly, directly or indirectly, is the enemy of American liberty and of the American people. The League is opposed to churches and "religions" only as they are opposed to liberty and to the rights of man.

All American citizens, therefore, to whom these principles and objects commend themselvs, should rally to the National Liberal League and make it the nurse and defender of freedom in every town and state as well as in the nation. In no other way can "the blessings of liberty," the birthright of American freemen, be so effectivly maintained. Hence, there is not a man or a woman on this continent whose worth, usefulness, and dignity would not be enhanced by giving attendance or aid to the congresses of the League. Never since the congress of 1876 has an assembly met having more important principles and measures before it than the present congress. It meets to accomplish the fundamental purposes of the patriots of 1776. They will hav failed, unless the objects of the League are attained.

To aid in this noble work it is only necessary to join or to organize an Auxiliary Liberal League in your neighborhood. For terms and mode of organization address the Secretary without delay.

All Charter and Life-Members of the League, and all delegates from local Auxiliary Leagues, will hav votes in the Congress. Annual members are entitled to seats, but not votes.

Combine, then, for the common defense, for general secular education, and for the firm support of the essentials of free institutions. Let it be not your fault if in the growth and prosperity of our people their liberties and yours are frittered away and lost.

Dated New York, July 14, A.D. 1882 (Era of Man 282).

Freethinkers' National Association

The New York State Freethinkers' Association has invited the Freethinkers of the United States and Canada to meet them in general convention at Watkins Glen, August 23d, 24th, 25th, 26th, and 27th. The following speakers hav been engaged to address the convention: Ex-Rev. Geo. C. Miln and Judge C. B. Waite, late member of Congress, of Chicago; D. M. Bennett, Hon. T. B. Wakeman, Courtland Palmer, Prof. A. L. Rawson, T. C. Leland, and ex-Rev. S. P. Putnam, of New York city; ex-Rev. Geo. Chainey, Horace Seaver, editor Boston Investigator, Hon. Elizur Wright, and Prof. W. S. Bell, of Boston; Matilda Joslyn Gage, of Syracuse; Charles Bright, of Amsterdam; Lucy N. Colman, of Syracuse; Col. M. E. Billings, of Waverly, Iowa; Rev. J. H. Burnham, of Saginaw City, Mich.; Hon. A. B. Bradford, Enon Valley, Pa.; Hon. John E. Remsburg, of Atchinson, Kan.; M. Babcock, St. Johns, Mich.; Mrs. H. S. Lake, of San Francisco, Cal; John F. Engle, Scotland Neck, N. C.; Hon. Judge McCormick, Franklin, Pa.; and C. Fred Farlin, M.D., Wolcott, N. Y.

Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, of Washington; James Parton, of Newburyport, Mass.; Bronson C. Keeler, literary editor Chicago Times; Hon. W. D O'Connor, of the Treasury Department of Washington; Mrs. Clara Neymann, of New York, and Prof. Felix Adler, of New York city, are also invited and expected to be present to address the convention.

On the evening of the third day of the convention a dinner and reception will be given to D. M. Bennett, editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, who has just returned from a trip around the world, at the Glen Park Hotel in Watkins. The following are the members of the committee having the matter in charge: Hon. Elizur Wright, James Parton, J. P. Mendum, Hon. T. B Wakeman, Courtlandt Palmer, and Amy Post. Mr. James Parton has been appointed to read the address of welcome.

The association has engaged the Watkins Village Park in which to hold the day sessions of the convention, and Freer's Opera House for the evening sessions. The headquarters of the convention will be at the Glen Park Hotel. The railroads of the country hav nearly all agreed to sell excursion tickets, and the hotels and boarding-houses at Watkins will entertain the people at greatly reduced rates. Prof. Peck, of Chicago, a distinguished vocalist, will take charge of the singing.

AN APPEAL TO THE FRIENDS OF UNIVERSAL MENTAL LIBERTY TO MAKE THE GATHERING MORE THAN A SUCCESS.

The Freethinkers' Annual Convention is to be held at the beautiful and picturesque summer resort, Watkins Glen, at the head of Seneca Lake, for the five days commencing August 23d. I am doing all in my power to make it more than a success, and the question I desire to ask every Liberal who reads these lines is, "Will you do all in your power to aid me in this undertaking?" If you will then we will hav a Liberal convention at Watkins such as has never before been witnessed.

There is nothing now more needed to giv the cause we represent an impetus than a great convention that shall, by its numbers and ability, and the high moral position it shall take, attract the attention of the whole country. What we want now is a convention that shall be worthy of our cause. And we can hav such a one if every Liberal will do his and her duty.

Some thirty of the ablest Liberal speakers in this country, and two or three from foreign countries, hav promised to be with us, and we should giv them two thousand hearers representing all sections of the United States and Canada.

We hav had good conventions heretofore, but nothing such as the interests of our cause demands. There are now thousands of people in the churches and out of them who are, in their honest, private opinions, Freethinkers. Their intelligence has caused them long since to discard the dogmas of the church. But they hav not, as yet, gained moral courage sufficient to speak out openly their honest convictions. They are not able to stand alone and incur the odium that an honest utterance of their opinions would cast upon them. But let us show them at Watkins by coming together in great numbers, that they will not stand alone if they avow their principles, and they will take courage and speak out. If we can hav such a convention at Watkins as the interests of our cause demands, we can set in motion a wave of Freethought that will extend all over the whole country and make itself felt over the whole globe.

For my part I hav admired very much the position taken recently by Prof. Felix Adler of New York, in favor of Liberalism making itself a practical power for reform in this country. It is true, as has often been stated, that heretofore we hav had about all we could do to protect ourselvs from the attacks of the church and defend our position. But now it is time that we commenced showing the world that we hav a mission to perform. We hav surely already done a good work by liberating the mind from the thraldom of superstition, for no one is fully prepared to think and act freely so long as he stands in dread of gods, devils, or other orthodox hobgoblins, whom, he thinks, everywhere infest the universe. The mind must be freed from these childish beliefs before it is prepared to freely investigate all questions from a scientific standpoint.

So I hope that at this convention there will be many practical questions that relate to humanity here in this world brought up for consideration. For true Liberalism teaches us that it is not the beings beyond the clouds who need our aid, but humanity around us. In place of gazing up into the sky from a position on our knees, we must stand erect and look around the earth to learn what work of humanity we can engage in here and how to make this world of ours a more comfortable place to liv in.

Friends, to make this convention a perfect success we must each and all be willing to sacrifice something. Most of us hav once been in the church, and how much we gave to perpetuate a superstition. If we will now giv one half as much for the advancement of Rationalism the success of our cause is secured. Are you willing to do this? Then let everyone who reads these lines say, I will be present at the Watkins Convention, notwithstanding it will cost me time and money to do so.

A TRUTH SEEKER

Around the World.

Illustrated with fifty cuts, and with a steel plate engraving of the author in Vol. I.

BY D. M. BENNETT,

Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, author of "A Truth Seeker in Europe," "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," "Champions of the Church," etc., etc.

THREE VOLUMES FOR $5.00.

The Most Instruction for the Least Money of any Book of Travels yet Written.

In 1880 the Freethinkers of the world held an International Congress at Brussels, to which Mr. Bennett was sent as a delegate. He took the occasion to make the tour of Europe, and his observations were embodied in "A Truth Seeker in Europe" (price, $1.50). The letters were also published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and the readers were so well pleased with them that the proposition was made that he make the journey around the world, and giv the world the benefit of a Freethinker's observations. The proposition was accepted if the ones desiring such a work would advance five dollars each, the volumes to be dedicated to them. On July 30, 1881, Mr. Bennett began the journey, sending letters back to be published. The work will make

THREE VOLUMES OF NEARLY 900 PAGES EACH

Those sending in five dollars before the completion of he work will hav their NAMES INSCRIBED IN THE DEDICATION OF THE VOLUMES.

The first volume describes Scotland, Ireland, England, including also an account of the Freethinkers' International Congress at London, in 1881, Holland, the Netherlands, Germany, Austria, Greece, Turkey, Smyrna, Ephesus, Rhodes, Cyprus, Beyrout, Baalbec to Damascus.

Volume II. embraces visits to Damascus, the Sea of Galilee, Bethsaida, Nazareth, the Dead Sea, the Jordan, Jerusalem, and other places of interest in Palestine; Egypt and Egyptian history, and Egyptian towns, manners, and customs the pyramids, etc., to Bombay, India.

There hav been many books of travel printed but none like this. IT IS THE ONLY ONE OF ITS KIND.

Mr. Bennett has a shrewd habit of seeing everything going on, and in his book he has faithfully chronicled the habits and customs of the different people of the many places he visited. The every-day life of all nations is laid before the reader by one who has visited them and beheld them with his own eyes. We feel sure this work is greatly superior to any account of a journey around the world we now hav.

ALL THE VOLUMES WILL BE ILLUSTRATED

Which adds greatly to the interest of the work, and with the close description will present Old-World places in a very familiar light.

The volumes separately will be $2. Those sending $5 now will get Vols. I. and II. by return mail and the other as soon as issued, which will be in a few months, or just as soon as it can be got ready. Those sending the $5 will hav their names in the dedication of the third volume.

Vol. I. or II. mailed on receipt of $2.

JUST OUT

DEITY ANALYZED

AND

THE DEVIL'S DEFENSE.

By Col. John R. Kelso, A.M.

Not since Hudibras has there been such damaging blows given to these old myths and fables. The colonel has made the sacredness of the scriptures appear as absurd as Cervantes made that of the knights of the age of chivalry. The singular audacity with which he attack. the foundations of Christianity shows the earnestness of his own convictions in regard to its fabulous origin.—L Hutchison.

A NEW BOOK BY ROBERT G. INGERSOLL,

ENTITLED

INGERSOLL ON TALMAGE,

BEING

Six Interviews with the Famous Orator on Six Sermons by the Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, of Brooklyn, to which is added

A TALMAGIAN CATECHISM.

Stenographically reported by I. NEWTON BAKER.

Printed in bold, clear type, on heavy, tinted paper, and handsomely bound in muslin, with heavy boards, beveled edges, gilt top, Octavo, 443 pages.

Price, $2.00. Paper Edition from same plates, $1.00.

Those who wish to hav Col. Ingersoll's latest lectures on "Talmagian Theology," will find them here, in full, together with many other points necessarily excluded by the limits of a lecture. "The Talmagian Catechism" puts in the form of direct question, the plainest and profoundest inquiries of modern doubt, and answers them according to Talmage and orthodox Christianity. As a piece of satire, with earnest purpose, this production stands alone, and in the literature of Freethought has not its equal.

A New Edition. Just Published.

A Short History of the Bible,

Being an Account of the Formation and Development of the Canon.

By BRONSON C. KEELER.

Price, cloth, 75 cents. Paper, 50 cents.

This book should be read by every clergyman, layman, scholar, and Liberal.

I hav read Mr. Keeler's book with great pleasure and profit. He givs, in my opinion, a clear and intelligent account of the growth of the Bible. He shows why books were received as inspired, and why they were rejected. He does not deal in opinions, but in facts; and for the correctness of his facts he refers to the highest authorities. He has shown exactly who the Christian fathers were, and the weight that their evidence is entitled to. The first centuries of Christianity are filled with shadow; most histories of that period simply tell us what did not happen, and even the statements of what did not happen are contradictory The falsehoods do not agree. Mr. Keeler must hav spent a great deal of time in the examination of a vast number of volumes, and the amount of information contained in his book could not be collected in years. Every minister, every college professor, and every man who really wishes to know something about the origin and growth of the Bible should read this book.—R. G. Ingersoll.

VINELAND, N. J.

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES.

Spermatorrhea and Impotency,

as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excesses in maturer years, or other causes, and producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, &c., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an

which is the Doctor's latest and greatest med discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case d some of them were in a terribly shattered condition—had en in the Insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness, Fits; ot s upon the verge of Consumption; while others, again, had becon foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

SYPHILIS positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system; GONORRHEA, GLEET, Stricture, Orchitis, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

Middle-Aged and Old Men.

There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuation of the bladder, often accompanied by a slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen, will appear, or the color will be of a thin or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and turgid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the organs.

Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable and correspondence strictly confidential.

PRIVATE COUNSELOR.

Sent to any address securely sealed for two three-cent stamps, treating on Spermatorrhea or Seminal Weakness, giving its cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, followed by strong testimonials, backed by an affidavit as to their genuineness. Gems of Thought.

IT is frequently asserted that in the most Christian countries the people are the most intellectual, moral, and happy. But the fact is that in those countries in which skepticism and Infidelity hav acquired the greatest strength and influence, and in which Christianity has been modified to conform to the changed condition of affairs, the people are the most advanced. The Abyssinians hav had Christianity at least fifteen hundred years. Faith among that people is sincere and unquestioning. Skepticism is not encouraged or tolerated Yet according to travelers who hav visited the Abyssinians, their condition is one that does not afford a very good illustration of the elevating influence of Christianity.—B. F. Underwood.

THERE are many good things about Christianity, and I shall never attack anything that I believeto be good; though I shall never fear to attack anything that I honestly believe to be wrong. We hav, I say, what they call the Christian religion, and I find that just in proportion as nations hav been religious, just in proportion they hav gone back to barbarism. I find that Spain, Portugal, and Italy are the three worst nations in Europe, and I find that the nation nearest Infidel, France, is the most prosperous.—Ingersoll.

TOUCHING God and his ways with man, the highest human faculties can discern little more than the meanest. In theology the interval is small indeed between Aristotle and a child, between Archimedes and a naked savage. It is not strange, therefore, that wise men, weary of investigating, tormented by uncertainty, longing to believe something, should submit themselvs absolutely to teachers who, with firm and undoubting faith, lay claim to a supernatural commission. Thus we frequently find inquisitiv and restless spirits take refuge from their own skepticism in the bosom of a church which pretends to infallibility, and, after questioning the existence of a deity, bring themselvs to worship a wafer.—Macaulay.

ALTHOUGH the proportion of those who do think be extremely small, yet every individual flatters himself that he is one of the number. . . . The soundest argument will produce no more conviction in an empty head than the most superficial declamation—as a feather and a guinea fall with equal velocity in a vacuum.—Colton's Lacon.

A GOOD many people seem to think that to take a miserable view of human life, to see faults in everybody and to find cause of complaint in everything, is to show superiority of mind. No blunder can be greater. A person who always looks at the black side of life is either very unhealthy or very bad. Selfish people are always very unhappy, and naturally so. Those who shed no brightness on those around them see darkness everywhere. The best radiaters are the best absorbers, and those who radiate warmth on others gather warmth round their own hearts. There are myriad goodnesses in the world, but the sadnesses will never be lessened by moping over them and by magnifying them until they hide all the glories and the beauties of life: those who do not believe that the sadnesses are God-ordained will do more service by trying to remedy them than by merely mourning over them.—Annie Besant.

THERE is no right so sacred as the right to one's own thought upon the highest theme.—J. W. Chadwick.

IF the belief of errors not morally bad did no mischief, it would make no part of the moral duty of man to oppose and remove them. There was no moral ill in believing the earth was flat like a trencher any more than there was moral virtue in believing that it was round like a globe; neither was there any moral ill in believing that the creator made no other world than this, any more than there was moral virtue in believing that he made millions of other worlds, and that the infinitude of space is filled with worlds. But when a system of religion is made to grow out of a supposed system of creation that is not true and to unite itself therewith in a manner almost inseparable therefrom, the case assumes an entirely different ground It is then that errors not morally bad become fraught with the same mischiefs as if they were bad. It is then that the truth, though otherwise indifferent, becomes essential, and either confirms or denies the reality of the religion itself. —Thomas Paine.

WE of to-day hav an advantage over the men of old in a knowledge of astronomy and natural philosophy which corrects our seeming "consciousness" that the earth does not move; and we know that it is not a consciousness of a fact which is no fact, but an erroneous construction of evidence yielded by the senses, which misleads uninstructed minds still on the subject of the earth's motion. In like manner, we are blessed now with a biology, a psychology, a phreno-physiology, and a mental philosophy, which even while the churches are rolling their thunder against the profane inroads of science on their sacred ground, are helping us to a more and more searching analysis of the "consciousness of free will" and showing us that whatever will is, and in whatever qualified sense freedom may be predicted of it, absolute free will, that is, uncaused, self-determining will, has no more real existence than uncaused brain or uncaused human being.—N. R. Waters.

FOR benefits return benefits; for injuries return justice without any admixture of revenge.—Confucius.

FREE and fair discussion will ever be found the firmest friend of truth.—Dr. G. Campbell.

No one can be a bigot who reads, tries, and thinks all sides. True, I would be consistent. If we attend church we should not sing, kneel, or rise with the congregation, for that would be tacitly uniting in giving praises to a being which we do not believe exists. Atheists are the very ones who are the first to find out "new truths," and make "fresh discoveries," for they are not afraid of being led beyond the old God-and-Bible platform! It is religion that always kept the world in bondage to its creeds and bound it down to the old and bygone!—Elmina.

BE KIND TO THE ANIMALS.

Speak gently to the herring, and kindly to the calf
Be blithesome with the bunny, at barnacles don't laugh;
Giv nuts unto the monkey and buns unto the bear,
Never hint at currant jelly if you chance to meet a hare.
Don't tantalize the tortoise, nor sacrifice the sloat;
Don't persecute the parrot, nor grumble at the goat;
But giv the stranded jelly-fish a shove into the sea,
Be always kind to animals wherever you may be.

Be lenient with lobsters, and ever kind to crabs,
And be not disrespectful to cuttlefish or dabs;
Chase not the cochin-china, chaff not the ox obese,
And babble not of feather-beds in company with geese.
Be tender with the tadpole, and let the limpet thrive,
Be merciful to mussels, don't skin your eels alive;
When talking to a turtle don't mention calipee—
Be always kind to animals wherever you may be.

EPITAPHY APROPOS OF KEROSENE.

With oil of coal who lights the fire
Will be knocked like a kite, but higher.

Against coal oil I oft gave warning,
But Bridget's friends are now in mourning.

Not to use petroleum I Mary did advise,
But alack-a-day her body in tae kirkyard lies.

'Twere better far o'er fire to linger
Than with coal oil to burn your finger.

Kindle with kerosene, then ride ye
Like the prophet of old—Elijah.

The kerosene kitchen help is a peripatetic fire-bug

Dickery, dickery, dock,
The oil set fire to her frock;
The flame was red, and she was dead,
Dickery, dickery dock.

Put on the kindling, dash on the oil,
When the fire burns the kettle will boil;
When the can bursts the house is aflame,
And, as is usual, there is no one to blame.

Ah, indeed, what might hav been,
Were it not for kerosene.
There now. —Philadelphia Times.

TEXAS preachers frequently find it a serious task to preserve order in their congregations. At Dallas, recently, a minister arose before a large audience, took his text, and began preaching. A brisk firing of pistols began on the outside of the church.

"Brother Deacon," said the minister, "I believe those fellows are casting insinuations at me. In fact, I am very nearly convinced," he continued, as a piece of plastering fell from the wall close to his head.

"I think, parson, that it refers to some one else," replied the deacon.

The minister raised a tumbler of water, and was in the act of applying it to his lips, when the glass fell, shattered by a shot.

"This is an innuendo no longer," said the minister, wiping the water from his vest; "this is what I term an unmistakable thrust. The congregation will please sing while I go out and investigate the matter. Is there another preacher in the house?"

"Yes," said a man, throwing down a stick which he had been whittling, arising and pulling at the waist of his pants like a man who had just straightened up after setting out a row of tobacco across a broad field.

"Got on an extra?"

"Yes."

"Unlimber"

The whittling preacher handed over a large Remington pistol, which the insulted preacher took, and, drawing one from his belt, started out. After going out there was an immediate improvement in the firing business. It was decidedly more lifelike, insomuch that the deacons sat working their fingers. After a while the minister returned, and placing an ear and the nostril and a half of a nose on the pulpit, remarked, "He that hath ears to hear, let him behave himself." The sermon then proceeded without interruption.

THE BOSTON INVESTIGATOR,
The oldest reform journal in the United States,
Is published every Wednesday at the Paine Memorial Building, Boston, Mass.,
By JOSIAH P. MENDUM
Edited by HORACE SEAVER.
PRICE, $3.00 per annum; single copies, seven cents. Specimen copies sent on receipt of a two-cent stamp to pay postage.
The Investigator is devoted to the Liberal cause in religion; or in other words, to universal mental liberty. Independent in all its discussions, discarding superstitious theories of what never can be known, it devotes its columns to things of this world alone, and leaves the next, if there be one, to those who hav entered its unknown shores. Believing that it is the duty of mortals to work for the interests of this world, it confines itself to the things of this life entirely. It has arrived at the age of fifty-one years, and asks for a support from those who are fond of sound reasoning, good reading, reliable news, anecdotes, science, art, and a useful family journal. Reader please send your subscription for six months or one year and if you are not satisfied with the way the Investigator is conducted, we won't ask you to continue with us any longer 3m53

The Process of Mental Action; OR,
HOW WE THINK.
By Spirit M. Faraday.
Among the many subjects treated are: Spirit life the best place in which to study the mind.—The mental surprise that a change of vibration among the atoms produces.—Why brutes suffer less pain than men.—Why mammalia are more sensitiv than lower orders.—The brain is not the fountain of thought.—An analysis of the brain will never reveal the mind.—What makes people stupid.—Why reformers are persecuted.—Why Prof. Faraday would correct his earth statements.—What makes fanatics.—How a child develops the power to think.—The effect of language in developing the power to think.—How the reason originates.—Why races sometimes remain stationary from generation to generation.—How to break the power of ignorance.—The importance of shocking the minds of sluggish people.—The penalty of living without thinking.—Is there a limit to mental development while in the body?—How knowledge transcending human attainments can be transmitted to man.—As man advances he can better analyze himself.

"DESIGN" IN NATURE.
REPLIES TO THE
"Christian Guardian" and "Christian Advocate."
By ALLEN PRINGLE.
This pamphlet was considered necessary because the paper attacking Mr. Pringle refused to publish his reply to it. Its criticism was upon Mr. Pringle's argument against design in nature, and this work contains both the attack and reply. It is valuable, as it presents the strongest Christian evidence for the existence of God with the complete and overwhelming refutation.

THE BIBLE—WHENCE AND WHAT?
BY
Richard B. Westbrook, D.D., LL.B.,
A theologian of high degree, and a counsellor learned in the law, on the origin and character of the Bible.
The author, though possessing all the prerogativs of a clergyman, repudiates the title "Rev." as a relic of Brahmanical caste and Roman sacerdotalism. He is entirely independent of ecclesiastical supervision and censure.
The questions, Where did the books of the Bible come from? What is their authority? and, What is the real source of dogmatic theology? are treated fearlessly in the light of history, philosophy, and comparativ religions. It is impossible to giv even a condensed statement of what is itself a marvelous condensation.
WHOLE LIBRARIES ARE HERE CONCENTRATED INTO ONE LITTLE BOOK.
The author's conclusions are, of course, against the supernatural origin and infallibility of the Bible, while the dogmas of the dominant theology are shown to be priestly perversions of the ancient mythologies.
The principles of natural religion are ably stated, and the claims of true morality are warmly adgocated.
The strong commendations of the secular prass show that is just the book for these times of agitation and "revision."

MR. AND MRS. HERRICK were separated by divorce, at Corinth, eighteen years ago. Both married again, and lived a long distance apart until recently, when they met and immediately eloped together.

IT is announced that Brother Sankey is to spend thirty days in visiting his friends and relations, and is now in New Castle, Pa., his old home. In September he is to return to England and rejoin Moody in a tour of England and Wales.

IN the seventeenth century, when the Scottish intellect was darkened by ignorance and superstition, it was held that there was nothing beautiful on earth; painting was tabooed; and to write poetry was considered a serious offense against society.

THE people of Peoria, Ill., hav become much annoyed with the noise and disturbance made upon the streets of that city by the Salvation Army. It is a pity that the band of senseless zealots cannot conduct themselvs more in the bounds of reason.

THE Rev. Mr. Van Meter is now on a begging expedition to raise money to send him back to Italy to propagate the religion of Jesus according to Protestantism. Inasmuch as Italy is one of the first Christian countries in the world, the very home of the church, it would seem a much better use could be made of the money.

LONDON has more than a thousand charitable institutions of every grade, and for a vast variety of commendable purposes. The aggregate income of these is over $20,000,000. There are mong them 82 hospitals and 47 dispensaries, whose united yearly receipts are $2,500,000. And yet there is much unrelieved misery in the British metropolis.

ON the evening of the 4th inst. a beautiful display of what many considered Aurora Borealis or Northern Lights appeared in the northern heavens, bright bands of light extending nearly to the zenith. A finer display is said to not hav appeared for half a century. Henry Morris insists that it was not the Aurora Borealis, but rather the zodiacal light.

D. M. BENNETT reached New York yesterday. His circuit of the world has thrown more light on men and things, religions and manners, than any other traveler. What he saw as described will fill four large volumes. Everything of interest is treated in a most interesting manner; not a word too much, nor has he left anything inadequately presented.—The Liberal.

WALTZING is being regarded as immoral. Professor James P. Welsh, dancing master, has begun a crusade against it upon the ground that the sexes are thus brought in such close contact as to produce a dangerous effect. He thus expresses himself: "I hav been a dancing master for the past ten years, and hav made it a practice throughout that period to observe carefully the changes in the public taste, and to note the changes for better or worse in my prosfession. I hav watched closely and thought deeply on the subject, and now I hav no hesitation in saying that the waltz, under whatsoever name it may go for the time being, is immoral. It is the only dance that decent people protest against, and I am happy to say that there still remain numbers of careful fathers who will not allow their daughters to dance it, although a vast proportion of the fashionable, and a majority of the others, do not seem as yet awakened to its iniquity."

THERE are among the ministers of this city several secret Greek letter societies, containing about twenty-five members each. They hav meetings at the St. Denis Hotel and other places once a month, usually on the first Monday, and hav dinner. Sometimes a rose is suspended over the table to indicate that all that occurs is sub rosa. One of these societies is the Alpha Sigma, and another is the Sigma Chi. The latter is composed chiefly of Presbyterian ministers. Their first object is to afford a place for ministers to meet without restraint, where the talk may be in confidence, and where private notes, observations, and experiences may be compared. It is difficult for a strange minister to obtain admission to these societies, and candidates' names are considered a long time, as it takes a unanimous vote to elect. If these godly shepherds become so communicativ on the hilarious occasions alluded to as to divulge the good times they hav had with the ewe lambs of their flocks, the meetinge must hav a special interest to those pious men of ardent love who congregate there.

A VERY unpleasant report appears in the daily press respecting the Rev. Henselman, of the Christian church in Canton, Ohio. Three ladies make the charge against their spiritual guide to the effect that he so far lost the fear of God as to kiss them without their consent and despite their struggles to the contrary. One of the ladies is a widow to whom the kiss was given by way of consolation a few hours after her husband had been laid in his grave. The two other ladies hav husbands, one of whom is so unsanctified as to exact $300 damages for the indignity offered to his wife. Brother Henselman thinks this sum is far more than the kiss was worth to him, and more than others just as good would cost; but inasmuch as the injured husband threatens to put a bullethole through the body of the pastor if the money is not promptly paid, the man of God has secured the payment of the same. He justifies himself by insisting he has committed no crime, he having done quite as much in many other cases when no fuss was made about it. The brethren as well as the sisters of the church are greatly excited over this kissing business, and a church trial, it is thought, will be the result.

AWAY out in Manitoba the Mennonites are divided into two parties, each of which is waging against the other a war of unrelenting bitterness. The question involved is not one concerning original sin, future damnation, or the everlasting punishment of the wicked. Were it any of these, the contest might be less bitter. It is one of the most petty matters in dress, or rather in dress trimming. One side is known as the Hook-and-eye party; the other is called the Button party. The old fashion among the Mennonites was for the brethren to fasten their coats with hooks and eyes. The progressiv among them hav recently introduced the fashion of using buttons and buttonholes, just as the world's people do, but still adhering to the practice of having the garment cut straight in front from the neck down. The Hook-and-eye party denounce the use of buttons as sinful conformity to the ways of a wicked world, and regard the wearers of buttons as the enemies of pure and undefiled religion. The Buttonites insist that there is no sin in buttons, and that they are far more convenient than hooks and eyes. The Hook-and-eye party can make some show of scripture for their side of the controversy, for both hooks and eyes are mentioned in the Bible, while buttons are not once spoken of

IT will be remembered by many that about five years ago the Rev. Augustus Blauvelt, an orthodox clergyman of the Dutch Reformed church, a man of character and learning, and honored by all who knew him, was placed upon a prolonged trial for heresy before the ecclesiastical authorities of his church, the result of which was a verdict of guilty against him, and he was tabooed as an "unbeliever." During the years that hav since intervened, the gentleman has continued the investigations he had previously inaugurated, and the first fruits of all this is a volume called "The Present Religious Crisis." The work is a heavy blow to the system of Supernaturalism upon which Christianity is founded. He advances upon the bulwarks and battlements of orthodoxy, and assails with powerful weapons the very citadels of ecclesiastical power. He challenges the fundamental dogmas of the faith which he has thrown aside, and deals his powerful blows with the skill of an experienced combatant. His work will not fail to carry conviction to thousands of studious men who may read it, and will aid them to reach the goal of Rationalism to which he has attained. The volume will be followed by two others, which promis to be equally radical and damaging to orthodoxy. The price of the volume already issued is $1.50,

THREE or four citizens were the other day having a confab at the east entrance of the City Hall in regard to will power, and there was one of the group who dared to go far enough to assert that a man of strong will power could draw a person to him from a distance of one hundred feet. "Try it; try it!" exclaimed one whose faith was slight. "I don't say that I can do it, because I may not hav the strength of will." "Well, there is a man down by the gate who is looking up and down as if undecided. Bend your will on him and see if you can draw him this way." "I'll try it just to please you," replied the advocate, and he fastened his gaze on the man, clenched his hands, and put forth a mighty effort. The man at the gate seemed to feel it. He looked across at the monument down the street, then up at the hall. "I'll be hanged if you aren't doing it," whispered one of the group. The advocate braced himself for a greater effort, and the man at the gate left his place and walked straight toward the building. He advanced like one in a dream, and not a man man dared move a hand. He came closer and closer, and as he reached the steps he pulled a paper from his pocket, held it up to the man with the will power, and quickly remarked: "Mr. Blank, here's that old bill for three cords of wood! I'm tired of trotting around after you. and want my money to-day, or I'll begin suit!"—Detroit Free Press.

IMMEDIATELY after the departure of the Evangelist Harrison from the Loveland camp-meeting, rumors until that time suppressed were given circulation He had arrived on the ground four days later than the contract called for, and left two days ahead of time, yet wanted his full pay. A cottage built and furnished at an outlay of $500 was given him, and he offered to sell it for $200. It was assumed that he exhibited a mercenary spirit entirely out of keeping with gentlemen of the cloth. Last year the subject was broached of erecting a cottage on the camp grounds for the use of the evangelist. The ladies became greatly interested, and one of them, Mrs. Joseph L. Hall, personally went out and secured the fund. The cottage, a neat little two-story affair, was built, nicely furnished, and formally presented to Mr. Harrison, the receipted bills being immediately handed him after the presentation speech. Time went along, and the present summer camp was inaugurated. As one of the features, arrangements were made for a visit from Mr. Harrison, at the usual stipend. Somewhat of a breeze was raised when it leaked out that he had been endeavoring to sell the house, the gift to him of the ladies. Two hundred dollars was the figure he asked. No time was lost by some adherents of one of the factions in giving him to understand that the building was not his to sell, and there the matter dropped. On Monday he went before Dr. Runyan, secretary of the association, and asked to be released from the two remaining days of his contract. It then transpired that he had erred in the dates in some way, as his time was then up. This adjusted, he raised a question of allowance for expenses, and on this point Dr. Runyan differed with him, and it took several minutes of conversation pro and con to get the matter finally settled, and he departed, the opinion of many being that his days of usefulness in Cincinnati are over.—Cincinnati Commercial.

A STREET preacher of Brooklyn who made himself a nuisance to tradesmen was thoroughly sprinkled by an honest German baker before whose establishment he had begun exhorting. The crowd he collected broke the baker's windows and he took this method to let the clerical gent know he disagreed with his methods, if not with his tenets of belief.

ARABI still holds out and fights the British occasionally, inflicting a good deal of damage upon them and killing many men. The prospects are that there will be considerable of a war streak in the clouds of European politics before the atmosphere clears up. It may be a "holy" war on the part of the Mussulmans of Egypt against the European usurers.

THE TEMPLE OF THE QUEEN OF HEAVEN

Possesses more than ordinary interest. The Chinese name of this heavenly queen is Tien-Hau, and she is greatly revered by the Chinese; she is a Tauist divinity. Like many of the gods of whom we have heard so much, she once lived in the flesh and in human form. She was a member of the Lum family, and was born in the province of Fokien. When in the womb of her mother she remained there five months longer than the usual time (it seems to take Chinese gods fourteen months to pass through the period of gestation); but when she did come into the world remarkable supernatural events occurred to presage to mankind her future greatness. When she was but one year old her precocity was so great as to enable her to understand the duties which she owed to the gods, and that is more than I have learned to this day. At the age of five years she was so far advanced in her studies as to be able to comprehend all difficult and abstruse subjects. At the age of eleven she expressed a desire to go to a nunnery, with the view of giving her attention to the tenets of the Tauist religion, but her father was so opposed to it that, like a good little girl, she remained at home and pleased her father. She had four brothers, and they were merchants, and in the pursuit of their vocations made voyages to the distant parts of the world. On one occasion when they were absent from home she fell into a trance, from which she was eventually aroused by the loud cries of her parents, who loved her most tenderly, and who thought from her apparent lifelessness that she was dead. But upon her recovery from the trance she informed her parents that she had seen her brothers navigating the mighty deep, and that their peril was very great from a violent storm to which they were exposed. Soon after this the youngest of her brothers returned home and informed his parents of the shipwreck and death by drowning of their oldest son. He further stated that during the frightful storm a lady appeared in the mid-heavens, and by means of a rope dragged the tempest-tossed and sinking ship from its perilous position to one of safety. While he was relating his adventures his sister, the Queen of Heaven, came into the room, and at once congratulated him on his very narrow escape. She also informed him that she had gone to the rescue of the older brother, and was in the act of saving him when the cries of her parents aroused her from the vision. You should learn from this not to wail too loudly when you think a person has died, for you know not how much harm you may do.

When she attained to womanhood she firmly opposed all persuasions on the part of her parents that she should be married; and when she was twenty years of age she was taken from this world; but she returned once a month and revealed herself to her parents, when they knew she had become a goddess; and soon her fame spread so greatly that temples were built in her honor, and she was widely worshiped as the queen of heaven who was able to save poor mariners when in great peril, and it was to her that prayers were offered up in tempests and dangers at sea. On one occasion, when an embassador was on his way across the Yellow Sea with a mission to the kingdom of Corea, a fearful storm arose, and the embassador, in terror at the situation, called earnestly upon this deity, beseeching her to save him and his companions from the yawning deep. Joyful to relate, he had scarcely said the "amen" before a celestial lady was seen coming though the clouds toward the sinking ship. She at once alighted upon the deck of the vessel, and, taking the helm into her hands, guided the ship safely into port. As a reward to this excellent goddess, the emperor, when he heard of the salvation that had been wrought, conferred upon her the title of Sing-Wei-Fu-Yan and caused an expensive temple to be erected for her benefit. A few centuries later another embassador, on a similar errand, while crossing the same sea, was exposed to similar great perils from a furious storm, and was about to be lost when he called upon this goddess, immediately after which she was seen coming across the tossing waves, and soon placed the embassador and the terrified crew in a harbor of safety. Of course this gracious kindness of the goddess was duly reported to the emperor, and his sense of her goodness was so great that he conferred new titles upon her and issued an edict that temples should be erected in her honor in all the provinces of the empire. She is especially worshiped by seamen, fishermen, and all who are exposed to dangers on the water, and state worship is also paid to her. The twenty-third day of the third month is celebrated as her birthday, on which occasion great festivities are observed; and also at the New Year's festivities, the vernal equinox, and the winter solstice, honors are paid to this beneficent goddess.

In this temple is her image, standing under a richly-gilded pavilion. On each side are two subordinate gods, whose business it is to minister to her wants. On each side of the grand entrance to the temple a large idol is stationed, and these may be regarded as the sentinels guarding the holy place. They are supposed to cast their eyes over the ocean, and if they see any persons in danger of destruction by water, they report the case to the goddess without delay, when she immediately interferes and saves the perishing.

At the extreme end of the shrine are two rooms, regarded as the private apartments of the goddess. One is her reception-room, and the other her bedchamber. In the latter is an elaborately-carved bedstead, a toilet service, dressing-case, clothes-stand, and chairs. The bedstead is rich with gold and vermilion, and the curtains, presented by a devout lady, are very rich.

Now I hope none of you will be so ungenerous as to deny the right of the Chinese to have a queen of heaven. You well know that the Christians have one, over which they make very great ado. I have seen many hundreds of her images in the churches and cathedrals of Europe, and some of the images of the Christian queen are decorated with the richest silk robes, the most brilliant diamonds, and many other rich ornaments. Her admirers never get done sounding her praises and showering honors upon her, though I have not heard that she ever saved one embassador, or ever interfered to rescue one poor drowning sailor. I cannot see, for my part, why the Chinese have not just as much right to have a queen of heaven as those dirty monks and priests over in Rome, Naples, Florence, and Milan.

TEMPLE OF THE FIVE GENII.

The term "genii," with the Chinese, means holy and celestial beings, almost amounting to gods. These five genii are regarded as the patron gods of Canton. It is asserted that during the Chau dynasty (a thousand years before the Christian era) these five genii, each riding a ram, and bearing in his hand an ear of corn, the first wearing a white dress, the second a yellow, the third a black, the fourth a green, and the fifth a red dress, rode into the city of Canton. On passing one of the principal markets they spoke out simultaneously, in a loud voice, "May famine never visit the markets of this place!" As soon as these words were uttered they immediately flew away through the air. From this circumstance the city has been variously called the City of Rams, the City of the Five Genii, or the City of Five Angels. On the ground where the rams stood were found five stones, which were easily imagined to bear some resemblance to rams, and it was at once admitted that the rams on which the genii rode into the city had been changed into these rocks. They were, in consequence, regarded with great veneration, and were eventually deposited in the college of the magistrate, from which place they were removed to the shrine in the temple, where they now are. They are placed upon an altar, and in the rear of them are the images of the five genii who rode upon them when rams. Though these stones were thus under the immediate protection of the genii, they were so badly affected by the heat of a great conflagration which took place in 1864 that one or two of them cracked in pieces. But the devout Chinese gathered them up and placed them together as they belonged, and conveyed them to the shrine they now occupy.

The first of these divine personages is believed to be the genius of fire, the second of wood, the third of earth, the fourth of metal, and the fifth of water, and they are said to be able to cure any of the ailments incident to the human body. The Tauist priests say the body is composed of fire, earth, metal, water, and wood, and that if they are in equal proportion, health is secured; but when one preponderates over another, sickness is the sad result. To restore, therefore, the proper equilibrium between the five elements, the genii are appealed to. And to secure their attention the greatest humility is manifested by the supplicants for their mercy. The apparel worn by convicts is put on, and chains and shackles are affected to show their utter unworthiness and to secure the mercy of the genii.

In front of the shrine of the five genii stands a great bell-tower. The bell is said to be the largest in southern China, weighing sixteen tons. It is believed that whenever this bell is sounded evil immediately befalls the city, so it is never sounded; but once upon a time the custodian hit it by accident, and in consequence, as is believed, a fatal epidemic broke out in the city in the same year, by which a thousand children were destroyed. At a later date the bell was unfortunately hit again, in consequence of which a game-cock became so frightened that it flew from the tower where the bell hangs, alighting at a certain spot in the Canton river, and to this day the superstitious Chinamen imagine that they occasionally hear this cock crowing. In 1845 the tower of the bell was repaired, which made it necessary to lower the bell to the earth; and to do this without its being struck a special number of careful workmen were delegated for the purpose; but with all the care that could be exercised, it was inadvertently struck, after which several Tartars sickened and died, and the theater took fire, by which three thousand people were burned to death. Again, in 1865, when the English were bombarding the city, this bell was hit by a falling shot, and to this circumstance the people attribute the capture of their city.

A MONKEY GOD.

One of the shrines of this last temple is a small one in honor of a monkey god, canonized under the rather pretentious name of "The Great Sage of the Whole Heavens;" and as his story is almost as remarkable as that of the snake of Eden, who succeeded so well in the fruit business, I must tell it to you and see if you do not agree with me that this monkey was not also more subtle than all the other beasts of the field. If you find the story somewhat improbable I beg you to remember that there is also a slight improbability about the snake story, and try and think that the Chinese possess the same right to a learned and wonderful monkey that the Jews have to a learned and wonderful snake. For my own part, I see less that is repulsive in a monkey than in a snake, and he seems far more subtle and intelligent than a snake; but to the story:

Once upon a time, when events outside of the ordinary course of nature used to take place more frequently than they do now, a large boulder or smooth rock on the summit of a mountain, called the "Flowery Mountain," by receiving the action of the rays of the sun through the day and the moon at night, eventually hatched out a monkey, and probably one of the most remarkable monkeys that was ever hatched out before or since. He was ambitious and wished to be a king, so he summoned to his presence all the monkeys in the neighboring forests, and in the most positive tones which a monkey can assume proclaimed himself their king, and gave them to understand that he expected implicit obedience from them. This, like good little monkeys, they accorded to him, and he thus became a prosperous and honored king. After a time he conceived the notion that monkeys ought to speak and dress like human beings. So he stole a suit of clothes, which proved to be a pretty good fit, and then he concluded to leave the forest and be a man among men. He soon acquired a good knowledge of the language and customs of men, and expressed a desire to visit the western paradise, Sai-Tien, in order that he might there obtain an elixir of life, and live forever. (I imagine it was a fluid extract of the fruit which grew on the Tree of Life).

On his way to paradise, having to cross a large ocean, he constructed a vessel for the purpose which served extremely well. Upon debarking he met a man on the sea-shore who was gathering fuel, and said to him that he wished to find an angel or genius named Poo-Tai-Tso-Sze, and asked directions how to find him. Luckily the fuel-gatherer possessed the desired information, and informed Mr. Monkey that the angel resided in a certain grotto with a long Chinese name, on the slope of a holy mountain, which he pointed out. Thither the monkey bent his steps, and easily found the grotto and the angel. The angel was very much pleased with his visitor and the visitor was pleased with the angel, and concluded to abandon for a while the visit to paradise, remaining with this angel in the grotto, and with whom he absolutely stayed for the term of ten years, at the close of which period he found he possessed the power to assume the form of not less than seventy-two different animals and things. The angel was so good as to bestow on him the beautiful name of Suen-Eng-Huung, and to impart to him the power to fly at any time, and from any point, the distance of one hundred and eighty thousand miles, which would seem enough for ordinary purposes.

After flying round considerably, and finding he had pretty good command of his wings, he visited the mountain where he was born, where he called all his subjects around him, and narrated to them his adventures among men and with the angel in the grotto. The monkeys, of course, listened attentively to him, but in reply they told him of the great losses they had sustained in his absence, from the attacks of the Prince of Evil. This sad intelligence decided the monkey king to wage a war of extermination against this great evil spirit. As powerful as was this wicked being, the monkey easily overcame him; but lest further encroachments should be made from the same source the monkey monarch entertained the enterpise of supplying himself with more invincible weapons of warfare than those he possessed, and he concluded to visit, without delay, Hoi-Luung-Wong, or the "Ocean Dragon King," for the purpose of despoiling him of irresistible weapons which he possessed. With this extraordinary monkey to conceive was to execute, and he soon reached the Ocean King, and, with his unfailing success, succeeded in his enterprise. But this kingly dragon felt so outraged at the insults which the monkey monarch had inflicted upon him that he determined to submit the whole matter to the "Pearly Emperor," Yunk-Wong-Tai. Thie resolution he carried into effect, and consequently a general engagement took place between the monkey monarch on the one hand and the forces of the great Yunk-Wong-Tai on the other. The contest, of course, was of the very fiercest character, and it might be thought that the monkey would not be able to stand against such an army; but, armed with the sea-needle, of which he had robbed the Dragon King, he was able to achieve a glorious victory.

He was not, however, satisfied to rest upon his laurels, but, like a wise general, resolved to follow up his victories and attack the palace of Yuuk-Wong-Tai, and before its walls dictate his own terms of peace. It was not his nature to delay the execution of his resolutions, so he at once carried out his plan. Yunk-Wong-Tai sought to appease his adversary by appointing him to rule over horses, but the monkey monarch was not to be caught with such chaff; his aspirations were far above attending to horses, and he at once gave Yunk-Wong-Tai to understand that unless he conferred upon him (the monkey monarch) the grand and august title of "The Great Sage of the Whole Heavens," he would immediately move upon his works. There was no course for Yunk-Wong-Tai to take but to yield to the monkey's demands. He conferred the title, and that is the way in which that monkey came to be The Great Sage of the Whole Heavens, and we may here see what perseverence and energy can accomplish, especially with a resolute monkey.

After all these glorious achievements the Great Monkey Sage again decided to visit the Western Paradise, and this time he made no halt till he reached that blissful locality; and no sooner had he arrived than he found a large peach-tree heavily laden with magnificent fruit, which had been a thousand years in perfecting. Being still a little thievish, as monkeys usually are, he stole one of these peaches and ate it; the result was he received the power of living forever. It may be that this peach-tree was the identical "tree of life," which was planted in the Garden of Eden and then transplanted in this Western Paradise; it seems to have been taken somewhere, for no one has ever been able to find it or the garden where it was planted.

So soon as the angels residing in this paradise missed one of the peaches, and found that the monkey had eaten it, they were greatly troubled, and severely censured the angel whose duty it was to watch that peach-tree, who excused himself by saying that no one was able to resist such a monkey as that. But it was decided by the angels in council that the monkey must be seized and put to death. The seizing was effected, but as he had eaten one of the peaches he could not be put to death, though the most vigorous efforts were made to do so. The best that could be done by all the aid that could be brought to bear was to confine him within the boundaries of five sacred mountains for the term of five hundred years. When he had served out his term of imprisonment he was permitted to again visit the Western Paradise, taking a companion and two servants with him. This visit was made for the purpose of obtaining copies of the Sai King, or sacred scriptures, written by the gods. He succeeded in obtaining copies of this remarkable work, but unfortunately while on his way from that delectable country one of his servants was so careless as to let the divine volumes fall into the ocean. The monkey sage, however, quickly recovered them and so spread the volumes that the rays of the sun could fall upon them and dry out the salt water, and to superintend the drying process the same careless servant who had let them fall into the sea was placed in charge. The stupid fellow, however, fell into a deep sleep, and a big fish came and destroyed the entire volumes save these six words, Naam, Mo, O, Mi, To, Fat. Perhaps it was very fortunate that the monstrous fish was unable to destroy those six words. Who knows what the world might have lost if those six monosyllables had been completely wiped out? After all the wonderful exploits of the monkey monarch, or god, as his worshipers consider him, the emperor of China caused a temple to be erected to his honor, and ever since that time it has been regarded a virtue for devout Chinaman to pay homage to him.

Now, my friends, I am afraid that some of you will be a little skeptical about this monkey story, and think it smacks very strongly of the improbable; but if you can swallow the Jewish snake story, why can you not also gulp down the Chinese monkey story? I repeat, the monkey tale is fully as probable as the snake tale. I can believe one just as easily as the other, and I must say I think the monkey story the prettier and more sensible of the two. Millions believe in the snake, and millions more believe in the monkey, and if you cannot believe in either it is because you have not as much faith as the Christians and the Chinese.

THE CONFUCIAN TEMPLE.

I was anxious to visit one of the temples of the great sage of China to see how far it agrees with others. The edifice is approached by a triple gateway; on each side is a large stone slab or pillar, on which are engraved inscriptions reminding rulers and others who visit the temple to do so with reverence. A court is passed through before the temple is reached, and within it is a moderate-sized reservoir of holy water, designed to typify the purity of the life and teachings of the great sage. In front of the entrance to the temple above the altar is an image of Confucius, three times the size of life, and in a sitting posture. He is a grave and rather majestic-looking personage, with something of severity in his countenance. It is not usual in the Confucian temples to set up images of him, as he was opposed to everything of the kind, but as the popular prejudices are so strong in favor of statues, and the reverence for him is so great, this image was set up here, and probably with the same kind of reverential feeling that Christians have when rearing images and pictures of Jesus. This statue of Confucius is said to have been erected by the litterati of the country, the educated portion of the people being the special adherents of the Confucian system.

On each side of the quadrangle is a long cloister containing several small shrines, above the altars of which are tablets bearing the names of the seventy-two special disciples whom Confucius is said to have selected from the three hundred who followed him with devout reverence. They were noted for their piety and extensive literary attainments. In the second quadrangle is a shrine in honor of the parents and grandparents of the great philosopher. He distinctly enjoined filial reverence, holding it up as the chiefest of virtues.

On the first and fifteenth of each lunar month, as well as at the vernal equinox and the winter solstice, the followers of the eminent sage gather here to worship him. The viceroy acts as the high priest on the occasion, and the various officials are duly allotted their places of honor in the vast multitude which gathers. Sacrifices of bullocks, sheep, and hogs are made, as are also offerings of fruit, flowers, cakes and wine; and on extra occasions many pieces of silk are burnt to his honor. At the proper time during the ceremonies the viceroy prostrates himself and performs the Kow-Tau, while the other officials bow themselves low to the earth. The words spoken by the viceroy are of this import: "Kneel, bow your faces to the ground, and then rise to your feet." On one side of the altar an orchestra is placed, attired in robes of state, and they play on musical instruments and chant praises to the memory of Confucius. A prayer which has been written with exquisite care is then read in a loud voice, after which a blaze is brought in contact with it, and it is burnt under the belief that by so doing it will be at once borne to the realm where the great teacher is supposed to reside.

A SHRINE TO VIRTUOUS WOMEN

Stands on the opposite side of the street from the temple of Confucius. It is called Ching-Tsit I-Nue-Tsze. In it, and immediately above the altar which it contains are arranged on shelves numerous wooden tablets recording the names of women who have passed their lives in virginity, this being regarded as a virtue worth recording. In honor of these women a granite monumental arch stands in the court of the shrine. Many of these women were affianced when young, but the young men to whom they were betrothed having died before the nuptials were celebrated they resolved to give their hearts not again to others, but to pass their lives as virgins and as adopted daughters of the parents of their departed lovers. Here are recorded also the names of many widows who after losing their husbands deliberately resolved to live no longer in this world, but to follow their husbands in death by suicide. Suicide of such widows, or sutteeism, is also regarded as a most meritorious act. I have seen an account published in the Hong Kong Daily Press of a heroic death of this kind, by hanging, of a Chinese widow in the province of Fokien. The writer saw a procession escorting a young woman seated in a sedan chair and arrayed in scarlet and gold. The procession was a kind of notification to the public that the woman was about to sacrifice herself and follow her departed husband, who had left her childless. The writer followed the procession, and was led to a place where a gallows was erected in a field, around which were assembled hundreds of the widow's friends and neighbors, all clad in their holiday attire. The lady was assisted by her male attendants to ascend the steps to the scaffold, and, after pleasantly bowing to the crowds, as much as to welcome them there, she partook, with several female friends, of a repast which had been prepared for the occasion and placed upon a table on the scaffold, in full sight of the multitude, and she partook of the meal with an apparent good relish. A small child was then placed upon the table, and this she caressed; and taking the necklace from her own neck placed it upon the neck of the child. She then took a richly-ornamented basket containing rice, herbs, and flowers, pleasantly scattered the contents among the crowd, and then delivered a short address to them, thanking them for their attendance and vindicating the step she was about to take, believing that she would thereby not only rejoin her dead husband, but be admitted into the joys of heaven. This done, a salute from the bombards announced that the awful moment had arrived when she must perform the last sad deed. A slight delay was occasioned by the non-arrival of a reluctant brother, who objected to her taking this rash step, but who desired should be present to witness it. The woman was soon induced to appear, when the fatal noose was mounted a chair placed under the and to ascertain its fitness, deliberately placed her head in it; then, withdrawing it, she waved a final adieu to the attentive spectators, again placed her head within the noose for the last time, throwing at the same instant a red handkerchief over her face. The supports upon which she stood were about to be removed, when several among the spectators called to her reminding her that she had not drawn the ring which was designed to tighten the cord around her neck and produce strangulation. Smiling an acknowledgment for the friendly reminder, she adjusted the ring, and, motioning away the supports, she was left hanging in the air. With great self-possession she placed her hands before her and held them there till, in the struggles of death, they were separated, and her life had departed. Her body was allowed to hang there about half an hour, and was then taken down and conveyed to the temple. The reporter followed, placed himself close to the body, saw the handkerchief removed from her face, and satisfied himself that the woman was really dead. Such cases are said to be of frequent occurrence. We cannot, of course, approve of such kind of a taking off, and think her misguided; but it must be admitted that she was a brave, heroic woman, and that she exhibited far more firmness and courage than a certain person who was said to be crucified some eighteen hundred and fifty years ago; though we are led to suppose that he had far more to gain by death than had this poor Chinese woman. If his death had not taken place till he procured it himself, as this woman did hers—no matter how much glory might be in waiting for him—we have every reason to suppose he would be alive yet.

A PROPHETIC STONE

Rests in the temple of Sai-Yan-Tong, in Chi-Hong-Kai street. It is visited chiefly by women, particularly those who are in the condition that Hannah was before Yahweh was kind enough to open her womb for her. These women flock to this stone of prophecy to ascertain whether their barrenness is to be removed, whether they will be blessed with a child, and if so, when the glad event will take place. The stone which contains such remarkable powers is somewhat larger than a human head, and rests upon a tripod. When gazed upon by wishful wives the stone is supposed to reflect pictures or visions, by which the good ladies are shown the fortune in store for them. It is visited by women in all classes of society, and all, of course, have to pay to the priests who have the stone in charge a fee for the use of it, though rich women are charged a good deal more than poor ones. A child is supposed to be worth more to the rich than to the poor, and it is perhaps well enough that they should pay handsomely to the priests who help them to get one. A god is placed above the stone, to which these beseeching Hannahs betake themselves in their great anxiety, but I hardly think it is Yahweh, for it is a tolerably decent-looking sort of a god, whom the Chinese call by the handy and euphonius name of Wai-Ling-Kom-Ying-Shek-Nue-Sin-Neung-Shan-Wai. Possibly this name would have been continued somewhat longer had not the monosyllables given out. But it is this god's business to keep a good watch over the stone and give a kind smile to those whose wombs are to be opened. All mothers, Americans as well as Chinese, who have thus been blessed by this prophetic stone, yes, and the priests, too, have the perfect liberty to call the fruit of their hopes and prayers by the name of this god, unless it is a girl. I don't think it is a very pretty name for a girl; I should prefer Mary or Kittie or Annie or Maggie, or something of that kind.

THE TEMPLE OF THE DRAGON GOD

Contains the image of the deific dragon who is supposed to send and withhold rain according to his own fickle whim. The image was made at Pekin and forwarded to Canton by order of one of the august emperors who once ruled over this great nation. State worship is accorded to this god—that is, the highest officials of the government in the city assemble at this temple on the first and fifteenth of every lunar month, and at the vernal equinox and winter solstice, and sacrifices of sheep, pigs, and fowls are made on these occasions. In seasons of drouth special supplications are made to the deity, and fasts are enjoined, and butchers, fish-mongers, and poulterers are required to close their shops. The highest officials not only put on "sackcloth and ashes"—that is, array themselves in mourning habiliments—but they abuse themselves, and, by deep penitence, fasting, and prayer, do their utmost to work upon the feelings of this powerful dragon which holds in his hands the power to give rain to the thirsty earth. But, when, for some inscrutable reason, this god who holds the clouds and the winds in his hands sees fit to not send the greatly needed rain it is thought that some serious sins have been committed and that human sacrifices are required to appease his anger and secure again the pluvial blessings; and it is no unusual thing for devout believers to offer themselves to the authorities as sacrifices to secure the condescending mercy of this dragon god. Formerly these human offerings were sometimes accepted, but in latter times the rulers have gained a little more common sense, and deem it not best to take human life to please any god, even the dragon.

But superstition of the grossest kind hangs over this people, and I cannot help feeling sorry for them from my very heart, as I am sorry for the equally misguided men and women in our own country who, like these benighted Chinese, think their god has the weather under his control, and who pray to him for rain or for fair weather with the same superstitious faith that the people here evince in praying to their weather dragon. If there could be any efficacy in prayer I would pray day and night that the people of both countries might get rid of all their superstition and blind delusion about the power of their god managing the weather, or anything else in existence. I would have them see that the rain and fair weather depend wholly upon natural causes, and that none of the gods, whether Chinese or Jewish, on either side of the world, have the slightest power in the matter. But as praying does no good to dispel such ignorance and folly, I will continue to labor to the best of my ability to show those who have a measure of good sense the utter futility of spending their time in offering up prayers for rain, or for anything else they cannot obtain by their own efforts or from their fellow-beings.

THE TEMPLE OF CHAANG-OHU-KI

Stands directly across the street from the temple of the Dragon, and is in honor of a god who dates back from 250 B.C., in the era when gods were conceived rather more frequently than now. He was a high minister of state in the Chinese empire and was sent by Chi-Awang-ti, the emperor, on a mission to Canton to pluck from the slopes of the White Cloud Mountain a few handfuls of the small plant which grew there, supposed to possess the power of imparting immortal life. On his arrival at the mountain he readily found the remarkable herb growing in great abundance. The first thing he did was to gather some of the precious plant and eat it himself before plucking any for his imperial master; but no sooner had he done this than all the rest of the plants of the same kind took fright and made themselves invisible, and so thoroughly was this done that not a sprig was left for the emperor. The despair of the good man from this cause was very great, insomuch that he was placed on the "ragged edge," and he even wished he were dead. He greatly feared to encounter his overeign's wrath, and with a view to hide himself from the emperor he resolved to become a hermit, and no more live among the sons of men, thus passing in total seclusion the few remaining years of his life among the solitudes of the mountains. At length, becoming weary of this monotonous and cheerless existence, he resolved to end it by precipitating himself from the top of a precipice to the rocks below. He attempted to carry out this stern resolution, but while still in midair a huge stork, which happened to be passing just at that moment, seized him by the hair on the very top of his head, probably his pigtail, and bore him aloft to heaven, and from that moment he became a god; and in his honor the Cantonese erected a temple upon the summit of the very rock from whence he threw himself, which is a distance of six miles from the city, and which mountain I could see when upon the walls surrounding it. On the twenty-seventh day of the seventh month each year thousands of devout people resort there to ask the blessings of health at the hands of the god of health and long life, who for centuries past has been worshiped with the highest reverence. To this temple in the city of this same god it is however more convenient to repair, and here multitudes go often to pay their homage to their beloved deity, and they are just as sure that their prayers are heard and answered, and can tell as big stories about the efficacy of prayer as can any of those who pray to Yahweh, and what is more, the stories of the Chaang-Ohu-Ki worshipers are just as true as those of the Yahweh worshipers.

THE TEMPLE OF HORRORS.

Shing-Wong, the tutelar deity of the city, is here worshiped. His office is to protect walled cities like Canton. This is a large state têmple, and the various courtyards with which it is provided are literally crowded with stands for fortune-tellers, doctors, dentists, corn-doctors, tobacconists, pastry cooks, etc. No stronger proof than this is required to show that many people flock to this place, for otherwise the charlatans and dealers in various articles would not there have their stalls. Yes, around these stalls from morning till night are to be found men in all the walks of life, the high and the low, the rich and the poor. On each side of the great quadrangle of this temple are five hells, regarded as miniature representations of the ten kingdoms into which the hell believed in by millions of the Chinese is supposed to be divided. This place is denominated the Temple of Horrors from the representations here given of the various forms of punishment inflicted upon the wicked. Among these are a man boiling in oil, a man being ground under stones, a man in red-hot flames, a man being beheaded, a man being sawn asunder, the infliction of the bastinado, processes representing transmigration, trial scene of criminals, etc.

In each of these ten kingdoms of hell is an image of a king or judge sitting in judgment. Around the throne of justice are the ministers of the court, with their respective attendants ready at a moment's warning to execute the commands that may be given them by the royal master. There are also in each compartment images of men and women in the act of undergoing the various punishments which have been meted out to them by the stern judge for the sins they had committed. The first of these kingdoms is presided over by Tsun-Kwong-Wong, and the unfortunate wretches under his supervision are those who have committed suicide or homicide. Here are also the priests and nuns of the Buddhists, who have received money to say masses for the dead and neglected to perform that most important service. Here are also sent the perpetrators of various other crimes.

The punishments visited upon the sinners in this department are various; many are compelled to climb a tall ladder and gaze into a large mirror, which reflects back upon them the form of the beasts, reptiles, birds, fishes, and insects, which they are destined, according to the doctrine of metempsychosis, to occupy, for the bad deeds they have committed. Others are punished, as was Tantalus, by being placed in the midst of water, yet being unable to taste a draught of it, though their thirst be terrible, as well as hunger that cannot be satisfied, though abundance of food is in sight, and almost within reach. Those who have committed homicide are compelled twice a month to undergo the same pains and sufferings which they caused their victims to endure when they took them out of the world. Suicides are punished by being denied the rites of ancestral worship, and after two years of imprisonment in the dark dungeons of this terrible place they are made to return to the very places where they committed the rash acts, and then if they are not penitent, but rather show that they have really become evil spirits, and manifest a disposition to injure the living, they are forced to return to hell and undergo the terrors of a prolonged existence there. When they become repentant and give assurance that they are sorry for what they have done, they are permitted to again return to the earth and go through other forms of existence as animals of some kind.

Speaking of suicides, it may be well to observe here that there are several forms of suicide that are regarded as highly honorable by the Chinese. If a minister of state wishes not to survive an insult offered to his sovereign, it is a most noble thing for him to put an end to his own life. Should a governor or ruler of a city not wish to outlive the capture of his town it is deemed the proper thing for him to do to step down and out by taking his own life. Should a general not wish to live after the disgrace of losing a battle, he is looked upon as a most honorable man if, like Saul, he terminates his own existence. Should a son, unable to revenge an insult offered his father, take himself off by suicide, it is regarded as quite commendable. Should a man who has lost a beloved wife not wish to linger in this vale of tears after his dearly beloved has taken her departure and he wishes to join her in the Chinese summerland, be is greatly honored for shutting off his own oxygen gas. It is the same with a dutiful wife, as already observed, when the husband has gone on before her, to summarily settle up her earthly affairs and follow on after him. And again, should an unmarried woman be so unfortunate, as is sometimes the case, as to lose her virginity, she would be highly approved if she commits suicide, and this last great act is thought to wipe away the stain of the first.

To go back to hades, let me say that the priests and monks and nuns who take fees for saying prayers and masses, and then do not say the prayers and masses for the very souls who are in purgatory, or some place like it, and cannot quite get out for the want of a prayer or mass said in their favor, are righteously confined in a dark chamber named Pu-King-Shau; and from the roof of their prison a very dim lamp is supended, by the insufficient light of which they are compelled to read over and over again the prayers and masses which they did not say after being paid to say them, and which are printed in such fine type that they can hardly make it out in that dark place. That serves them right. I am almost in favor of as much hell as that; and if all the priests in the world who have wilfully and knowingly fooled their fellow-beings by preaching absurd lies about m[illegible] gods and devils, burning hells, and lots of simil[illegible]se, a[illegible]ense, and have taken money for their falseh[illegible] cit[illegible]d to be shut up in that dark prison for abo[illegible]ndred years, to repeat over their silly ser[illegible]orward and backward a few millions of tim[illegible]nd then be made to swallow them, and then vomi[illegible]hem up, and then be made to swallow them aga[illegible], and this to be repeated a few times, it would see[illegible]o be the divinest and best retribution that was ev[illegible]isited upon designing and lying hypocrites. F[illegible]ea[illegible]ly if I get promoted to be a deity of one of th[illegible]e[illegible]er grades I may be in favor of carrying out [illegible] treatment of this kind, unless the offende[illegible]ill rein[illegible]pent, tell the truth, and speak words of goo[illegible]mmo[illegible]n sense.

The [illegible]thday-at[illegible]anniversary of the god who presides over [illegible]ment of the infernal regions is celebra[illegible]on the fir[illegible]t day of the second month of the year; and the belief that those who worship this god will be absolved from all the sins they have committed during the year—in the same way that a Catholic believes he will be absolved from his sins by telling the priest about them and paying a nice little fee for the absolution—as may well be supposed, induces thousands to come here and prostrate themselves.

The second department of the Chinese hell is supposed to be located under the South Sea, and is presided over by a king or god named Choh-Kong-Wong. The class of offenders sent here for punishment are, in the first place, priests who have decoyed and kidnapped little boys from their homes to induce them to become Buddhistic priests; husbands who, for frivolous and insufficient reasons, put away their wives and straightway go looking about for other women; persons who feloniously dispose of other people's property placed in their hands in trust for safekeeping; mandarins who cruelly oppress the people; men who, by the careless use of firearms, maim and injure their fellow-beings; physicians who, ignorant of the business they pretend to follow, persistently subscribe for the sick when their prescriptions make the sick worse instead of better. The punishments meted out to this class of evil-doers are as follows: The kidnapping priests are cast into a lake of ice (which is the worse, that or burning sulphur?); those who rascally dispose of or appropriate other people's property are enveloped in dense clouds of sand, which chokes and suffocates them to death, only it is not possible for them to die; mandarins who oppress the people are here confined in procrustean cages not high enough for them to stand up and too short for them to lie down. After these bad fellows are kept there for an indefinite period (perhaps for a few million years) they are transferred to the tenth department of hell, where they have to remain for another indefinite period, when they are permitted to enter into beasts, birds, reptiles, fishes, or insects, and again be allowed another probation on the earth.

The virtuous who come to this department to receive rewards and honors are those who expended a portion of their means in purchasing medicines for the sick and poor; those who gave dishes of rice to those needy and hungry; those who gave correct instruction to the young and ignorant. This class of doers of good works, after receiving due rewards for their virtuous deeds at the hands of Choh-Kong-Wong, are sent to the tenth department, to again assume human form, to enjoy in this world the riches, honor, and renown to which they are entitled.

The third kingdom is located under the Southeastern Ocean, and its king or judge is Sung-Ti-Wong. Before this potentate are arraigned officials guilty of ingratitude and unfaithfulness toward their sovereign; wives unfaithful to their husbands; sons undutiful to their parents; slaves disobedient to their masters; soldiers mutinous and rebellious; malefactors escaped from prison; merchants who cheat their customers and their partners in trade; men who involve their sureties in trouble; geomancers who give false opinions as to the value of lands and real estate, on which, by their instructions, houses were built or cemeteries established; plowmen who, while plowing lands, disturb the coffins or human bones and fail to give them proper interment in another locality; persons who do not pay their debts; persons who neglect to worship at the tombs of their ancestors; persons who write or publish pasquinades on their neighbors for the purpose of holding them up to scorn and contempt; scribes and amanuenses who do not correctly copy or write books and letters intrusted to them; perjurers and forgers.

The punishments for this class of offenders sent to the third department vary in degree and intensity of suffering. Thus, upon some tigers are let loose to feed upon them, as the vultures fed upon Prometheus, though being always devoured, are never consumed; others are perpetually pierced with sharp-pointed arrows; some are constantly being disemboweled; others are firmly bound to red-hot funnels of brass. But their sufferings are not eternal; after an indefinite period they are transferred to the tenth department, to exist again on earth in some of the forms of animal life. The virtuous who come to this department for rewards are those who, at their own expense, erected bridges over small streams for the benefit of their neighbors; persons who furnished the means for paving highways, etc. These are also consigned to the tenth department, to again return to earth in the persons of honorable, high-minded men.

The fourth department is under the Eastern Sea, and is presided over by Ny-Koon-Wong. The unfortunates who find their way to this place of retribution are those who evade paying their just taxes; tenants who do not pay their rent; physicians who administer the wrong kind of medicine to their patients; merchants who sell bad silk for good; persons who on the streets or in public assemblies do not give place to the blind and infirm; persons who maliciously destroy crops of grain; those who remove their neighbors' landmarks; the Buddhistic priests who violate their monastic vows; libidinous persons, like fornicators and whoremongers, drunkards, busy-bodies, gamblers, and brawlers.

The punishments meted out here are like those in the other departments, somewhat interestingly varied. Some are cast headlong into a lake of blood (not so bad as fire); some are suspended from the beams and rafters in the hall of torture by means of hooks passed through the fleshy parts of their bodies; when these have suffered in proportion to their deserts they are also sent to the tenth department to enter into the animal kingdom and climb up to the privilege of again becoming human beings. The virtuous souls who gather here for their reward are those who provided coffins for the decent interment of the poor. They are also consigned to the tenth department to become good men again on earth, and to enjoy riches, happiness, and honor. Such do not have to enter the bodies of animals.

The fifth department is presided over by Im-Lah-Wong, and he is a very austere fellow, who never extends any clemency to the culprits who are placed under his power. Those sent here are unbelievers in the true religion, back-biters, slanderers, incendiaries, revilers of good and virtuous men. The penalties inflicted here are somewhat in proportion to the crimes committed. Some are made to ascend pagodas and towers that they may view the villages and hamlets where they lived when in the body, as well as to bring to memory the delights they once enjoyed in the society of their relatives and friends. It is thought that thus bringing their former condition to mind will intensify the unhappiness which they must feel in their present bereavement where they have no hopes of escape. Some are subjected to the unpleasant performance of being sawn asunder; but after they have sufficiently paid the debt they contracted in life they are sent to the tenth department to again take their course through the animal kingdom.

The virtuous sent here to obtain the reward due them are those who are noted on earth for giving alms to the needy. These are also sent to the tenth department, not to become brutes, but to have another lease of life in this world in the persons of good men. On the birthday of the god presiding over this department large numbers of votaries flock to his shrine, hoping thereby to obtain free forgiveness for all their sins and transgressions of the past year.

The sixth department is located under the Northern Ocean, and is presided over by Pin-Shing-Wong. Those who are sent here for justice are those who habitually complain of the weather and the seasons; those who obey not the teachings of Confucius; those who place ash-heaps and cast filth in the vicinity of temples; persons who presume to worship the gods without having performed the requisite ablutions; those who read obscene books and show them to others; persons who paint or embroider images of the gods, angels, and representations of the sun and moon; persons who damage and destroy good books; those who scrape the gilding from the images of the gods, and persons who waste rice. The punishment for these offenses are as follows: Those who scrape the gilt from the gods are suspended from beams and disemboweled; those who destroy good books are hung up by the heels and flayed alive; those who forever complain of the weather and the seasons are sawn asunder; and the others are made to kneel with bare knees upon sharp particles of iron.

The upright who come to this place to obtain their reward are those who used their money in the endowment of temples, monasteries, and nunneries, and cheerfully contribute to their support.

The seventh department of the Chinese hades is located under the Northern Ocean, and is presided over by Tai-Shaan-Wong. Those doomed to go to this place for their just deserts are aged and enfeebled men, who for nourishment suck the breasts of women; physicians and resurrectionists who rob the graves of their dead for the purpose of obtaining subjects for dissection, or for getting their bones for medicine; women who procure abortions on others, or take medicine to procure it upon themselves; schoolmasters who neglect their pupils; masters who maltreat their slaves; and the men of wealth who grind the face of the poor. The punishments for this class are of this kind: Robbers of tombs are thrust into burning volcanoes, and the doctors who make medicine of dead men's bones, are boiled in oil; the other offenders are made to wear the large wooden collars, or congues, in use in China.

The virtuous who go there for their compensation are the sons and daughters who, in obedience to the commands of their family physicians, draw drops of blood from their veins and cut pieces of flesh from their legs to be used as a last resort by the physicians for medicine to cure those whom nothing else will save; those who purchase pigs, sheep, goats, birds, and fishes in the markets when taken for human food and then consecrate them to live near the temples as a benefit to the gods; those who buy coffins in which to inter the bodies of deceased paupers, the houseless and friendless who die at the corners of the streets.

The eighth department of the unhappy regions is presided over by Ping-Yang-Wong, and here are arrayed such sons and daughters as neglect the support of their aged parents, who fail to comfort them when sick and distressed, and who do not celebrate their funeral obsequies; those who are ungrateful to benefactors; those who indulge in obscene conversation; women who place wearing apparel on the housetops to dry (a custom particularly distasteful to the Chinese, as they deem it offensive to the dead). The punishments here awarded are as follows: Sons and daughters deficient in filial piety are metamorphosed into animals, and some are trampled under the feet of horses; those ungrateful to benefactors are cut in two with large knives; those guilty of obscene conversation are tied to stakes and their tongues cut out; those who oppress the poor are disemboweled; those who expose clothes on the housetops are thrown headlong into a lake of blood. The virtuous who repair there to get their back pay are those who have contributed money for the benefit of mendicant friars.

The ninth department is presided over by Too-Shi-Wong, and the delinquents who appear there for their just deserts are artists who prostitute their talents by painting obscene pictures; authors who write obscene books; Buddhistic priests who receive money for the benefit of the monasteries to which they belong, but which funds they dishonestly appropriate to their own use; persons who unnecessarily kill animals; persons who cause discord between husbands and wives and between parents and children; persons who administer drugs to women for the purpose of exciting their passions. The punishments meted out to these sinners are somewhat diversified. The dishonest priests are cast upon sharp iron spikes; the slayers of beasts and birds are devoured by the very kinds of animals which they wantonly killed; those who make trouble between husbands and wives and between parents and children are devoured by wild beasts; those who give drugs to women to excite passion are gored to death by saws. The virtuous who flock here for their reward are ferrymen who give free passage to the poor and needy; and those who supply the poor with hot tea in the winter and with cold tea in the summer, and with medicine in times of plague and pestilence.

The tenth and last department of the Chinese hades is presided over by King Chuen-Luung-Wong. To this department, as has been stated, persons from the other nine departments in order that they may return from there again to the earth; the good and deserving becoming men of honor and distinction in their next earth life, and the wicked either as beasts, or birds, reptiles, insects, or fishes.

This is rather of a long story about the different departments of the Chinese hell, for no one can claim that the Chinese hell is not more complicated and intricate than the Christian hell, while less terrible than the eternal torture in the fire that cannot be quenched. Without stopping here to discuss the question whether the devising of hells is a good occupation, or whether there is any truth in it, this much must be conceded, that ths Chinese, as well as the other oriental nations, engaged in it far earlier than either the Jews or the Christians, and they show more system and propriety in their hellish conceptions. Their sense of justice seems better regulated, their moral ideas are fully as acute, and their cruelty not nearly so great and continuous. The Chinese hell provides punishment somewhat in proportion to the offenses committed; and after the debt is paid and the sinner tortured as much as he deserves there is a cessation of hostilities, and the presiding god has a little mercy, the poor wretch is given another chance; but with the Christian hell there is no gradation of punishment; there is no let up. All offenses are punished alike; a man who leads a pretty good life in this world, works honestly for a living, pays his just debts, injures none of his fellow-beings, but does not go to church, does not believe in priestcraft and theology, does not believe the Bible was written by God, does not believe that Jesus was God Almighty and made the earth, the sun, moon, and all the stars out of nothing, does not believe that any being can be his own father and his own son at the same time, that three are one and one is three. is given just as strong a dose of hell as the man who commits a hundred murders, burns and devastates villages, robs his fellow-beings, and causes many to starve; all grades of offenders are pitched together into a seething lake of burning brimstone, and there they must remain and fry eternally. When 999,999,999,999,999,999,999 years have passed in that terrible place their sufferings have only fairly commenced—it is not yet even breakfast time; and if those figures are multiplied together as many times as there are units in the total amount, and the sum of years which they all make are suffered in that Christian lake; yes, if every second in that inconceivable total is lengthened to a million of centuries, and the indescribable torture has been endured all that time, still only a fractional portion of the time has passed; it is still not breakfast time, and never will be, for there is no end to "forever;" eternity has no end; breakfast time never comes in the Christian hell; there is never a moment's cessation of the acutest torture, not a let up for a single instant; not a solitary gleam of light can reach that horrible place; not a ray of hope can penetrate it; not one pleasant voice, not a cheerful note, is ever heard there, but only the perpetual howlings, yellings, screechings, moanings, execrations, cursings—that and nothing else—and that forever, forever, FOREVER, FOREVER!!

As monstrous as the Chinese hells are, as monstrous as their gods are, as monstrous as their religions are, their hells are not a thousandth part so monstrous as the Christian hell, their gods are clearly not a thousandth part so severe as the Christian God, and their religion not a thousandth part so terrible as the Christian religion. There is not another religion in the world that has such a merciless god, such a terrible hell, as Christianity. This doctrine of an endless hell is the most horrible that mortals ever preached; it has caused more human wretchedness than any other doctrine that was ever uttered; it not only makes future existence the most terrible that can possibly be conceived, but it also fills this life with terrors, fears, and apprehensions far worse than death, making a perfect hell of this life, to those who believe the wretched doctrine, as well as of the other, if there is one.

No person has ever lived who deserves to suffer in a Christian hell for the space of twenty-four hours. There is no person living who deserves such a hell, unless it is the lying priests who preach it, and thereby destroy the peace of mind of those who believe the doctrine. Yes, if I must have a religion, if I must have gods, if I must have a hell, give me the Chinese article before the Christian—any others before the Christian, for they are the quintessence of all that is horrible and execrable.

TEMPLE OF THE MEDICINE GOD.

Not far from the temple last mentioned stands the temple of Yeuk-Wong, the Medicine King, or the god who attends to the medical department of the celestial spheres. It seems he was once a human being (as most or quite all the other gods were originally, or at least the creations of human beings), and he performed such valuable services in the medical line that he was deified and made a god. Here stands his image, and by its side five other gods, subordinate to him, for his wife, his son, his grandson, his daughter, and his granddaughter were also deified and stand with him, so you see they constitute a rather godly family. This temple is much frequented by those in bad health, all having the faith to believe that this Æsculapius of the Chinese can drive away their ills and make them whole. One day in the year, however, is special business day here, and that is the birthday of the god—the twenty-eighth day of the fourth month in the year. Then this temple is packed and crammed to its utmost capacity, women being the far larger proportion. Women unquestionably abound in faith more than men; it is the women who keep up nearly all the religions of the world. On the morning of this very worshipful day the medicine god is supposed to be quite wearied and fatigued, having just returned from a trip to the mountains in search of curative plants with which to carry on his business. He thus appears to be an "herb doctor," and does not administer mercury, arsenic, and antimony. In speaking of being fatigued, let me add that fatigue has been common with all the gods; they all get wearied when they overdo or work too hard. We hear a good deal about a certain god who, after doing a larger week's work than usual, became so much fatigued that he had to rest all the next day; and he did his work so badly that it was not long before he was sorry that he had performed that week's job at all.

Well, this medicine god having got completely wearied out at hunting over the mountains, it very naturally becomes the duty of his female friends and worshipers to minister a little to his comfort, and so they fan him and nurse him up, as women so well know how to do. On one of these birthdays it is stated that no less than five thousand women fanned him in course of the day. Where is there a man so irreligious and ungodly as not to be willing to be a god just a few hours under such conditions? But if Yeuk-Wong would take my advice he would not worry and tire himself out in that way looking up his supply of drugs, for there are plenty of poor people who, for a very reasonable consideration, will gather his herbs for him; but these gods will not take my advice; in fact, they take nobody's advice, and scarcely listen to anything. The god we have over in America is no better than the others; he has got so he will scarcely listen to his best friends any more; and if he does listen he wont do what they ask him to do, even if they ask him a hundred times over. As a proof of this I have only to again cite the case of poor Garfield. One hundred and fifty thousand of his priests in Europe and America, not less than seven millions of the pious lay-brothers, and twenty-nine millions of the still more pious sisters on both sides of the Atlantic—these good souls, the special favorites of the god, asked him, on their bended knees, with their eyes closed, and many with their heads almost bowed to the earth, and with tears even streaming from their eyes, these, all in the most fervent manner, supplicated their god to be so kind as to let the good Garfield get well and liv a few years longer, but he would not do it. I am sure thousands of those good people who profess to have implicit faith in prayer asked him, in the best way they knew how, more than a hundred times to just let the President live. At a moderate estimate, not less than ten prayers each were offered up by the numbers named, making an estimated grand total of 360,000,000 of united and fervent prayers just to perform one simple little act which would not take him three minutes to attend to; but not a finger would he lift, not a motion would he make, toward answering their prayers.

I cannot see that the Christian God is any better at answering prayer than the Chinese gods, and yet his worshipers call him "a prayer-answering god," and boast unceasingly of his kindness and promptness in attending to their requests. It is my opinion their claims are untrue. He does not answer prayer with certainty. I tried him about twenty-five years, and asked him to do a good many little things for me that ought not to be very hard for an omnipotent god to perform; I asked him in the very best way I knew how, and I believe with as much sincerity as the average of praying people, but I cannot at this moment remember of a single instance when any one of my prayers was answered, or when anything took place in consequence of my praying in the slightest degree different from what would have occurred had I not prayed. Perhaps I am not "gifted in prayer," but I did the best I knew how, and that is about as well as Moody and the Salvation Army can do. I presume, had I asked that water might continue to run down hill, that twice two might still be four, and that the sun might continue to rise in the east, those prayers would have been answered; but as for getting anything special that I prayed for, that I would not have got all the same if I had not prayed, I met with a total failure. At length, however, I got tired of the game in which I always lost and never won—always getting blanks and no prizes—and concluded to discontinue, and ask no more favors of gods visible or invisible, but to pray with my hands and my brains—to let well-directed effort be my prayer. I have been pursuing that course over thirty years, and I have no reason to complain. I have done tolerably well; if all my prayers have not been realized as fully as I wished more of them have been answered when I depended upon my own exertions than when I looked to some imaginary being above the clouds. At all events, I am so well satisfied that I shall continue the prayer of effort.

In view of the fact that God did not see fit to answer the 360,000,000 prayers that were loudly, forcibly, earnestly, humbly, and unceasingly sent up to him in favor of Mr. Garfield, the question naturally arises, how many prayers are required to move him—just a little? Possibly the grave problem may be solved by a statement worked out in simple position, or the good old rule of three; thus, if 360,000,000 prayers to Yahweh produce nothing, what do all the rest of the prayers amount to which have been or may be offered? This is an easy example to work out, and any school boy can obtain the answer; he will of course remember that the second term and the answer must be of the same character and denomination, and he cannot be mistaken; the answer will be 000,000,000.

Guiteau said God compelled him to shoot Garfield, and he went to his death with that assertion upon his lips, and it is hard to show why it is not just as true as that he commanded Abraham to slay Isaac, or that he commanded Saul to slay the king and people of Amalek, including the women, the suckling infants, together with the camels, the asses, and the sheep; or that he commanded the slaying of seventy-five thousand or more of the men, women, or children of Midian, besides scores upon scores of other instances where he commanded his servants to slay people. If we must believe that God ordered that human life be taken in one case, why not in another? With regard to Garfield and the prayers offered for him one of four propositions must be the truth.

1. God wanted Garfield to die, and authorized, or at least permitted Guiteau to kill him; or,

2. He could not answer the prayers if he would, and was unable to spare Garfield's life; or,

3. He would not answer the prayers if he could, and is not a prayer-answering God; or,

4. There is no god who orders life to be taken, or saves it when otherwise it must be lost.

I incline to think the last proposition the true one. I may be mistaken, but if so, I am honest in my opinion. I cannot think a God of infinite love and mercy will send me to eternal torture for being honest. If he does, I shall endure my doom with the best grace I can command, but very likely I may think it a trifle hard.

THE TEMPLE OF SIN-FUNG.

The business of this god is to look after runaway slaves and servants. To his shrine all persons repair who have lost male or female slaves. They worship him and offer sacrifices to prevail upon him to set himself at work at once in their interests. A courier is constantly in attendance, with his loins girt and already prepared to set out in chase after the runaways, to help the god to find them when the proper fee has been paid in. Without the courier little can be done. In all cases the gods, of themselves, are helpless beings, and but for the priests and other assistants nothing could be accomplished.

Mothers who are anxious that their daughters should speedily obtain good husbands often send aged female servants as go-betweens to this god to enlist his services in their behalf. It is customary to offer small silk or cloth bags containing sweet-smelling incense to put the god in an accommodating humor. In times of plague and pestilence, as well as in cases of ordinary sickness, the bags which have thus been placed before the god are worn as charms or preventives against attacks of sickness. It is not uncommon for such bags to sell for a great price.

In the same temple is a shrine to the god Lunk-Tunk-Tai-Wong, but what his particular duties are I am not able to say; but his worshipers present to him votive offerings in the shape of stones and rods which look much like barbers' poles in their decorations.

TEMPLE OF KWAN-TAI.

This is the great Chinese god of war, and his temple is one of the finest in Canton. Its courts are spacious and neatly paved with granite slabs. The green-tiled roofs and the several shrines are supported by granite columns. The first shrine is of course dedicated to old Kwan-Tai himself, and above the altar he sits in state. On the right side stand two colossal figures; one is represented as bearing the seal of the god, and the other holding a huge battle-axe. On the left side are two similar figures; one holding a commission from Kwan-Tai, and the other a weapon of war. In the rear are the parents and grand-parents of the god. Votive offerings to the god of war are suspended from the rafters of the temple. Several other temples in the city are also dedicated to this terrible god of battles. State worship is offered him especially at the vernal and autumnal equinoxes and at the New Year.

THE HONAM TEMPLE.

This is a Buddhistic temple situated in the suburb of Honam, on the south side of the river. It has an extensive monastery connected with it, and is often called the Ocean Banner Monastery. It is the largest temple in Canton, the whole occupying eight acres of ground. After passing through an unpretentious gateway, the grand entrance is reached by a broad well-paved walk, on each side of which is a row of large trees of the banyan species. The entrance is guarded by two immensely large sentinels or janitors, who are gross enough and terrific enough to frighten timid people; they are sitting, but if standing would reach a hight of nearly forty feet. There are supposed to be two of the eight personages, whose office it is to guard these sacred premises. Two are on duty at a time, and they must not suffer any evil spirits to enter the premises. The janitor on the right is supposed to welcome all who enter in a proper spirit to visit the holy shrines, while he on the left reminds them that the courts are hallowed, and must be approached with due reverence and awe. The eight janitors have the usual Chinese names, the interpretations of which are "The Deliverer of the Wretched and Miserable," "The Restorer of the Sick and Afflicted," "The Restorer of Blessings," "The Possessor of Purity," "Utterer of Loud Words," "The Soother of Sorrow," "The Wise and Good," and "The Great God."

The porch to the temple is ascended by a short flight of stone steps. On each side of the entrance is a large white board bearing Chinese characters, being dissertations to good conduct. On the right hand board it is stated that licentiousness is of all vices the greatest, while on the opposite board filial piety is described as the greatest virtue. Within the porch are four colossal images of the "Four Great Kings of Heaven." If they are as heavenly as they are great, their goodness can not be doubted, for, if standing, they would hardly fall short of forty feet in hight. One has a sort of green face; in his hand he holds a sword which he is unsheathing. He is supposed to hold authority over the winds, and to keep them from getting unduly on the rampage. The second has a red face, and holds in his hand a jade-stone harp, upon which he is supposed to discourse sweet music, when he feels like it. It is claimed for him that he controls the elements of fire, air, and water, of which he is composed, the first being of wood. The third has a white face, in his hand is an umbrella, supposed to be of pearls. It is his prerogative to send or withhold rain. His constitution is held to be of metal. The fourth has a swarthy complexion. In his left-hand he holds a golden dragon, and in his right hand a pearl, supposed to have been taken by him from the mouth of the dragon. He is invested with the power of granting propitious winds, and his constitution is said to be of water. It is claimed for these four heavenly kings that they exercise a presiding watchfulness and supreme direction, severally, over the eastern, southern, western, and northern quarters of the heavens; and to them Chinese mothers devoutly commend the charge of their little ones. The mother often writes the name of her child on a strip of paper and affixes it to the body of one of these heavenly kings, that her darling may be sure to be remembered and blessed.

Between the porch and the main temple is a court, with a small temple in the center, and one on each side. The roof of the main temple, as is the case with the most important temples, is of glazed green tiles, and is supported by lofty wooden pillars, made bright and shining by many coats of lacquer. Within the sanctuary are three colossal gilt statues of Buddha, representing respectively the past, the present, and the future. These images, if standing, would measure forty feet in hight. Before each is an altar on which are carefully arranged incense-burners, candlesticks, flowers, etc. Here, as in all the temples, the bamboo incense is kept constantly burning, the incense material being placed in a small tube of bamboo, which burns slowly, but steadily, like a piece of punk, emitting rather pleasant odors. In front of each image is suspended from the roof a large lantern, the lights in which, as with the vestal lights of ancient Rome, and the sacred lights of modern Rome, are kept constantly burning. Small lights and lanterns are also around the shrines, and these are lighted on special occasions. There are streamers and banners bearing Chinese characters in letters of velvet on a red ground. Upon the two sides of the shrine are eight statues of the most distinguished of Buddha's disciples. There were eight hundred of them in all, but these are considered the greatest for their preëminent virtues and spiritual attainments. Like Buddha they abandoned the wickedness of the world at an early age and dedicated their lives to holiness and peace. The great and good qualities of these holy men are highly praised by Chinese poets, and shrines have been erected to them in many places. Portraits are also as plentiful of them as of the disciples of Jesus among the Christians. A great many extraordinary claims are made with reference to these disciples of Buddha which I will not take the time to repeat, but if half the claims are true they must have been far more remarkable men than the twelve who much later attended upon the teacher of Galilee.

In a corner of the room where the shrine is located is a large bell, unrivaled for the softness of its tone, and also a large drum in an opposite corner. The two are sounded at the commencement of matins, vespers, and each daily service. They not only notify the public that the time for religious service has come, but they also convey a similar intelligence to the celestial beings, notifying them that their attention and good services are required. At the celebration of matins and vespers the monks, dressed in dull, grayish robes, arrange themselves in rows on each side of the shrine, and in a monotonous chant address prayers to Buddha for the preservation of the emperor and the high officials of the empire. They also offer to heaven prayers for all the blessings desired, and pay profoundest adorations. The officiating priest in front of the altar blesses and consecrates a small quantity of rice, and places the same on a tripod which stands without the door of the temple, where the rice is eaten by birds, who doubtless appreciate the food.

Within the shrine is a magnificent and elaborately sculptured marble dagoba. On one side Buddha is represented as riding upon an elephant with six tusks; on another side he is riding a lion; on the third he is riding a fabulous animal and holding in his hand a scroll; and on the fourth he is represented as sitting upon a lotus flower. Under each of these representations is sculptured a bowl of fresh water, which with the Chinese is an emblem of purity, typifying the excellence of the life and teachings of Buddha. Under this dagoba is supposed to be a relic of Buddha, which, of course, is regarded with a degree of reverence by the faithful, which amounts to worship. The marvel, however, is, as there are so many dogobas all over Asia under which relics of Buddha are said to be deposited—some having one of his teeth, another some other bone of his body—where they all came from. His body did not have bones enough in it to go round and supply all, and how so many dagobas can be blessed with one of his bones is a puzzling question; and the wonder is increased when it is remembered that Buddha's body was cremated, and the bones, of course, calcined to powder. Is it to be supposed that a miracle has been performed in each case where a relic is said to be deposited, as with the wood of the "true cross" on which Jesus was crucified, enough of which, it has been estimated, is still in existence in Christian churches and cathedrals to build a small-sized house? Had not the body of Jesus, as supposed, ascended into heaven, there is little doubt that hundreds of his bones would now grace Christian sanctuaries; but it would be a little awkward to be showing his bones to the faithful, while it is asserted that he took his bones with him to heaven. There is probably about the same amount of truth with reference to Buddha's bones as with the wood of the cross and the underclothes of the virgin. The dagoba in question cost many thousand dollars, but not a tithe of what some of the cathedrals cost in which Jesus and his mother are worshiped with an adoration as profound as that bestowed upon Buddha.

On each of the stone pillars which support the shrine a red placard is posted, the object of which is to warn the thoughtless who visit the monastery to on no account profane so sacred a place. The third great shrine is in honor of Koog Yam, the goddess of mercy. A large gilt image of the goddess is the first thing to be seen. On the altar is the usual collection of incense-burners, candlesticks, and stands for artificial flowers. The front is adorned with a red, embroidered altar-cloth. On each side of the shrine are several bookcases, inclosed by folding-doors, and containing the Buddhistic scriptures, which are regarded with veneration as deep as that with which Christians regard their scripture.

THE GODDESS OF MERCY

Is held to be the incarnation of Buddha, who not less than thirty-two times appeared on earth, and on each occasion in a different form. Her father was a sovereign of one of the provinces, and her mother a very devout woman. They were many years without progeny, which filled them with grief. Her mother went twice daily to the temple to pray, and in every case she prayed for a male offspring. The gods, however, as gods often are, were not propitious to her, although she kept up this constant prayer till she became advanced in years. Many persons, after receiving no answer to their prayers for so long a time, would become discouraged and give up the struggle, but this good woman did not; she prayed on, and after awhile the gods, perhaps, got a little ashamed of themselves, or at least they so far relented as to conclude to give her a female child. She accordingly conceived, and in due course of time the daughter was born and named Mu-Shin. Her birth was attended with extraordinary phenomena. Throughout the day on which she was born a bright cloud overshadowed the dwelling of her father, and the air was impregnated with the sweet fragrance of many flowers.

During her childhood she manifested extraordinary ability, and evinced a great desire—in order to lead a pure life and perfect her intellectual attainments—to spend her early life within the walls of a Buddhistic nunnery. Her parents were greatly opposed to this, and to prevent her from carrying out her intention they confined her in a bower or garden-house. But finally, in consequence of her importunities, her father finally conveyed her to a nunnery. Here she was called upon to discharge the duties of a menial, to which she complied with the utmost grace and cheerfulness. It is perhaps not strange that she was a perfectly angelic creature, for she was blessed with no less than thirty-eight angels, who ministered unto her and gave her all the aid within their power. When it was her duty to pluck vegetables the monkeys came to her assistance, and in picking tea-leaves, the birds were so accommodating as to help her. Eight genii, in addition to the angels, were commissioned to wait upon her, to bring fruit to her, and whatever she needed. On one occasion when she was bearing fruit to the nunnery a white tiger came to her assistance.

At length her father became very much annoyed at her prolonged stay at the nunnery, and conceived the wicked plan of destroying it by fire. He accordingly gave orders to his generals to carry out this bad intention, and the flames were kindled; but no sooner had they made some headway than they were extinguished in a miraculous manner. The father became enraged that his plans were thus thwarted, and in a very angry manner commanded that his daughter be seized and brought before him. His orders were promptly obeyed, and when she was brought into his presence he commanded that she be slain at once with the sword. Again divine power came to her aid, and the designs of her wicked father were thus thwarted. As her father prevented her return to the nunnery, she resolved to commit suicide. This rash resolution she effected by strangulation; but during the following night a large tiger entered the palace, seized the coffin, and conveyed it to the summit of a mountain not far away, where, by the interposition of a heavenly messenger from the gods, she was restored to life. She was informed by the messenger that the ten kings who preside over the ten departments of hades were most desirous to see her. She was, of course, very willing to comply with the request of such distinguished personages, and at once hastened, under the guidance of the angel, to see the potentates of grim justice. Upon her arrival she was greatly pained to witness the dreadful punishments inflicted upon evil-doers, and her sympathy and compassion were raised in the highest degree when she saw their horror and despair. She resolved at once to do all she could by prayer to Buddha to alleviate their sufferings.

She inquired of the ten kings what their object was in sending for her. They replied that they wished to confer upon her a reward in token of the high esteem which they bore her for her many virtues and the boldness and zeal which she had evinced despite the cruel persecutions of her own father, which were meted out to her because she had the wisdom to choose the seclusion and self-denial of the nunnery in preference to the gayety and splendor of her father's palace. They urged her to continue in her course of wisdom and holiness. Upon her withdrawal from their presence she at once addressed herself in prayer to the future Buddha in supplication for those who were suffering the agonies of hell, and no sooner had she uttered the words, "O-mi-to-fat," than beautiful and fragrant flowers from heaven fell all around her, and at the same moment the unfortunate victims writhing in hell were at once translated to heaven to a state of perfect joy and bliss.

When, however, the kings of hades learned they had thus lost their subjects by wholesale by the prayers of Mu-Shin, they were filled with the greatest perturbation, and commanded that she should at once leave their abodes. No sooner had she returned to earth than she perceived a white cloud descending from heaven toward her, and upon it seated a person having the form of a Buddhist priest, and who addressed her in the most benignant manner, and asked her if she would like to go to Hong-Shan, a high mountain, on which dwelt angels and genii, whose homes had once been on the earth. He informed her that he was Shik-Ka, who, during her protracted seasons of sorrow and persecution, had carefully watched over and protected her. Mu-Shin's heart, of course, overflowed with gratitude at receiving this intelligence, and at once made up her mind that she would accompany her guardian angel to Hong-Shan. Upon their arrival upon that delectable mountain the favored female was requested to sit upon a throne of lotus flowers. She of course complied, and there she reigned for ten years, after which time she was promoted to Sai-Tien, the western paradise of the Buddhists. But while in this place of exquisite happiness she did not forget her wicked father, for during a long attack of illness which visited him she watched over him and aided in restoring him again to health. Her name after this was changed to Koon-Yam, the goddess of mercy, as which she has since been worshiped, women and children being her principal votaries.

Ladies of wealth and position in society repair to this goddess to solicit her aid and blessing. The form of worship pursued upon such occasions is conducted by Buddhist priests in a manner which is supposed to be pleasing to the goddess. Two tables are placed immediately in front of the goddess, and at a distance of a few feet from each other. Upon these fruits and flowers, as eucharistic offerings well pleasing to the goddess are neatly arranged. Around these tables ladies attired in their best robes sit or kneel, the priests at the sound of musical instruments march in with slow and measured step; but as the music quickens, their pace increases, until at last they run rapidly around the tables, making the form of the figure eight, as fast as their feet are able to carry them. This singular style of worship is brought to a close by the priests rushing wildly into the presence of the ladies, tendering to them their warmest congratulations.

This goddess is also very much worshiped during the Tsing-Ming, a season regarded by the Chinese as especially auspicious for repairing to the tombs of their ancestors to perform worship to them and make prayers to them. Paper representations of servants' houses, sedan-chairs, gold and silver ingots, are conveyed to the shrines, and, after being dedicated, are burnt, with the belief that they are thus converted into spirit substance, in which condition they can be utilized by their departed friends. This is particularly carried out on the nineteenth day of the second month, that being the anniversary of the goddess's birth. There are other temples and shrines dedicated to this goddess in other parts of the city. Hither votaries flock in great numbers upon her birthday, and beseech her blessings upon themselves and their sick relatives. They light immense sticks at the sacred lamps which are suspended above her altars, and then, bearing them aloft, return to their respective homes, when these incense sticks, as eucharistic offerings, are often placed before the ancestral tablets, and at other times upon the altars of the tutelary deities and guardians of their dwellings. Sometimes, also, previous to leaving the temple the votaries hold a small parcel of tea wrapped in paper in the cloud of smoke of incense about the altar, and when the tea has thus been fumigated it, of course, becomes impregnated with holiness, and is considered efficacious as a medium in curing various forms of diseases. The pious Chinese doubtless feel about the same kind of veneration for this goddess as Christians do for the Virgin Mary, who is appealed to in prayer by millions of devout worshipers as having the power to confer all kinds of blessings spiritual and temporal; and the relics pertaining to her, including fragments of her underclothes, have performed wonderful miracles. The rock on which her milk is said to have dropped, as at Bethlehem, is thought to be charged with miraculous power, and is purchased by the faithful as possessing astonishing qualities. There is not very much difference, after all, between Christian and other superstitions.

Near the shrine of this goddess stands the Pee-Lu-Kok, or the hall or tower of the god Pee-Lu. He is sitting on a phenix throne and wearing a crown of gold. He has three eyes, the center of which, the eye of omniscience, is placed in the middle of the forehead. On the sides of the hall stand the images of twelve personages, called the "Kings of Heaven." At the feet of Pee-Lu are two small red tablets; on them is recorded in letters of gold the names of persons who have contributed largely in the decorations and fittings of this holy place.

THE HOLY HOGS.

Connected with this largest temple in the city are very commodious apartments for about a dozen fat hogs, a corridor leading to them from the body of the temple. These are hogs devoted to the gods, or to the sacred uses of the temple, and are the gifts of pious devotees who, for some blessing received, or the answer to some prayer obtained, deeming one of the best acts they can perform is to not take animal life, but, on the other hand, to preserve it. From the hour the pigs enter this sacred inclosure they are regarded as sacred, and are carefully fed and attended to by the monks, the food being largely contributed by devotees who come to the temple to worship. The animals are kept very clean, and are never killed; they are fed year after year and allowed to live as long as they will, and when they die are buried with all the honors due a saint. One of them I saw is fifteen years old, and must weigh six or eight hundred pounds.

I had seen many holy things, and read of holy animals of various kinds, but I think these were the first holy hogs that fell under my observation. The idea of hogs and holiness seemed a trifle incongruous to me, and, turning to the guide, I said, "Ah Cum, Ah Cum, do you believe there is any special holiness in these hogs, or that they are any holier for being kept here in a temple?" Ah Cum's reply was, "Oh, me got no religion; me don't care anything about it; all temples just samee to me." I concluded that Ah Cum was not far out of the way, and that all the temples are about alike. But many kinds of animals, and especially bulls, have, by the worshipers of many gods, been regarded as sacred, and I don't know why piggie has not an equal right to come in for a share of sacred honors. These porkers were of the pure China breed, with short legs and small bones, and of the same kind I met in considerable numbers in my ride around the city. In the outer parts of the town, among the dwellings of the poorer classes, pigs are largely kept, and run around with the children and dogs, all being apparently upon an equality. The pigs look as clean as the children, and as though they had their daily bath.

In the compartment with the sacred swine are notices placed in a conspicuous position warning all persons to beware doing any unkindness to the hogs upon any consideration, assuring them that if any bad act is done to those animals retributive justice will be meted out for the same in the great day of judgment. In another compartment are kept male chickens, which have also been dedicated to a holy life. Like the Jews, the Chinese think male animals and birds are most acceptable to the gods.

The monks and friars attached to the temple—there being in the neighborhood of a hundred of them—occupy considerable space. I saw where their food is prepared, and the dining-room, with the eight long, plain tables, where they take their simple meals of rice and vegetables, boiled in the kitchen hard by. Their dormitory does not look particularly inviting. It has long wooden benches on either side, where these idle and useless beings seek repose at night. They are simply beggars, and reminded me much of the same class of monks I saw in Rome, where there are seven thousand of them. Possibly they all have the highest requisites of true Christians, for they take no thought for the morrow; they toil not, neither do they spin. These Chinese monks have a long loose dress, very similar to the Christian monks, and Mr. Clark was struck with the resemblancee. [TO BE CONTINUED.]

Death.

DEAR FATHER BENNETT: It is hard for me to break to you the sad news of the death of our dear, sweet, little son, James Bennett Travers. Oh, with what pride we looked upon our boy when born! He was so stout and perfect in form; he had such a finely-developed head, from which shone as bright and beautiful eyes as ever were to mortal given. We named him Bennett because we loved you, and hoped that he would be a great and good man, as we firmly believe you to be; but Death marked him for his victim, and all available medical aid, with our constant watch and care, could not save him. Oh, how my heart bled when the physician told me little Benny could not liv!

He is gone. Lying on my knees, at 6:30 P.M., Saturday, July 15th, he breathed his last.

The funeral was a quiet one. The address, made by a Campbellite minister who thinks enough of the church to prefer selling groceries to preaching, was short and without the Christian fringes, scripture reading, and psalm singing. Had there been no mention of Jesus in the address I would hav been better satisfied; but it is hard to overcome old habits, and he for that is excused.

Dear little Bennett, thy troubles are over,
Death's angel has robbed us, we see thee no more
Unless in the future eternal life hover,
Then shall we see thy fair form as before.

But now for that future we hav no misgiving
Better than torture, the gloom of the grave;
From the orthodox heaven where a Guiteau is living
May the angels of mercy our darling one save.

Farewell, our sweet baby, we know it is well,
Though o'er thy cold grave full often we weep;
And whether in action or rest thou dost dwell,
Yet we'll think of thee only as resting in sleep.

The Banquet Reception

To the returned pilgrim at Martinelli's on Thursday evening, the 3d inst., was a highly enjoyable affair. At the hour of six the friends began to assemble in the capacious saloon with its long table bearing evident proof that a feast was soon to be presented to the guests. A suite of reception-rooms for ladies was also brought into requisition. The returned traveler was cordially taken by the hand by the guests as they arrived, and he was made heartily welcome to his home once more. Not far from the hour of seven the dinner was ready and some sixty or more gentlemen and ladies—warm personal friends—were seated before the brilliant display, ready to participate in the festivities of the occasion.

Among the honored guests were Horace Seaver and Josiah P. Mendum of the Boston Investigator, and H. M. Fisher, of Fishersville, N. H., who had come a long way to be present at this welcome feast. The entire ceremonies continued nearly six hours.

After the company were seated the President, T. B. Wakeman, arose and said:

Ladies and Gentlemen: I hav the honor to present to you your lately returned friend, the illustrious Pilgrim who has circled the earth in the search for truth. And to you, Mr. Bennett, I hav to present this large circle of friends you see before you, who hav voluntarily come together and provided this feast as a slight token of their esteem for you and of their desire to do you some honor for your labors, trials, sufferings, and victories in the Liberal cause. So that this may be done decently and in order, we must recognize the fundamental law of all vital, social, and even spiritual life, that is, that the higher is always conditioned upon and subordinate to the lower. The first duty of man is, therefore, material and protoplasmic. After the feast of these good things there shall follow in due course a "feast of reason and a flow of soul." But first of all we ask for a word or two from him whom we hav met to honor by way of acceptance and "grace."

Mr. Bennett, who stood by the side of the chairman, evidently somewhat moved by the situation and the goodly company before him, expressed his gratitude for the kind welcome extended to him, remarking that to be thus welcomed by near friends felt still more grateful than by those farther removed. While on his long, toilsome journey around the world, surrounded by those with whom he was wholly unacquainted, he had fondly remembered the parting farewell so kindly given him at the house of Mr. and Mrs. Ryan, by many of those now present. He knew they were true friends to him, and the spmpathy and friendship which they extended to him had sustained and cheered him while far away. Although he had very bitter enemies, few people could boast of more or better friends. So long as he was able to hold such true and steadfast friends he should care but little for his enemies. We would not detain his friends by prolonged remarks, but recommended that all proceed to the little job immediately before them.

The dinner consisted of five or six regular courses, including small clams on the shell, soup, fish, chicken, game, roast beef, vegetables, a general assortment of cake, fruit, ice cream, etc. The dispatching of the viands as they were brought on, one after another, blended as they were with general conversation in which nearly all participated, occupied an hour and a half.

After this the president called to order and requested E. B. Foote, M.D., Jr., to read several letters which had been received from persons who could not be present. Among the same were letters from James Parton, Elizur Wright, Col. R. G. Ingersoll, and George Chainey, but unfortunately, with the exception of the first, they got lost, so they cannot be given. The following is the letter from Mr. Parton:

NEWBURYPORT, MASS., July 8, 1882.

My Dear Eugene: Your kind invitation to attend the proposed dinner of welcome to Mr. Bennett on his return home in August does me great honor. I am sorry to be obliged to decline. It has become necessary to me to avoid all the avoidable causes of excitement, and it would excite me very much to take part in such an occasion. I am not, like you, in the vigor of youth, nor like him, made of watch-spring steel. He is a wonderful man. My impression is that his tour round the world will bear good fruit in some of the countries through which he passed, as well as in that to which he returns. JAMES PARTON.

At the conclusion of the reading of the letters the President gave the second toast, "Liberal Pilgrims, Their Meaning and Use." To this toast the President said he had been assigned to reply in the absence of Mr. James Parton, the president of the Liberal Club of this city.

Mr. Wakeman said: In our youth we were taught the maxim that "history repeats itself," as if it were an axiom. Now it is discovered that history never repeats itself. It is a sign of progress that we hav learned this fact, and we must be grateful for the knowledge of the law of evolution, which proves that facts and events can never recur, because the conditions of social life and of its progress can never be twice the same.

Yet the fundamental necessities and emotions of mankind are ever the same or similar. The feelings which hav thrilled the human race from its infancy are simply answered to again and again throughout the ages by new circumstances, symbols, religions, or philosophies. The language and dress may change, but the collectiv soul of Man is ever much the same. The same needs produce the same feelings.

Religions succeed each other, like fleeting clouds, when we watch the course of history; but their fundamental demands, feelings, astronomic festivals, and even rites and usages reappear. Instead of departing utterly from the earth, they sink deeper in the heart of man and blossom forth anew from age to age. The Christmas Festival is as old as the knowledge of the winter solstice from which it took its rise.

Such thoughts sprang up in me anew when I read often how our honored guest describes himself in his book "Around-the-World" as "the Pilgrim."

But is he not a Liberal—that is, one of those emancipated from Theology? And is not a Pilgrim a "religious person"—a product of the accursed old theologies he is to liv and die in fighting? Yes. The Fetichistic peoples, like the savage tribes, the Africans, and the Chinese, are, it is true, by their religion, a stay-at-home people, because their gods are their homes or in their homes. They occupy the ground floor in the religious world, and are the majority of our race. They are largely exempt from pilgrimage making.

But the next higher stories of the religious world—the theologies proper, viz., Polytheism and Monotheism—are sure to blossom out into thousands of Pilgrimages and millions of Pilgrims, for unlike the Fetichist, their gods or god, or revelation, or sacred thing, is not in their homes, but dwells or has appeared afar in some sacred river, plain, mountain, village, or city, and there the highest must be sought. So the Polytheistic Hindoo, Greek, or Roman sought the places where his soul could obtain or make its peace with the god-governed order of his world. So the Monotheistic Christian or Mohammedan is sure or surer of heaven if he can only once look upward from his God's house at Mecca or Jerusalem. This impulse in these religions has slaughtered millions. The Crusades, with their three millions of victims, were little more than incidents in its play; and even now in Asia and Europe it yields every year its thousandfold crop of deaths as witnesses to its power.

But are we, the emancipated, not free from this death-dealing theological absurdity? Alas! Notwithstanding all of our wrestlings to escape from the past, a professed Pilgrim sits by our side!

But what a contrast? A Pilgrim! Why? To what place? What for? Let us see.

When Europe slept in the bosom of the Holy Church, one who had from sin, folly, or misfortune, found it "rough" with the world, or the Church, instead of committing hari-kari, could drop the tangled threads of life, throw up the sponge, and say, "I will go on a pilgrimage to the Holy Land for the good of my soul and the glory of God."

At once this cry was respected. The priest recorded his vow, and gave him the cross-bearing robe, the sandal shoon and scollop shell. A procession of grieving, anxious, prayerful friends (if any he had left) followed him to the next parish, and tearfully passed him over to the tender mercies of the Faithful, of the Infidel, or of God, as his fate might be.

Years pass, and, if not in heaven by the aid of some disease or Mohammedan sword, the rumor reaches his nativ village that the lost pilgrim is working his way homeward. His return is hailed like that of a triumphant soldier or of "a lost sheep." His misdeeds, if any, are forgotten. Has he not been redeemed, regenerated, by the Holy Ones at whose shrines he has watched and prayed? The procession forms again. The friends and neighbors with gifts, the children in gala-dress with song and flowers, go out and meet, and rejoice over, and beg the prayers of the brother who comes to them as if returned from an unknown and therefore a holier world. He is led in triumph to the altar of the Church, and there deposits the palms gathered from the plains of Jericho, and which entitle him to be ever after honored as a "Palmer." The priest grants him complete absolution from all of his sins, and declares his vows fulfilled and his life sacred. Henceforth he has a new lease of life. The leaf has been turned for a new entry, the past is lost in the honor and reverence that waits upon his days, until his final pilgrimage shall come.

To us all of the creed of this old religion is forever dead and gone, but I pity the heart that does not feel some echo of its "pilgrim's return" to night.

Our Liberal Pilgrim went forth out of a complication more the fault of others than his own, in which he served as a Martyr for the freedom of all. He needed a change of place and scene—a new life, which only a new view, a general view, of the world, could giv.

He went out as a Pilgrim from the anxious meetings of his friends, not to the birthplace or shrine of a pigmy god, but to Humanity in its home, the world! The limitations that encircled his life he would solve and lose in the life and sympathy of the whole race. More than Ulysses ever dreamt of seeing—of oceans and lands, of cities and men, of priests and gods—he has gazed upon, and now he returns to his faithful Penelope, to us, and to his native land! Moved more than ever, must he be, if he is human, by the higher, better, universal, immortal impulses of man. Nay more, he brings those impulses home to us and joins us in that sympathy which makes our race one, invincible and divine.

But not only as a pilgrim has he gone and returned. As the pilgrim often did of old, he has joined with that sacred mission the duties of a knight errant. As a soldier of justice and right, a Seeker of Truth, he brings a record of services in every land he has visited of singular value.

Who, for instance, could hav done what he has accomplished in India and Ceylon? His speeches, translated into the nativ tongues, are going before thousands, and perhaps millions, as the best and perhaps the only antidote to the stupid Munchausen stories by which the missionaries of theology are trying to overthrow the comparativly innocent traditions of Buddha and Confucius. He has exposed, as no other ever has, the wickedness of undermining one superstition by another which the natives can never understand, instead of giving them the blessings of liberty, science, humanity, and civilization. The costly, and to the nativs the destructiv work of these emmisaries of an effete superstition which still beclouds our civilization should be brought to an end by the indignation of the more scientific and enlightened world. We had no more right to annihilate the Sandwich Islanders by Christianity than we had by gunpowder. Social science has thrown new light over the relativ positions of religions and races. Each is the outgrowth of each, and a sudden change is death.

Such are some of the instructiv lessons our Liberal pilgrim and knight errant of truth has brought out in the clearest light. He has served not only himself, but us and the world, in rising by this pilgrimage above the complications of his own life. He shall be loved, honored, and cherished accordingly. For his services in Ceylon the Buddhist students chanted hymns to him as if to a hero-sage of their faith. Half the world lies between us and them to-night, nor can we join in their sonorous original Pali, but we send them greeting, and we join in these verses of their song at least, though we have them only in prose:

May the kind-hearted Mr. Bennett
Who is praised by learned pandits in different countries,
Is familiar with various arts and sciences,
Is the residence of the higher wisdom,
And who possesses a competent
Knowledge of different religious systems,
Liv long!

May the Liberal-minded Mr. Bennett,
Who has pleasant and intelligent features,
Who is endowed with so great wisdom as the sage of the golden mountain,
Who is bent upon the public good,
Who is like unto a wreath of flowers
Which shines as the crown of learned men,
Flourish long!

May Mr. Bennett, who is like unto the Sun which destroys the dew of superstition,
Is like a victorious general in engagements of controversy,
Who follows the teachings of Lord Buddha, which comfort the world,
And who well bears the pearl necklace of renown,
Shine long!

Our next toast is "Our Liberal Pilgrim," and to that Mr. Bennett himself must reply. He is before you.

Mr. Wakeman's speech was listened to with the closest attention and frequently applauded. The close of it especially "brought down the house."

Mr. Bennett spoke somewhat as follows:

My heart swells with gratitude toward you, my friends, who surround me here to-night. I can but feebly express my feelings, but I think you will easily understand that I cannot do otherwise than feel grateful.

One who has been around the world ought to hav something to talk about. There is, indeed, a plenty of material; I hardly know what to giv you, there is so much to choose from, and I am only sorry that I am not a better talker. A man who does not allow his voice to be heard until he is sixty years of age, and who has no particular talent in that direction, ought not to be expected to be much of an orator.

Although I hav seen many beautiful countries—lands that hav charming features of beauty, tall mountains, deep valleys, wide plains, great rivers, populous cities—tropical countries filled with wonderful palms, bananas, spice woods, and other exotic productions, I can say that of all the countries on the face of the earth I think our own America is the best, affording the happiest homes for the people. We hav every reason to be grateful that our lines are cast in pleasant places, for we hav advantages which the people of other nations do not possess. We should be mindful of these things and not feel that our lot is a hard one, for we hav a better country, a better climate, better institutions, better laws, and greater opportunities for living comfortable and happy lives than hav most of the people in foreign lands.

I will simply name some of the countries I hav visited. Greece is the land of a great people, where 2,500 years ago dwelt a nation remarkable in the history and literature of the world, remarkable for their generalship, for their fighting qualities, for their literary attainments, their poetry, sculpture, and architecture; in many other directions they were a people who hav hardly been equalled. It was very interesting to view the ruins of their temples and statuary which still remain. Passing by Constantinople, there is not so much to be said of it, though it is a historic city, founded by Constantine the Great; it is a beautiful city viewed from the distance, but when its streets are traversed it is found to be dirty, dilapidated, and almost repulsiv. Egypt, now most unhappy, at the present moment is a remarkable country in the way of ruins and monuments of antiquity; its pyramids, temples, tombs, and obelisks are very wonderful—nothing on the face of the globe surpasses this ancient country. The river Nile, which flows 1,300 miles without a tributary, draining the mountains high up in central Africa, and running through an otherwise desert waste, bears to that lower country the rich alluvial deposits which make it one of the most fruitful portions of the earth's surface, and which has produced more food for man in proportion to its area than any any other. Among its remarkable ancient statues there is one hewn from granit, which weighs 1,000 tons and was transported over two hundred miles. The civil engineers of our time would hardly be competent to move so vast a body that distance. There are also monolith obelisks, varying from sixty to eighty feet in hight, which hav been transported the same distance.

India, that country of 1,500,000 square miles, and containing 252,000,000 of people, is another remarkable portion of the earth's surface, remarkable for its extensive and elevated mountain ranges, 28,000 to 29,000 feet high, which I had the privilege of looking upon; its thousand rock temples, one hundred of which I also had the opportunity of visiting. Ceylon, perhaps the most beautiful island in the world, save, possibly, Java, deserves mention. These two islands hav a richness of tropical growth nowhere excelled. They hav antiquities also, remarkable and interesting, which I cannot dwell upon at this time.

There is a little land which is probably familiar to you all—a small tract of country called Palestine, or the Holy Land—which I will talk a little about, as perhaps it will interest you as much as to hear of countries farther east. The feeling that comes over the visitor to this country which we hav read so much about since the days of our childhood, is one of disappointment at its diminutivness and insignificance. While in Greece, Baalbec, Egypt, India, Ceylon, Java, China, and Japan there are many ruins of ancient temples and edifices of various kinds, in Palestine there are no ruins of Jewish temples. There are some remains of edifices built by the Phœnicians, the Greeks, and the Romans, but there is hardly one stone remaining on another which is known to be Jewish in character. There is nothing to prove that there ever was such a building as Solomon's Temple, and there is also little proof that such a person as Solomon ever lived. The foundation walls under the Mosque of Omar, where the temple is said to hav stood, are believed to hav been built in the time of Herod, not long after the beginning of the Christian era. If Solomon and his temple did exist, it is very singular that none of the people of those times knew anything of them. Herodotus, the eminent Greek historian, who lived and wrote in the age immediately succeeding the time of Solomon, though he twice traveled through Syria, in which country Palestine is situated, and wrote up full accounts of what he saw, he had nothing to say of either Solomon or his temple. Had they been in existence, he assuredly would hav known it. Neither did any historian of the time know anything of them. There is no proof that any nation of that period knew anything of Solomon's glory or of his temple. It is probable they are myths, as are most of the persons and events named in the older Jewish story. There is no proof that what is considered the older portion of the Bible was written even till after the return from the Babylonian captivity, where the priest Ezra and his scribes produced them, perhaps, somewhat in thh manner given in 2 Esdras, chapter xiv—the Greek form of the name Ezra—when he took five scribes and went apart, when he opened his mouth and drank a cupful of fiery fluid which inspired him with wisdom and understanding, when the five scribes wrote wonderful visions of the night. In the course of forty days under such inspiration, it is said, the scribes wrote two hundred and four books, seventy of which were to be kept secret and the others published openly. Whether this is the way in which the books of the Old Testament were written, it is tolerably certain that they had no existence until within six centuries of our era. When the Jews were taken captive to Babylon they were little bet ter than are their cousins of to-day—the Arabs and Bedouins of the desert—a wild, nomadic race, without wealth, without literature, without civilization, and without a history. During the fifty years they passed in Babylon, that seat of ancient knowledge and civilization, they learned far more than they ever knew before, and when they were sent back to their own country they felt the necessity of a national history and of sacred writings of their own. It was not difficult for shrewd priests, with what they had learned in Babylon, to write up a story of their nation and of the sayings and doings of their God, their prophets, their warriors, and their great men.

A very strong proof that the Old Testament books were thus written is found in the fact that the cosmogony of the first book in the Bible, including the account of the creation of the world, of the Garden of Eden, of the remarkable snake, of the fall of man, of the great flood, etc., is almost exactly after the model of the Babylonish claims, for in the excavations made in Nineveh and Babylon by the great English excavators, Rawlinson and Smith, they found a great number of earthen tablets of various sizes, inscribed in cuneiform characters, not less than four thousand years old, in which these same stories were narrated. These men learned to read those tablets, and there they found our story of the creation, of the fall of man, and of the flood. It is easy to understand that the Jews, in the course of their half century's residence in Babylon, could learn all this and could also appropriate it and incorporate it into their story upon their return. It is highly probable, from this standpoint, that Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Moses, Joshua, Samuel, David, Solomon, etc., are simply mythical characters, as are St. Nicholas or Santa Claus, Bluebeard, Sindbad the Sailor, Jack the Giant-killer, William Tell, John Bull, Brother Jonathan, and Mrs. Columbia. I hav seen in the British Museum the very tablets on which these Babylonish stories were inscribed, and there is no doubt that their antiquity is decidedly greater than the first five books in the Old Testament, usually ascribed to Moses.

It is far more reasonable to conclude that those books were not written by Moses, that the leading features of them were taken from Babylonish literature, than that Moses wrote them, for it nowhere says in those books that Moses wrote a word of them, and the difficulty is conceded of a man being able to write an account of his own death and burial. And inasmuch as the city of Dan and the kings of Judah are mentioned in Genesis, and these had no existence until a long period after the time of Moses, it is entirely clear that he never wrote the account. And even if it is conceded he did write it it makes it far from true. Moses was no more able to truthfully tell what took place two thousand years before he was born than any other man.

Yes, as one journeys over the Holy Land he is constantly impressed with its narrow limits and the poor quality of its surface. When I climbed up on the top of the Mohammedan tomb on the hill back of Nazareth, I could look over uearly all of the country—said to hav been selected by Yahweh for a dwelling place for his chosen, peculiar people, promising it to them for an everlasting inheritance, and designing it for his own special kingdom—quite as well as some farmers can overlook their farms. I could view the Mediterranean Sea far beyond the confines of the country on the west, the mountains of Lebanon and Mount Hermon far in the north, the mountains of Moab beyond the Jordan in the east, and nearly to the mountains of Judah in the south. Thus I could view the greater part of the land which the Jewish God is said to hav selected in preference to all the countries of the globe, and which he made his residence, caring little or nothing for the other portions of the earth, but rather declaring curses and maledictions upon them. I estimated that about one thousand square miles of the country in the valleys is fair farming land, and can easily be plowed; another thousand miles on the hillsides which are terraced can also be plowed and cultivated in vineyards, fig and olive trees, while the remaining three thousand five hundred square miles are simply naked, barren rocks, which could never be cultivated unless with a crowbar.

I realized while passing over this dismal, diminutiv country that the person who selected this rock-bound land in preference to all the world could not hav been a good judge of real estate, that he knew nothing of the continent of America or the great states of New York, Michigan, Ohio, Illinois, Iowa, Missouri, and Kansas, for those familiar with these countries could not be justified in selecting such a miserable country as Palestine. I was able to realize also what a signal failure the whole Yahweh enterprise was. Afrer boasting repeatedly of the great value and desirability of the country, and giving it to his chosen people for an everlasting possession, in which he should set up his kingdom forever, after a troublous, precarious career of a few centuries, during which period his chosen people were defeated and captured by their enemies, the neighboring nations, more than a dozen times, they were finally driven entirely and disgracefully out of the country; and for more than eighteen hundred years they hav scarcely been allowed to set a foot upon the miserable soil. I realized that it was one of the most complete failures and fizzles that has ever been heard of. Not only has his chosen people forsaken the country which he gave them for a perpetual home, but he has also forsaken it himself and has not been in that narrow domain for hundreds of years. I furthermone do not believe that the devil takes the slightest interest in it, or that he ever visits it.

Volume II.

Of "A Truth Seeker Around the World" has been issued and mailed. If any who hav subscribed for the set fail to receive the copy due them they will please notify us promptly.

IT is but justice to the Banner of Light to say that it decided that it could not be Henry Slade who was at Belleville, Ont., upon the ground that it knew him to be a genuin medium, while the Slade who was there confessed himself to be fraudulent. It afterward claimed that Slade acknowledged he had used fraud to avoid going to prison. It is perhaps true that a man will sometimes confess to what he has not been guilty of to be spared the infliction of torture and of imprisonment, but this is an awkward plea at best. It is humiliating for a man to confess to an untruth to avoid imprisonment. It is far better to be guilty of no untruth, and to confess to none, prison or no prison.

A New League at Milwaukee.

The Liberal agitation and the reception of Mr. Bennett in Milwaukee, Wis., result in the organization of a new auxiliary League in that city. There was a "dead" one there before, and R. C. Spencer, the president, was keeping it dead, except when it served his purpose to throw mud upon the National League. Dr. T. W. Williams is president of the new League; P. A. Stuart, secretary, and Mrs. M. A. Brown, treasurer. Mrs H. S. Lake, and Mrs. Dr. Severance were activ in getting up this new auxiliary.

The Watkins Meeting.

It is to be hoped as many Liberal friends will attend the meeting at Watkins as can make it convenient to do so. It bids fair to be one of the largest meetings ever held in the country. These re-unions are of the greatest service. They hav not only a good effect upon those who participate in them, but also upon the public at large. Let there be a general turn out, and let the world be able to form some idea as to what the Liberal strength is.

The Watkins Convention.

THE OPENING SESSION.

At 10 o'clock A.M., Aug. 23d, Dr. Brown, the president, will call the Convention to order at Freer's Opera House in Watkins, after which there will be a free conference meeting of ten-minute speeches until adjourned. It is very desirable that as many as can be present at the first day's session of the Convention, and especially that all who are in Watkins Wednesday morning be promptly on hand at 10 o'clock. At 2 o'clock the afternoon session will open by the delivery of the annual address by the president

SUBJECT OF LECTURES.

"Last Words in the Pulpit," by George C. Miln. "Is 'Leaves of Grass' Obscene?" by George Chainey. "The Crthodox Scheme of Salvation," by Judge C. B. Waite. "The Spirit of Humanity in American Poetry," by Samuel P. Putnam. "The Mission of Liberalism," by Mrs. H. S. Lake. "Was Woman an Afterthought?" by Matilda Joslyn Gage. "Freedom of Speech, Pen, and Mails," by Lucy N. Colman. "Superstition," by M. Babcock. "The National Liberal League," by T. C. Leland. "Alcoholism," by Prof. Stolz. "A Fable and a Dream, the Foundation upon which Christianity Rests," by D. M. Bennett. "The Era of God versus the Era of Man," by Courtlandt Palmer. "Is There Evidence of Design in the Universe?" by ex-Rev. J. H. Burnham, of Michigan. The other speakers hav not as yet announced their subjects.

BY SENECA LAKE STEAMERS.

People attending the Freethinkers' Convention from the northern part of New York state, or from the East or West by the way of the New York Central and Hudson River Railroad should take the steamer at Geneva for Watkins Glen. These boats hav agreed to sell tickets for $1, the round trip. This is a most delightful ride, and the best way to reach the Convention.

Aristocratic Freethought.

The true name for so-called "cultured Freethought" is "Aristocratic Freethought." Culture is too good a word for it, for its culture is only veneer. It is an outside polish. It is a thing put on for the sake of appearance. It is a tawdry theatrical garment. It is the paint of the actor. It has all the meanness of hypocrisy, only it is not quite so deep. It is so superficial that one can quite easily see through and detect the coarse-grained blackguardism that it seeks to cover.

A true culture, of course, makes one universal in his sympathy. It deepens and broadens and freshens the whole nature. It givs one an insight into the worthiness of all things. In the light of a true culture every particle of humanity is glorified. Nothing therein is despised. Every genuin feeling is acknowledged. Whatever concerns the world in any of its aspects concerns the truly cultivated intellect.

But the so-called "cultured Freethought" is the most bigoted and sectarian thing of the day. It has the sublime complacency of absolute stupidity. It thinks that it knows all things, while it is really as ignorant as a fool. It sits in judgment on men and things like a veritable Dogberry. It has a little "consensus" of its own, and outside of that discerns only darkness. "Cultured Freethought" is the child of orthodox dogmatism, and therefore it is puppyism. It is full of backbiting, and when it has nothing else to do it tries to catch its own tail in a metaphysical whirl.

"Cultured Freethought" is entirely abstracted from the spirit of humanity. It has no sympathy with the struggling masses. It has never yet uttered a ringing word for industrial liberty. It is the snobbery of Liberalism. It is the dandy of reform. It always carries a perfumed handkerchief for fear that its poor nose may be defiled. No poverty-stricken wretch must ever come betwixt the wind and its nobility. It cries "hands off" to the vulgar crowd.

Therefore "cultured Freethought" is "aristocratic Freethought." It is not democratic. It has no faith in the people. Having demolished the god in the sky it acknowledges in its stead the god of respectability. It worships Mrs. Grundy. It bows down to the successful scamp. It is the slave of wealth. It is the puppet of society. Its Freethought is merely a polished luxury. It is worn like an elegant dress. It is part of a sumptuous feast. Aristocratic Freethought doesn't care a fig what becomes of humanity. It prates of intellectual liberty, but it has not one word to say for the multitudes who sweat at thankless tasks. It is the representativ to-day of that ancient Phariseeism which Jesus so heartily cursed; and as it could not answer his arguments it nailed him to the cross, to its eternal infamy. Even thus is the aristocratic Freethought of the present age. It has all the venom of a Calvin, and as it can not burn at the stake it does all within its power to destroy reputation. Its methods of warfare are those of the coward, the sneak, and the savage. It wields the dagger of the assassin. For the sake of revenge it will engage in the dirtiest work. Of course it wouldn't besmear it hands with honest labor, but it will most willingly besmear its hands with the slime of scandal. It delights in throwing mud. It has made a fine art of slander. It is sly, awful sly. It can deal a foul blow. It has not the slightest compunction in striking under the belt. When it can't bite it keeps up a melancholy and persistent bark.

Aristocratic Freethought is at heart as cruel as the grave. It has all the harshness of the priesthood without the element of mercy. It will sacrifice any thing to its own welfare. It thinks of nothing beyond to-day's respectability. It will cringe even to Comstock for the sake of a word of praise. It seeks for its allies the traitor and the spy. In discarding Christianity it becomes Shylock the Jew, and seeks to cut the heart out of its adversary by legal tricks. It will do anything except make a fair, honest, and square fight. It will hesitate at no injustice unless it takes courage to do it. Aristocratic Freethought is very prudent. It looks out for number one constantly. It locks itself in its little castle at the Hub and shoots its arrows through the port-holes of its spite. It dodges when it sees the smoke of battle.

Aristocratic Freethought is essentially provincial, as all aristocracies are. It dwells in a little world of its own. It has no large knowledge or outlook. Its highest idea of the universe is a Boston audience. To this it bows and scrapes as to Almighty God, especially if it has a plethoric pocketbook. Aristocratic Freethought expects that the world will come to its feet as it sits in its easy-chair. It has a sublimely ridiculous idea of its importance. When it takes snuff it expects all the world to sneeze. It puts on the airs of a "school-ma'am." It is a "bluestocking" of the first water. It takes a great deal of pride in "names;" without "names" it would hardly survive. It has only one idea, and that is 'the consensus of the competent," and the "competent" is the aristocratic Freethinker himself. He can measure all philosophies; he can dictate all moralities. He can out-pope the pope, and out-Cæsar Cæsar. He can blow his own trumpet with all the thunder of a papal bull. Such is aristocratic Freethought, the Mephistopheles of American Liberalism, the clovenfoot of all human history—the very devil of orthodoxy without the safeguard of a decent god. No wonder that Prof. Adler has spewed the ghastly humbug out of his mouth. He is democratic; he has some sympathy with the people; he will send a hundred dollars to the strikers; he will stand up for the rights of the lowliest men and women; he believes in practical work. No wonder that he is sick and tired of this aristocratic nonentity, this show of respectability, this gymnastic parade of metaphysical quiddities. Every decent man will learn to abhor it. It is nothing after all but dead men's bones. The old giants are dead. Aristocratic Freethought religion is but the rattling of their chains by crawling vermin.

What the world wants is democratic Freethought, and this will triumph through the powers of universal sympathy, through the ongrowing spirit of humanity. Democratic Freethought rejects nothing that belongs to man in his manifold struggles.

Aristocratic Freethought is at heart the ally of the Jesuit. It may cry out, "Anti-theology-mad Liberalism," but it is itself the spawn of theology. It is the base-born child of superstition, ashamed of its parentage, yet betraying its bastard blood in every feature and in every motion. To all intents and purposes it is dead. The job now is to bury it out of sight.

Fraternal.

And if thy heart and thy drift be as mine
To all mankind, love and good will,
Now lift to me that friendly hand of thine,
And thus let us pull together still!

For twenty years the writer was employed as a revival mininster in the Methodist Episcopal church, and for more than sixty years he has been every way familiar with the mental machinery by which the Christian "God" or "godheads" are made (Heb. ii, 6). However, I hav from the beginning been familiar with all phases of mystical and mediumistic phenomena upon which modern Spiritualism is founded. My investigation of this movement commenced in the Fox family, New York, in 1848; and I am sure I hav witnessed as much since that period as any man can wish to see, and not only through mediums in my own family but through the best so-called "test mediums," both in this country and in France and England; and enough, I may say, to crystallize the conviction to a certainty in my own mind that all such "tests," as to the personal identity of these nondescript invisibilities, are fraudulent, as no names or dates are or can be given, nor, indeed, any other knowledge of us that they do not succeed in learning through a medium's brains. And I am equally sure that it cannot be shown that there is ever in any case more than one "spirit" to each medium (and in a vast majority of cases it cannot be proved that there are any at all); and hence what are called "tests" all depend on the clairvoyance by which it is obtained from living brains. But it has always seemed very strange to me how those calling themselves Spiritualists can sail under the Christian flag as some do, who repeat Theodore Parker's prayers when they shut their eyes, and talk to the air or to the ridge pole.

But this much I should not hav said but for the remarks by D. R. Burt in THE TRUTH SEEKER, July 15, 107, page 445; and in one or more papers I hav noticed similar invidious remarks of Mr. George Chainey. My own opinion is that there is not a man living outside the ranks of modern mysticism who is more fraternal in his estimate of Spiritualists than George Chainey. A more liberal and kinder heart does not throb in any living bosom, I am sure! And while Mr. Chainey and all Liberals are perfectly willing that all Spiritualists should do their own thinking of things unknowable, our Spiritual friends should not expect us to restrict our poetical flights when alluding to "angels" or to "gods" occasionally. Surely, while they exercise "faith" in phenomena produced by forms of force, of which the scientific world is wholly in the dark, they can allow their Liberal friends to rely upon nature's test—that consciousness and all memory of the past are wiped out by death. And if "ghosts" and "gods" there be for credulity to exercise itself upon, they inhabit another sphere—they do not belong to this world, and hav no business here.

It is easy to see that when this new form of mysticism commenced, in 1848, the progressiv tendencies of the age had begun. Hence, as those who yielded up to it their selfhood and self-control found themselvs unpopular, they readily fell into line with all progressiv movements. And I testify what I know when I affirm that the Liberal press has always given to Spiritualism an "open ring and fair play." The Boston Investigator, the Indianapolis Age, THE TRUTH SEEKER, the Agnostic, Dallas, Texas, and Man, hav each extended "the right hand of fellowship" to all Spiritualists. And, while I say this, I ought to add that there is not a Spiritual paper that has reciprocated this liberality shown to mysticism in this behalf by the Liberal press. The mystic press admits discussion as to the occurence of the mystic rap; but it is classed similarly as the Christian press is in matters that depend on "faith" in the unknowable. Faith in these things unseen by humanity is the motiv power alike both of Christianity and Spiritualism. But Liberals are friendly to the latter because it fights Christianity not only by its daily miracles, but by Christianity's own power—"faith" in the unknowable; hence we are as we should be, allies. And there is every consideration why we should pull together in behalf of freedom and progression "forever one and inseparable." In one respect we are all alike. Each human mind believes all it thinks true; and Liberals are the only class in mankind that, as a class, do not fabricate by "faith" the evidence (Heb. ii, 1) of things unseen and unknown. But they yield to all the right to think for themselvs; and this right is denied by Christianity while it is allowed by Spiritualism. Hence, in so far as Liberals and Spiritualists are agreed in regard to freedom and progression, they can and they will pull together!

LAROY SUNDERLAND.

Quincy, Mass., July 18, 107.

The Logic of Theism.—A Paradox.

All objects of knowledge exist. That which does not exist cannot be an object of knowledge, and that which is not an object of knowledge does not exist; that is, it cannot be objectivly or subjectivly related to man. It might as well not exist as to exist without our knowledge, as in such a case it cannot possibly influence or affect our existence one way or another. Therefore all things existing at the present time without our knowledge are related to us simply as non-existent—nothing.

God, it is conceded by the church, is not an object of knowledge. Coleridge says, "A god understood is no god at all;" and Prof. Swing, in one of his beautiful poem-sermons, confesses, "We must simply confess the fact of such a Father of all, and that he is not something our eye can see or ear hear." But if "he" cannot be understood, nor heard nor seen, he ceases to be an object of knowledge, and consequently, to us, does not exist at all.

The Bible at one time was considered in itself proof abundant to establish the existence of a God. It was looked upon as a direct revelation from "him," and therefore of course infallible. Doubt and investigation were considered a crime, and a blind subjection to the literal version an imperativ necessity to an average moral status and the final salvation of man. All objections were met with, promptly pointing to the littleness of man, the "omniscience of God," and the audacity that one so puny and imbecil should presume to grasp the idea of an "infinit God."

God then existed, or was supposed to exist, only by virtue of the entire subjugation of man's intellect to the priesthood and the letter of the Bible. The latter infallible and a true revelation from God, its words were indeed proof, and a God then became virtually an object of knowledge and real.

But of late it is generally conceded by a progressiv church that the Bible is not thus strictly reliable, and its most brilliant representativs scorn its crude notions concerning a God, the creation of an infinit universe, the origin and destiny of man, etc., and are untiring in their efforts to prove a God by the data of science, by logic and reason, ignoring entirely that venerable volume, which, for six thousand years, has been the only basis for such a God. But, alas, nothing else in the world—nothing whatever in the vast expanse of nature proves a God! The Bible overthrown, and knowledge and reason as the sole basis for our belief, we then hav absolutely not a vestige of material left to build a faith upon, and the idea to-day exists in the minds of all intelligent Christians only by virtue of the veneration they once held for this God, but which, if first announced to the world to-day, and not transmitted to them from the pages they now discard as fable and myth, they would also readily consign to the realms of fiction.

Then having no evidence or knowledge of a God to-day, "he" ceases to exist, and we must infer that our good ancestors back, back, back to the primary races of men, where the God-idea originated, to explain the causes of natural phenomena, of which they were sadly ignorant (and of which their "Father in heaven," in "his" inscrutable wisdom, also chose to keep them so, the Bible being rather deficient in its character as a text-book of scientific subjects), not being endowed with superior powers of conception, or even approximating our own degree of intelligence and learning, knew no more about it than we do, and therefore the results of their crude intellectual efforts must cease to be authoritativ to us.

The existence of God then being in doubt, or, to say the least, having become a legitimate subject for philosophic discussion, as the many sermons preached in "his defense" of late now prove, is it not strange that the church, ever so boastful of its possession of the whole truth, is yet unwilling to apply same rule of logic and same methods of analysis to the basis of its belief which it so imperativly insists must be applied to all other objects of existence, and that while it is inexorable in its demands upon the scientist to rationally explain the existence and attributes of all things, it entirely ignores an explanation of the assumed premises of its own belief, and in its inscrutable wisdom explains the knowable by the unknowable, the actual by the ideal, existence by non-existence, the tangible by the assumed, the positiv by hypothesis—in short, everything by nothing?

It imperativly demands an explanation for all existing things, but boldly assumes the existence of an imaginary something far greater than all else, and insists it needs no explanation, thus not only leaving all things unexplained, but adding the infinitly greater mystery of this assumed explanation (God) to the original problem.

All finite phenomena are but effects of preceding causes. We all know this, and the church is ever ready to renounce the idea that anything can come by chance. They are rigidly exacting in the application of all rules of logic in all their researches—as far as they go. Paley said a watch could not come by chance, it must hav a designer, and the cosmos, revealing to our amazed vision infinitly greater complications and harmonious order, must of necessity hav a designer also, and all the church, startled at the profundity of the argument, kneel and worship Paley and God. But it never occurred to them that to be consistent and truly philosophical, the harmony and order existing in this God, as well as "his" origin and attributes, must likewise be accounted for and explained, or else the supposed explanation falls to the ground, leaving us infinitly farther from a correct solution than the original problem.

If the universe—being tangible and real—necessitates a designer and creator, then surely this creator, simply by virtue of "his" intangibility and "his" incongruous incomprehensible nature, is not exempt from the application of some laws of argument, and this of course in turn necessitates a preceding cause or causes, a designer and creator also. And if this is self-evident, this designer and creator, preceding God the creator of the universe, also could not possibly come by chance and "he" again would necessitate another God, and "he" another, and so on ad infinitum.

If it be insisted that this God, of whom we know absolutely nothing, can and does exist uncaused from all eternity, and by virtue of "his" own inherent qualities, how much more reasonable to suppose that this infinit aggregation of matter and force, the tangible basis of all forms and phenomena, filling infinit space, and which comprises the sum total of all we do know (and which never could not hav existed, as from nothing, nothing can come) is eternal, never was caused, and possesses within itself all-sufficient potencies, during an infinit cycle of ages, to produce every known result?

The church in its supreme transcendentalism ventures just one step too far. It leaps from the boundaries of the knowable into the gulf of the unknowable, into absolute vacuity, and there in the realms of fiction seeks the agencies and potencies from whence to design, fashion, and manipulate an infinit universe. It divests the vast cosmos of infinit, eternal matter and co-existent forces of all qualities and powers to produce motion, heat, light, life, growth, development, or of any or all attributes to produce a single phenomena, but lo! invest the grand imaginary "man," "spirit," "God"—all vague phantasmagoria—outside of nature with all the requisit potencies to first miraculously create "himself" from nothing, and then create from the large quantity of nothing remaining the immense aggregation of suns, moons, worlds, systems, and all the multifarious appurtenances pertaining thereto. This vast universe, comprising all we can see, know, and understand, individually or by the aid of latest scientific developments, and infinitly more, this all, in the opinion of the church, is nothing but a vast aggregation of inertia or dry lifeless dust, incapable to move or produce any result by virtue of its own attributes, but the great something outside of all—nothing—can and does do it as the potter molds the clay, etc. Everything can do nothing, but nothing can do everything.

The great all is the basis of the Materialist's belief, the remainder—nothing—the only basis for a God! Everything is not God, all which is left when everything is subtracted from all—nothing—this alone is God.

In its researches for final causes, the church applies a rigid logic to living and existing things, but ignorant of nature, its order, modes, and forces, it jumps from the world of reality, from this universe of grandeur and of beauty, into simply nothingness, and there, in endless vacuity, finds a myth which it places upon a celestial throne and worships it or "him" as our "heavenly father" (who had no father), who is uncaused, omnipotent, and, as Prof. Swing says, "here and there and everywhere," and who by wonderful feats of jugglery, and necessarily by means of "his" gigantic proportions, personally designs, creates, and manipulates the great all that livs and moves in the universe.

Once upon a time it was satisfactory to the heathen to be told that the earth was supported on the back of a huge tortoise, and so also it has ever been satisfactory to the Theist, when contemplating the origin of things, to receive for an answer, though equally stupid, "God made it!" All finite phenomena being preceded by a certain chain of causes and effects, he assumed that the grand infinit aggregation of matter and force, the fount and only true first cause of all causes, and producing all phenomena, must hav a preceding cause also, and he then wandered into the realms of fiction and created from nothing a god or innumerable gods, ranging in characteristics all the way from a man or other animal to a great spirit filling all space outside of matter, and this creation of his assumption was final, absolute. It was supreme and at a variance from all else in nature inasmuch as it was not subject to the same mental analysis, and that while all visible things from the animalcula, rose, tree, man, world, sun, and system, in his opinion, necessitated a designer and maker, this God solely by virtue of "his" invisibility and "his" imaginary grandeur, needed no god or designer to precede "him," and could and did exist from all eternity.

Now, why all things visible and real, incuding the infinit mass of matter in its original elements, should necesitate a creator, and this invisible, unthinkable God be exempt from this imperativ maxim of the church, this proposition I call upon the church to explain.

Strange logic, profound consistency! To worship a god whose sole right and title to this exalted honor consists absolutely and solely in the one fact that "he" is not an object of knowledge, but incomprehensible, intangible, unthinkable!

Suppose off in space somewhere, God were visible to us as is now the sun or moon; supposing we all alike could behold this "heavenly father" reposing on "his golden throne" in transcendent glory and celestial splendor, would then these same philosophers in the church in their search for final causes persist in exempting "him" from the same rules of logic they now apply so rigidly to all other visible phenomena, and still insist that this actual, tangible God could come by chance, or exist uncaused absolute and by virtue of "himself" and "his" divine attributes from all eternity? And in thus asserting the supremacy of this god, and denying another god—the creator of this visible god—would not, in so doing, their favorit epithet of "Atheist" apply to them as fitly as it does now to those who believe in the supremacy of nature and deny a creator of the universe? And in thus denying the existence of (another) god to this visible god, would not also their favorit argument and verse from the psalmist, "The fool hath said in his heart, There is no god" (to this god) apply to them as well as it now does to the Atheist who only scorns the identical idea and nothing more, namely, that an invisible god, greater than all else, can exist uncaused, the greatest "orphan" of all!

It then becomes clear that the church has ever found its only proof (?) for a god in the fact that "he" is invisible and intangible, and that, conceding this, "he" cannot be proven and therefore does not exist at all! For could "he" be proven, and as all objects of knowledge, seen, heard, felt, and understood, "he" would instantly cease to be god, become divested of all supernatural and invested only with natural attributes, and then, of course, be instantly consigned by the church to the realms of nature, which, however, need no god. And a superfluous god is more unreasonable than no god at all.

The parodox, then, is also apparent that the church now finds and has ever found its sole proof (?) of God's existence in the one solitary fact that "he" has and never can be proven, and that, therefore, being no object of knowledge, "he" does not exist at all.

The Freethinkers' National Convention,

AT WATKINS GLEN, AUG. 23, 24, 25, 26, and 27, 1882.

Information in relation to speakers, hotel, and boarding-house accommodations and arrangements with the railroads and steamboat companies, etc.

SPEAKERS ENGAGED.

Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, of Washington; Ex-Rev. Geo. C. Miln, Editor Advance, and Judge C. B. Waite, late member of Congress, of Chicago; D. M. Bennett, editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, Hon T. B. Wakeman, Courtlandt Palmer, Prof. A. L. Rawson, T. C. Leland, and Ex-Rev. S. P. Putnam, of New York city; Ex-Rev. Geo. Chainey, Horace Seaver, editor Boston Investigator, Hon. Elzur Wright, and Prof. W S. Bell, of Boston; Matilda Joslyn Gage, of Syracuse; Col. M. E. Billings, of Waverly, Iowa; Rev. J. H. Burnham, of Saginaw City, Mich.; Hon. A. B. Bradford, Enon Valley, Pa.; Hon. John E. Remsburg, of Atchison, Kas.; M. Babcock, St. Johns, Mich.; Mrs. H S. Lake, of San Francisco, Cal; John F. Engle, Scotland Neck, N. C.; Hon. Judge McCormick, Franklin, Pa.; C. Fred. Farlin, M.D., Wolcott, N. Y.; Lucy Colman, Syracuse; Charles Bright, of Australia, and Prof. J. Stobz, of Toledo, O. The prospects are that Prof. Felix Adler, of New York; Geo. Jacob Holyoke, of London; Parker Pillsbury, of Mass., and Mrs. Clara Neymann, of New York, will be present and the committee is making an effort to procure the attendance of that most distinguished thinker of the world, Herbert Spencer, who has just arrived in this country.

HOTELS AND BOARDING-HOUSES.

The hotels hav agreed to keep the people in attendance upon the Freethinkers's Convention as follows, per day: the Lake Shore House for $1.35; Fall Brook House, $1.50; Jefferson House, $1.50; Glen Park Hotel, $2 and $2.50, according to the rooms taken; Glen Mountain House, $3. The headquarters of the Convention will be at the Glen Park Hotel, and Mr. Frost, the proprietor, will run a free bus to and from the Convention. The boarding-houses kept by Mrs. A. Stoll, Mrs. Merrott, Mrs. Freer, Mrs. George Frost, Mrs. Mallette, Mrs. Graham, and others will board and lodge people attending the Convention for $1 per day. C. S. Frost, of Watkins, will procure board, on application, for any person and at such rates as is desired.

TENTING GROUNDS.

The village park has been engaged by the Association, and a portion of it can be used on which to put up tents for private parties.

STEAMBOAT ACCOMMODATION.

The Seneca Lake Steam Navigation Company has agreed to make special rates of $1 for round trips from Geneva to Watkins and return during the session of the Convention, commencing Aug. 22d, and continuing to Aug. 28th. And the Company will run a special boat on Sunday. (This will be a delightful trip.)

RAILROADS.

The only roads that hav agreed to sell tickets at reduced rates are the N. Y., L. E. & W. (the Erie), the Northern Central Railway Company, the Pennsylvania Railroad Co., the Philadelphia & Erie R. B. Division, and the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern. The Utica, Ithaca, & Elmira R. R. and the Cazenova, Cauastota & DeRuyter Railways will grant low rates to parties applying to M. W. Serat, General Passenger Agent, at Elmira, N. Y. People from the north and west of Watkins Glen will find it to their advantage to take the Syracuse, Geneva, & Corning Railroad to Watkins.

N. Y., L E., & W. (THE ERIE).

This road will sell excursion tickets (without "orders" from me) from any of the following stations to Elmira or Corning: Jersey City, Paterson, Newburg Junction, Port Jervis, Lackawaxen, Owego, Waverly, Binghampton, Addison, Canisteo, Hornellsville, Castile, Warsaw, Buffalo, Suspension Bridge, Wellsville, Friendship, Cuba, Olean, Salamanca, Dayton, Dunkirk, Bath, Avoca, Wayland, Avon, Rochester, Batavia, Cornwall, Conewango, Bradford, and Custer City.

OTHER ROADS.

To obtain the benefit of excursion rates from the Northern Central, Pennsylvania Railroad, the Philadelphia & Erie, and the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railways it will be necessary to first write to me (inclosing stamp) and procure a certificate.

There is some prospect that the Great Western Railroad will sell low rate tickets to Watkins. If so the Liberal public will be notified through the Liberal papers.

VERY IMPORTANT TO WESTERN FRIENDS.

There is already established from almost every town in the West very low excursion rates to Chautauqua Lake. These tickets are good until Oct. 1st, and persons attending at Watkins can avail themselvs of them. If you purchase these tickets when you get to Jamestown, if you come by the Atlantic & Great Western road, get an ordinary ticket to Salamanca and there get an excursion ticket on the Erie to Elmira. If you come by the Lake Shore Railroad, when you get to Fairview purchase an ordinary ticket to Dunkirk, and there get an excursion ticket to Elmira.

FROM NEW ENGLAND.

Excursion tickets can be procured at Hoosac Tunnel Railroad depot, 250 Washington street, Boston, to Watkins Glen and return to Boston for $18.25. Route, Fitchburg R. R. to North Adams, Troy & Boston R. R. to Troy, N. Y., Central & Hudson R. R. to Lyons and Geneva, Seneca Lake steamer to Watkins.

VERY CHEAP RATES.

Very cheap rates can be procured of most of the railroads by parties of ten or twenty persons or more by applying directly to the general passenger agent of the road for special rates. For further particulars apply to H. L. GREEN, Sec.

JUDGE WAITE TO ATTEND THE WATKINS CONVENTION.

CHICAGO, ILL., July 22, 1882.

H. L. GREEN, ESQ., My Dear Sir: Your favor of the 19th inst. is received. I hav seen no printed circular or notice of the meeting at Watkins Glen, but assuming that it is to be a convention of Freethinkers of all kinds, and not of any particular section of them, I shall make my arrangements to be present.

The time has come when the organized power of bigotry and superstition should be met and overthrown in the only way in which it can be done—by counter organization. In particular it is time that any doctrin which involves the death of God should be exploded. If Jesus was God, and laid down his life with the intention of taking it up again and with the ability to do so, then he did not die in good faith, and his pretense of dying was a fraud. If, on the other hand, he really did die, being God, then how does the case stand? Either his father remained alive for the purpose of sustaining the universe, and of raising his son on the third day, in which case there were two gods, the one alive the other dead, or else if they were both substantially one, and the one God was dead, then who or what remained to support and direct the universe? Or could it go on all the same without any God? And if so, what need of a God? These are questions which the priests should be called upon to answer to the satisfaction of an intelligent people—a people who cannot longer be satisfied with the dogmatic sophistries of the past.

Wishing you success in every effort for Freethought and for a free people, I remain, Very truly yours, C. B. WAITE.

LETTER FROM GEORGE CHAINEY.

BOSTON, MASS., Aug. 1, 1882.

DEAR FRIEND GREEN: It givs me great pleasure to assure you that I shall be present at the Watkins Convention. The remembrance of the cheerful sociability, kindly greetings and inspiring addresses that characterize these conventions make them a boon above all price to every earnest Freethinker. These, together with the high reputation of Watkins Glen as a most invigorating and pleasant summer resort, ought to increase the attendance of the present convention very largely over all others. I inclose a greenback to help you in meeting preparatory expenses which, by experience, I know to be very large. I hope many others will do likewise.

Your friend, GEORGE CHAINEY.

A Spiritualist Convention.

A convention of the Spiritualists of central New York will be held in the Daveraux Opera House at Oneida, Madison Co., on the 19th and 20th of August, commencing Saturday, the 19th, at two o'clock P.M, and closing Sunday evening.

J. Frank Baxter, the test medium, singer and speaker of Chelsea, Mass., Mrs. S. A. Byrnes, of Boston, are engaged as principal speakers.

Friends from abroad will be entertained by the citizens of Oneida as far as possible, and Allen's Hotel, near the depot, will entertain guests at reduced rates.

Spiritualists of central New York, remember that our opposers hav pronounced us dead. Let the Oneida convention tell them that we still liv. MRS. W. H. HICKS, Sec'y.

Delta, Oneida Co, N. Y., July 31, 1882.

A Correction.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Owing to somebody's mistake, the notice for the camp-meeting at Lansing appears in THE TRUTH SEEKER as addressed only to Spiritualists. It is the annual camp-meetiug of the Michigan State Association of Spiritualists and Liberalists. We can't consent to hav the Liberal factor left out in the cold in that way. Please correct and oblige Yours truly, S. B MCCRACKEN, Detroit, Mich., August 2, 1882.

Press Notices of Mr. Bennett's Movements.

From the Health Monthly.

As we go to press Mr. D. M. Bennett is being cordially received by the Liberals of the West. It is in contemplation to giv him a rousing reception at Watkins on his way home, and the Liberals of New York are preparing to giv him a public dinner on his arrival here. The Comstock tar is very plentifully applied at all the places at which he has stopped, but it doesn't stick to the veteran editor worth a cent, while the persecution makes his friends still more determined that he shall not be crushed out by the Comstock crowd. There are many warm, honest palms here, all outside of the Vice Society awaiting a grasp of his hand on his return to New York.

From the Free Trader.

Mr. Bennett, editor of the New York TRUTH SEEKER, has just completed his trip around the world. He lectured in San Francisco and other cities. In Ceylon he delivered an address, after a pressing invitation, to three thousand followers of Buddha, comparing the principles of Christianity and Buddhism. Every sentence was interpreted as he uttered it, and he was listened to with great attention, far more than was secured by the Rev. Joseph P. Cook, the Monday lecturer of Boston.

From the Kalamazoo Daily Gazette,

D. M. Bennett, the veteran editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER of New York city, paid our village an informal visit yesterday on his way home from a tour around the world.

Mr. Bennett is known the world over as an invincible champion of Freethought. Something over a year ago a portion of his subscribers throughout the United States and Canada, having become much interested in a series of letters contributed by him to his paper during a short European journey, and feeling that it would be bestowing honor well merited, as a partial recompense for his prior suffering for opinion's sake, invited him to make a journey around the world at their expense. It was finally arranged that the journey should be made on condition that sufficient five-dollar subscriptions should be made. Nearly $8,000 was speedily raised, and Mr. Bennett published a history of his travels, five volumes in all, and givs them in return to each of the donors of the money. The journey began July 30th of last year, and extended through Scotland, Ireland, England, Holland, Germany, Austria, Greece, Cyprus, Syria, the Holy Land, Ceylon, Java Island, China, Japan, and nearly all the countries of note in the Old World.

In very many places banquets and receptions awaited the traveler. In London a grand banquet was given in his honor, presided over by Charles Bradlaugh, the noted Liberal member of Euglish Parliament.

On his return he crossed the Pacific ocean, landing in California a few weeks ago, where another grand reception awaited him.

As a historical and descriptiv writer Mr. Bennett stands today, in his sixty-fourth year, without a peer. His gratitude to his many friends is often referred to by him.

Mr. Bennett is a book publisher and dealer in New York. He was escorted about our streets by a party of gentlemen yesterday afternoon for an hour before he took the train for Three Rivers, where he visits old friends. It is expected that he will return to our village again in a few days before his final journey home.

Letters from Friends.

HARRISBURG, PENN., Aug. 5, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed my check for $8; three dollars for subscription (one year), dating from April 1, 1882, and five dollars for the books of your recent travels. Yours, etc., H. C. ORTH.

SIOUX FALLS, DAK. TER., July 24, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed in another letter of this date post-office order for $10, to be used as follows: $6 for your books of travels around the world (I send $6 instead of $5 for the reason that I hav been tardy in sending it), $1 to Jeremiah Hacker to keep body and soul together, and the balance, $3, to T. C. Leland to assist him in his noble League work. I hope to do better some time in the future. I hav seen a notice that there would be five volumes of your travels instead of three. If so, send them all, and the extra money will be forwarded to you.

Yours truly, N. S. JOHNSON.

[All will be included in four volumes. The last will be $1.50 extra.—ED. T. S.]

ALLIANCE, OHIO, July 13, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $4.50 to be used as directed. We welcome the good old truth seeker home from his long journey and appreciate the successful efforts of the ones at the helm during his absence. The conduct of the soreheads in attempting to injure Mr. Bennett's character is contemptible. His friends will never desert him without just cause. Sincerely yours, J. &. A. F. KIRK.

FORT MADISON, IOWA, July 16, 1882.

BRO. BENNETT: I suppose by this time you are at home sound and well, and as providence (with a small p) has kindly allowed such a sinner to prosper, it may be inferred that there is not so much sin in THE TRUTH SEEKER outfit as some pious people may hav imagined. We are feeling happy over the result, and thankful if necessary.

Inclosed find $3 on my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER, which has been well conducted during your absence. Fraternally yours, J. R. TEWKSBURY.

OAKLAND, CAL., July 8, 282.

FRIEND BENNETT: I hav just received the first volume of "A Truth Seeker Around-the-World," and today my wife and I hav read a good portion of it, and it is so interesting that I scarcely know how to wait for the remaining volumes. I am sorry your time with us in Oakland was so short. I suppose you are home ere this. I took your paper on trial for three months. When that time is up send it right along, according to agreement. I would like to hav a cabinet-size picture of yours to hang alongside of Col. Ingersoll's.

Now, Mr. Bennett, go on with the good work you are doing. Maybe some of the gods you bought will help you on. I saw two here the other day for $4. What do you say? Are they not cheap enough? Send me a line. Yours truly, N. H. SCHOW.

IRWIN STATION, PA., July 15, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3, for which please giv me credit for my ticket on the grand old chariot, THE TRUTH SEEKER, through the year of the spook's son, 1882, and also receive my sincere thanks for waiting till we arrived at the seventh station on the route, as you hav been so lucky as to make the journey safe around our globe. I send you my congratulations, hoping that you may liv to a good ripe age. and retain all of your mental and physical faculties to the end, and receive the honor due one who has done so much to emancipate the human mind from the shackels of superstition. Your description in all its parts in your journey has proven to be a success beyond the most sanguin expectation. My love to all the workers in your office, as well as yourself. WM. N. RIDINGER.

PIPESTONE CITY, MINN., July 28, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I can but congratulate you on your safe return once more to your loved home and beloved friends, for I with many others of your hosts of friends felt as if when you set sail on your long journey it would be the last time we would be privileged to number you among us; but thankful we are that you were permitted to return and enjoy another of those tributes of respect as has been given to the martyr of Freethought, free speech, and an earnest truth seeker before. The Liberals of this part of the far West hav just been enjoying some telling lectures given by the able, energetic, and enthusiastic worker, E. C. Walker, one who is working for the grand and glorious cause of freedom of the human mind. But the same Christian intolerance showed itself in our midst as it did in days past. This time not in the form of thumbscrews or torture-racks, etc., but by the low, dastardly cowardice of an unknown person attacking the person of our lecturer through an open window in the hall in which he was speaking, under cover of darkness. Not principled enough to refute or try to refute the arguments advanced by an open debate, he comes around in a sneak-thief style and insults a man by throwing eggs at him. Happily it was not a rotten one (one was all the low-minded coward dared throw), and that one, although well aimed, was stopped in its course; but unfornunately it struck another of the same ideas. This symbol of Christian bigotry did not prevent the getting of twenty-four signers for a charter for organizing a Liberal League, in which I intend to be an earnest and energetic worker since being aroused from my lethargy by this vile assault upon one who is endeavoring to spread liberality of thought and to free humanity from the thraldom of superstition.

Since writing the above the perpetrators of the vile attack hav been found out, and are being brought to justice.

Yours for the same rights to others as we ask for ourselvs. MRS. H. O. WHITEHEAD.

ALTOONA, PA., July 20, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: As a member of the New York State Association I heartily assent to Mr. H. L. Green's proposition to giv the veteran editor, Mr. D. M. Bennett, a dinner and reception on the evening of the third day of the convention, and if present I will cheerfully render any aid that would tend to make the reception a grand and complete success.

W. J. BURNS.

CEDAR RAPIDS, IOWA, July 24, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Please say to the many readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, particularly the working men and the class of business men who hav but little leisure to devote to study and historical research, that of all the efforts yet put forth to tell the simple truth regarding the story of the "printed word of God," it has never before been my good fortune to find anything that seemed te yield the satisfaction and gratify every desire so completely as does the "Short History of the Bible," by Bronson C. Keeler. Friends of Freethought desiring knowledge, do not delay to get a copy of the above work. It will enlighten the common reader more than any short work that I ever met with. Those who cannot afford to purchase "Judge Waite's History" will find in "Keeler's Short History" all the knowledge of the growth and make-up of that "mammoth fraud," the Holy Bible. I know it was a compact of priestly lies before I read this short history, and now I hav the witness and the evidence. Readers of TRUTH SEEKER, working men, and mechanics, send seventy-five cents and procure this work. I advise this because I feel that in so doing I will giv you cause for rejoicing.

T. J. B.

REEVES STATION, July 24, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: You will find inclosed seventy-five cents for Keeler's "Short History of the Bible." Please send the latest edition, bound in cloth,

THE TRUTH SEEKER, take it all in all, is the best paper that comes to my desk, though I take several newspapers and three medical journals. I am the only outspoken Liberal here, but think others will soon let their light shine by subscribing for THE TRUTH SEEKER. Long liv the author of so good and truthful a paper. W. L. MCDANIEL, M.D.

CINCINNATI, OHIO, July 18, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Pardon the remarks I here make. I think it must be clear and evident to your mind that a vast amount of good could be gained both to yourself and the people of this nation by your visiting all the great centers of population and lecturing on all the places and sights you hav witnessed. It certainly would hav a strong tendency to open the blind eyes and start thousands to thinking and reflecting. You could not spend a portion of your existence in a more laudable work. Every sincere Liberal would be with you and do his best to strengthen your hands in such a valuable proceeding. Should you at any time resolve on such a step, and come to this city, I will not be slow in doing everything that lies in my power for your success. You hav seen the distressing effects of superstition on the globe, and we in this country are not exempt from its blighting results. The Christian religion is equally a superstition as much as any others you hav seen, and in some respects more so, inasmuch as it claims infallibility and damns all to an eternal hell who do not swallow its senseless and hateful creeds, and would murder them here if unprotected by the civil powers. Therefore we should try in every way possible to expose and uproot so mean, untruthful, and dangerous a system. I hope you will not think my remarks intrusiv or uncalled for. I know you hav a zeal for the spread of sound sense, unmixed with any phase of supernaturalism, and that is my firm and honest principle. We hav not a very long time to liv. Let that precious time be well spent in trying to strike from the human mind the fetters placed there by a cunning, unprincipled, and deceitful swarm of clerical locusts who liv in indolence from the hard toil of unthinking and much mistaken dupes who bow and cringe to these impostors, who know nothing and can do nothing for one single mortal, but take their money and laugh them to scorn behind their backs for their weak and silly-mindedness. It is time the world awoke to a sense of its wrongs and the deceitful practices played on the masses of humanity for the benefit of pious fraud who loves to dwell in ease on this planet, but teaches its deluded devotees to despise it and liv only for some other world, of which they or anyone else know nothing, and for the best of reasons. There is no other. This is the world for man to be born and to die, and be forever extinct. There is no greater truth among men than this. T. WINTER.

KIRKSVILLE, MO., July 14, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I received sample copies of the Index a few days since as an inducement, I suppose, to subscribe. Although the title to the paper has been changed from the Free Religious Index to the Index, yet I find the publishers still term it a free religious paper. I hav no objection to the word free, but in view of the many and long continued evils resulting from religious beliefs, as admitted, I cannot conceive how the term, or anything synonymous, can with consistency be held up by any claiming to be Liberal or of advanced thought as embodying truth and goodness, or setting forth a proper mode of life. I hav no use for the term except as a synonym for all that is bad, for all manner of crimes hav been committed under the sanction of religion. In one of the numbers, by one of the editors, I find this logic: "Philosophical Materialism may consist with a high morality. Practical Materialism is immorality itself." It may be inferred from the above, and correctly, that I hav no use for the paper. WM. HART.

CENTER HILL, TEXAS, July 26, 1882.

DEAR BENNETT: I hope you yet liv. But will you deny that you hav been over Jordan? Now, do tell me, did you get out by miracle or the use of natural means? You know that miracles were the fashion about Jordan in the days of Elisha. Did you see where the fiery wagon stood while Elijah was climbing into it? or where the fiery horses were pawing? I am so glad that although you did cross over Jordan you got out on this side. I guess it was the old literal Jordan you went over, and not the camp-meeting Jordan. I hope you are enjoying home, sweet home, to-day among the denizens of earth.

Your age to-day is sixty-three years, seven months, and three days. Mine is eighty-three years, five months, and twenty-five days. If you can excuse an old brother's freedom with his friend, I'll tell you what I firmly believe, and that is that D. M. Bennett is to-day the most notorious man on earth, and I think, probably, one of the happiest men on earth. To be happy we must be good and do good. For my part, I cannot call to mind any one on this globe that has tried to do more good than D. M. Bennett, and I hold that he is a grand success in all his efforts. J. A. RUTHERFORD.

PHENIX, OREGON, July 25, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: As I hav been taking the Inter-Ocean for two years, I was on the eve of sending for the third year with two other new subscribers. I received the number with the answer to the question from the gentleman from Kansas, and we were all so disgusted with their beastly lies that we will not giv them another dollar. I sent them a letter telling them I would not take the paper until they would make a true statement of the affair, and I would like to know the name of the man who answered the question. As the Inter-Ocean has been trying to pull you down I hav tried to giv you a boost up, and I hope others will do the same. I inclose $3 for six new trial subscribers. I suppose you hav arrived home by this time. Was glad you had so many to giv you the hand of friendship, and myself and wife will be happy to extend ours if opportunity offers. We hav taken THE TRUTH SEEKER most of the time you hav run it, and the Banner of Light from the first, and we think we will take them while we stay in the flesh and both of you stick to the truth as close as you hav. J. HOLTON.

SHAWSVILLE, VA., July 16, 282.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclo sed $3 for THE TRUTH SEEKER for this year. You will remember me as one who is slow—always behind in paying up. Well, I hav first-class Christians to deal with here in Virginia. If they are not as outrageous as Comstock, Oliver Stevens, and Mr. Tobey, postmaster of Boston, it is because they hav not got into office yet—not because they hav not the same God and the same Holy Bible that set the Jews to get all they could of the Egyptians by lying, to run off with. I send you a copy of a letter I received from one of this stamp. Read and publish if you choose. I had sold him a copy of your "Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," your "Humphrey-Bennett Discussion," a copy-book, and a few pamphlets, whole cost $6.75, on a short credit. I was to be paid in wool to take to Slenker's factory, and this letter is all he proposes to pay. I guess I shall hav to charge the books to you and Ingersoll, both of you, or hav you had experience enough with such men of God?

Yours without any God at all, J. M. BARNES.

HUFFVILLE, VA., June 21, 1882.

J. M. BARNES, Sir: I will write you a few lines to say to you that I hav burned the books that I purchased from you and would like to hav the rest and do them the same way, and so you need not expect me to pay you one dime, I would see you or any other man dead before I would pay for any such books and if you think you can make me pay it go ahead and try that is what I want you to do and then I will show you what I will do, so I will not say any more for I hav said more now than the books is worthy of W. T. EPPERLY.

[It must indeed require a very bigoted and a very dishonest Christian to become incensed at a book containing the lives of the eminent sages and teachers of ancient times, or at a discussion giving both sides fairly, the Christian clergyman, a party in the discussion named, having full opportunity to say just what he wished to in defense of his system. If this Christian had been an honest man, when he found the books did not suit him he would hav returned them. To burn another man's property, or to refuse to pay for what he had regularly purchased, is no better than stealing. Can it be that the kingdom of heaven is composed of such?—ED. T. S.]

THE TIME FOR ACTION.

BERLIN, N. J., July 14, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: If Liberals ever intend to do anything effectual to gain their just rights it is time for them to act as well as talk. The same spirit is alive now in the churches that burnt John Rogers, Michael Servetus, and tortured to death millions of others, inflicting all the pains and agonies that were possible, out-deviling the most orthodox devils ever heard of. When were devils ever accused of torturing their kind as professed Christians hav done? Every Liberal, every man who wishes well to his country or his race, who has not already read the history of martyrs should do so at once, and learn what our fathers, and mothers, too, suffered by priestcraft and churchcraft to secure to us the little liberty we now enjoy. They literally waded through fire, tears, and blood to save us from mental slavery, worse than death, and instead of acting to secure and bequeath to our children what liberty we hav we are only talking and writing in a semi-cowardly way while our ignorant, bigoted enemies are forging chains and shackles for our necks and limbs. In every part of our nation they hav their untaxed churches, their Young Men's Christian Associations and Sabbath-schools, and are training every mind they can capture to their vile purposes. They hav the history of the murderous, plunderering myth, Moses, the licentious David and Solomon, with the lascivious songs of the latter, together with all other sorts of abominations in our public schools, and our children must be corrupted by reading them or go without learning. If we do not send our children to their Sabbath-schools, to be taught falsehood and licentiousness from a book that has caused a thousand times more misery than any other, they are insulted, and we ourselvs are taunted in the streets as infamous Infidels and blasphemers that hav no right to liv. A young lady who goes to church every Sunday dressed in the hight of fashion, hugging to her heart a Bible bound in "blue and gold," to show her dress and criticise the wardrobe of others, and never knows enough about the sermon to tell what the text was, told me I ought to be hung—that no Infidel ought to be suffered to liv. The sin for which she denounced me was reading the Boston Investigator, THE TRUTH SEEKER; the Agnostic, and other Liberal papers that kind friends and publishers send me free of charge, while no religious paper has ever been sent to me free, though many of their editors and publishers know that I hav been shut out of the world by deafness for fifty years.

We cannot testify in courts without swearing by a mythical God who can look complacently down from his glorious throne and see us, or our parents, and other relativs and friends, squirming in blazing brimstone through all eternity. And now they are trying to get the name of this abhorrent God into the Constitution, make him the supreme ruler of the nation, hav none but church bigots to make or execute laws, enact more stringent Sabbath laws, require us all to attend church and support it, or fine, imprison, roast, and torture us if we refuse. This spirit is alive in the churches, and is zealously working, mainly in private, to accomplish their purposes, and we are only chattering about it instead of rising in our might and beheading the hydra monster.

Read the consummate impudence that has been poured out by priests and religious papers on Col. Ingersoll and the New York committee who appointed him to deliver an address on Decoration Day, and you will not doubt that torturing and burning will commence at once if they get the power they are striving for. JEREMIAH HACKER.

RENO, NEV., July 5, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find $3 for THE TRUTH SEEKER for the ensuing year. It is, like an old and valued friend, hard to part with its company, and I will not in this case as long as I am able to pay for so valuable a paper.

The Liberals in Reno were expecting to giv Mr. Bennett and Dr. J. L. York a fine reception, but Mr. Bennett was in a hurry to return home and Dr. York was sick and unable to come to Reno then, so as a natural consequence we were exceedingly disappointed. By the way, Dr. York will be here by the 10th or soon after to deliver a series of his Free-thought lectures, which will giv Reno another impetus in Liberalism, which may result in a Liberal League. Who knows? Yours fraternally,

HARMON WRIGHT.

BUSHNELL, ILL., July 30, 1882.

DEAR BENNETT: I want to tell you that I hav never missed reading one copy of the glorious TRUTH SEEKER since you started it in Illinois. The longer I read it the more I think of it, and I love it more than the Christians love their God.

I was always taught to believe that Thomas Paine and the devil were the worst beings that God made, the fingers of the former being like a hawk's claws, and the latter's mouth like a baker's oven—full of fire, teeth like a collier's rake, eyes like tea-saucers, and cloven feet that no shoemaker could fit with a shoe or boot. But since I hav got to doing my own thinking I find that my teachers greatly misrepresented. I hav come to the conclusion that Paine was one of the best men that ever put a foot on American soil, and that the devil is a better man than his brother, and more truthful.

I read THE TRUTH SEEKER nearly every week to an intelligent audience that congregates at a Baptist shoe shop. It is causing quite an excitement. The proprietor, a Baptist, takes great interest in it, and says he must hav the Around-the-World volumes.

To make this interesting I will inclose post-office order for $3 to pay for my subscription.

O. P. TEITSWORTH.

LA HARPE, ILL., July 19, 1882.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Brother: How I would like to hav been at the reception given you at Chicago on Sunday July 16th, but I was too far away at that time, being in Keokuk, Iowa, and my limited supply of money would not admit of my coming. All of the money I can possibly get or earn I hav to use in paying my expenses in traveling over this state of Illinois in the interest of the Liberal League. I wrote you at Chicago, in the care of E. A. Stevens, but not knowing his street or number, I do not know whether he got it or not. I am certainly rejoiced over your return in health and good spirits, and I am more than pleased with the hearty receptions you hav received in your passage home across this continent. I know that it has been the spontaneous outpouring of love and good feeling for one who has been and is bravely fighting for the cause of mental freedom, and not an ovation worked up by a corrupt political faction over a dead scion, as was witnessed over the same route only two years ago. I voted for that scion twice. And you hav written a history of your travels which will be read with interest for generations to come. I hav no doubt but what your "Around-the-World" is the most accurate account of the countries and of the peoples you hav visited that has ever been written, and more especially so in the accounts given of the social, religious, and moral character of the inhabitants. But you could not see all of this little (I speak comparativly, when compared with other worlds and planets) globe in one year. I observe that your account of your travels partakes largely of the form of a past and present religious history, as it is very appropriate it should, for there is no doubt but what a large portion of those who hav subscribed for your work of travels hav done so through an earnest desire to get an honest and reliable history of the different religions of the world, more than they hav to get just a geography of the different countries. But there is one place which has a rather peculiar religious history, which you, in your anxiety to get home to the bosom of your family and your publishing house, was no doubt compelled to skip. But I hope, for the good of coming generations who will read your book, you will not forget to giv it an appropriate mentioning in the "Around-the-World." I allude to Nauvoo, Ill. I made a detour from my direct route south, through the western tier of countries of Illinois in order to visit Nauvoo. Having been informed that this once flourishing city of about thirty thousand inhabitants was now largely inhabited by Liberals, whom I was anxious to visit, with a view of inducing them to become identified with the National Liberal League, I went nearly a hundred miles around by rail in order to see them. Leaving my direct route south at Monmouth, I went to Burlington, Iowa, then southwest along the western shore of the Mississippi to Fort Madison and Montrose, and here by a ferry to Nauvoo. And as I stood upon the upper deck of the little steam ferry-boat and took in the grandly beautiful scenery of that spot of earth, once selected by that peculiar people, calling themselvs the "Latter Day Saints." I could not help reflecting on the amount of inhumanity heaped upon this people on account of their peculiar religious belief, and that too by a nation professing entire religious freedom and non-proscription on account of religious belief or unbelief. And I cannot conceive of any reason for the outcry continually being raised against Mormonism, unless it is to try to hide and cover up the social and political iniquity of their persecutors. The city of Nauvoo lies in a bend of the Mississippi River, forming the shape of a horse-shoe. For a distance of nearly three-quarters of a mile from the western shore extends a level plateau on which the most of the Mormon city once stood. Now the business portion of the city is on the tableland lying east of the plateau, and along the base of this tableland is a good place for digging a canal, that would furnish water power to an unlimited extent. I doubt very much whether there is in the whole northwest a more inviting place for the investment of money for the purpose of building up a large manufacturing emporium than is to be found here. And, could some of the many millions of dollars now lying in our treasury-vaults and in bank-vaults, invested in interest-bearing bonds, which pay no taxes, and are absorbing the labor and industries of this country in interest and usury, only be released from their present confinement and be invested in this and similar improvements over our country, how much more properous we should become as a nation! There is no doubt the time will come when Nauvoo will be numbered amongst the largest manufacturing cities in this country.

But let me speak of Nauvoo as it was forty years ago, when it was the second city in Illinois in the number of its population, when it had between twenty-five and thirty thousand industrious inhabitants; over ten times its present population, and when it had one of the finest temples ever erected as a dwelling-place of the gods. I will giv you a short description of it which I copied from a very fine lithograph I saw hanging in a hotel in Montrose; underneath the picture of the temple was printed the following description: "This temple was built of light-gray limestone, it was 128 feet long by 88 feet broad and 60 feet high, with a tower 200 feet high. It had 30 heavy pilasters which cost $3,000 each. The whole cost of the temple was $1,000,000." (Had it been built by some of our thieving government contrators it would hav cost, doubtless, over ten millions.) "The baptismal fount, supported by 12 carved oxen, was in the basement story, and with the oxen was intended to be gilded. The corner-stone was laid April 6, 1841, and it was burnt November 10, 1848." On the front of the temple was this inscription cut in large raised letters: "The house of the Lord, built by the Church of Jesus Christ, of Latter Day Saints. Holiness to the Lord."

This is a piece of information that I picked up in the office of a hotel. It was new to me, and will doubtless be new to most of the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER. While in Nauvoo I was shown the spot where this magnificent structure once stood. It occupied a whole block on the highest point of the high ground I hav before mentioned, but not a vestige of it remains, unless a few fragments of broken stone lying scattered over the ground may be considered such, for even the foundation-stones hav been dug up and carried away for use in other buildings; and one of the finest business buildings in the present town, a three-story white stone building on the corner of the same block where the temple once stood, and where a store and post-office are now kept, was built entirely with stone taken from the temple, and I was told that a large portion of the other buildings of the city are partly built with stone taken from the temple. To what sacrilegious uses holy things are often put, and who that reads this article will attempt to say that this sacred edifice, of which I hav been writing, was not just as holy and just as sacred as any building ever erected for the worship of a god? This building was burnt down less than forty years ago, and now a stranger may be a week or a month in Nauvoo, and, unaided by information gleaned from others, he would not find a vestige of this once grand edifice. Then what an utter farce for people to go to the Holy Land, and come back and tell about the remarkable evidences they hav found of the truths of the Bible. But I am taking too much of your space and time. Please say to anyone desiring my help in getting together and organizing a League in any part of western Illinois, between here and St. Louis, or between the Illinois Central railroad and the Mississippi, or any one desiring to join the state Liberal League of Illinois, or in any other way assist me in the work I am doing for the cause in Illinois, to please write me. My post-office address is Bloomington, Ill. I am very anxious to organize as many new auxiliary Liberal Leagues as possible between now and the next National Liberal League Congress in St. Louis, which meets Sept. 29th and 30th, and Oct. 1st. Yours for universal mental liberty,

TOLEDO, OHIO, July 15, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: The clergy in speaking of Infidelity nearly always mean to convey the idea that an Infidel is a person of the world. Here is a great mistake made even very often by our own people. The world is merely skeptical, and a large majority of the population are not even this. The so-called people of the world believe in the Christian religion. Nearly all of our criminals are believers and were taught orthodoxy. The more intelligent begin investigation, and search after truth. First they become skeptical; that means they begin to doubt. However, one who doubts, or, so to speak, the skeptic, is not an Infidel. The skeptic is ready to take either side. The Infidel has a belief. He is no longer a skeptic. An Infidel does not believe in the orthodox doctrin, but he may believe in a god or in the immortality of the soul. An Infidel need not necessarily denounce the existence of a god. If he does, then he would be an Atheist. The true Infidel can tell you the reason of his belief in nature's philosophy; as also why he does not believe in the church. The true Infidel is a person educated in the sciences of life, and he is happy. He is therefore not to be classed with the people of the world. The Infidels are found among the best citizens of the country. Our cranks and croaks over the country are not Infidels. Ask them about nature, about their own organization, about philosophy, physical, moral, and mental culture, and you will find them as ignorant as a horse is of astronomy. To be honored with the appellation of an Infidel you must hav knowledge about the subjects I hav mentioned. Our gamblers and street loafers are many of them skeptical, but cannot be classed with the Infidels. Yours in truth, J. S.

A Field of Rue.

BY ALHAZA.

We passed one day through a field of rue
(Let us talk, my friend, of things that are true),
How bitter a sign of the coming of spring—
No daisy to wave, no linnet to sing!

Then why should we meet in that field of rue?
Dead buds for me, acorns for you.
You whispered words as harsh to me
As the deadly breath of the upas-tree.

I spoke of blossom and fragrant leaf;
Alas, for frowns and answers brief,
I hold your Christian thorns, and pray
That they may change to flowers in May!

But what to me are fields of rue
Or roses wet with morning dew?
I lonely weep where none can see,
For Highland Jamie is lost to me.

The Sabbatarian Cranks.

Come, men possessed of common sense,
Who fill the people's ranks,
Look out for those few meddling loons—
The Sabbatarian cranks;
If they hav business of their own,
Bid them to such attend,
And let you mind your own affairs;
All trouble then will end.

Do not these Sabbath hypocrits
On Sundays drink and eat?
Do they not take a carriage ride
And stop at some retreat?
Are not their servants forced to work—
Cooks, waiting-maids, and all?
Must they not hav their dinners hot
On Sundays at their call?

Poor men on Sundays must not shave,
Or buy and smoke cigars,
Or patronize a candy shop,
Through fear of prison bars;
The baker must not bring your bread,
Or milkman serve at doors,
Nor ice be brought to cool your throats,
So say these cranky bores.

One must not breathe the country air,
Or take a horse-car ride,
Nor on a steamboat dare to go,
By Sunday cranks he's spied;
On law and order they will talk
With great bombastic show,
And which they know but little 'bout,
To make so loud a blow.

Now is it not conspiracy
To bribe your fellow-man
To drink, get drunk, and break the law
Upon the catch-game plan?
Then bring him forth—a hired spy—
Before the court to swear,
That he went into a beer saloon
And bought a glass while there.

To prove the pudding they won't taste—
This clique of small poltroons—
Who are too cowardly themselvs
To go into saloons;
They'll bore our mayor to send police;
Rigged out as sneaks and spies,
To catch the man who dares to sell
Strange things that meet their eyes.

Now each man's house his castle is
Throughout fair Freedom's land,
Where all hav rights we should respect,
And firmly by them stand;
But these Sabbatarian cranks,
The world would like to rule,
And hav us do just as they say,
But we're not in that school.

H. W. Beecher on Progress of Thought.

From the North American Review.

It is supposed that the world is indebted to original thinkers, to trained investigators, to rigid experimenters, and that the common people are merely the recipients of the benefits which they did nothing to create. But this power of scholars or scientists to develop truth depends very largely upon the intelligence and sympathy of the common people. They giv force, extension, and enthusiasm to the results of learned labor. They are the nurses who care for the children of the brain. They giv sustenance to those who explore. They form an atmosphere, a public sentiment, around investigators. They give power and practical use to the dry products of the inquiring brain. The reaction of popular intelligence is, in many ways, as needful to science and learning as is the special training of scholars and scientists. Both are needful for the production of a cycle of knowledge. What is the voice of one man to the response of millions as an enforcement of truth? One man kindles the torch, but a million reflectors catch the light and diffuse it. The very twilight of the pulpit may become noonday among the pews.

It is in this way that the pulpit is changing its methods and material of sermons. No matter what becomes of decrees of election and of reprobation, an audience of fathers and mothers understand what fatherhood is. No ingenuity or eloquence can persuade them that a God who for ten thousand years has labored to produce an infinit population of damnable souls can with decency be called our father. The common sense, the humanity, the moral sense which hav grown out of the gospel are judging theology. Little by little the pulpit shrinks from medieval theology. Ministers first gloss it by new interpretations, then they prudently hold it in suspense, then doubt it, then cast it away.

Theology has mainly regarded the revelation in scriptural record as sole and exclusiv. It has looked with great suspicion upon reason, while employing its might to forge arguments against its plenary use. It has more than doubted nature—it has degraded it, and made it a byword. The school of the ascetic has corrupted men's minds and made discord between the Bible and nature. To lean to one's reason has been declared a sin and snare. What, then, shall we lean upon? If a man may not use his eyes, what may he see with? It is taught that man must take God's word implicitly, without controversy. But how shall he understand the word without the use of his reason? Is there no other word of God than the Bible? Hav the heavens ceased to declare the glory of God, and the earth to show his handiwork? Does God no longer speak through man's moral consciousness? Is man forbidden to use his own reason while commanded to believe the reasoning of the church? Did God sit down and write the Bible?

Our age is not in rebellion against clear, intellectual statements of religious truth, But there is a rebellion against the tyranny of medieval creeds. It is not extravagant to say that a revolution is at hand in regard to the whole philosophy of Christianity, and that this revolution is led on, not from restless impatience of restraint, nor by novelty, nor by a worldly spirit but by the deepest moral consciousness of men who love truth above all price.

The signs are in the air. Men no longer preach doctrins to which they swore in their ordination vows, or they giv to them new meanings at variance with historic fact. It is beginning to be permitted men to preach their own view of truth unclipped by creeds. Sagacious and cautious men are quietly sowing seed which they know will by and by destroy old notions. Other men testify to change by greater zeal in teaching the old symbols of doctrin. Every age has a race of men who elect themselvs to the care of other men's beliefs—who appoint themselvs Gods sheriffs to hunt and run down heretics. They are very busy. Men are ceasing to employ creeds as lines of separation between sect and sect, and are shaking hands in a higher fellowship over and across them. Creeds hav ceased to be employed as conservatories of piety. Orthodoxy confesses that truth can no longer be kept in church or seminary by creeds, but only by living faith.

Andover, next to Princeton the very Jerusalem of Jerusalems of orthodoxy, triply guarded by a creed made tight and strong beyond all breaking or picking, and to which the whole body of its professors were sworn to reswear every five years, has, alas! with some levity and merriment, shown to the world with what agility good men could fly over it, walk around it. They interpret the creed of fifty years ago, not by what its makers meant, but by what the professors think they ought to hav meant, and would hav meant if they had received a full Andover course!

The development of physical science constitutes the grand feature of the last half century. The doctrin of the Conservation of Forces, and the discovery of the method of creation, viz., Evolution, while revolutionizing physical science, will powerfully reform social and moral theories. At length the flood of ignorance has abated, and the dove of truth has solid ground on which to put its foot. The study of the human mind from the side of physics as well as metaphysics is productiv of changes of the most radical and important kind. Religion has much to hope, and the old theology much to fear from scientific disclosures.

It matters little that upon some points the great doctrin of evolution is yet in discussion. The debate is not about the reality of evolution, but of the influences which produce or direct it. That the stellar world was not created instantly, but gradually through uncountable ages; that this inorganic globe was the product of slowly unfolding changes; that the vegetable kingdom did not come into being at once, but by slow evolution from simple to complex; that the animal kingdom developed from original simple forms, and attained its present condition through ages of gradual unfolding from lower to higher; that the human race has been subject to the same great law and method of creation—may be said to be undisputed among scientific men, whether Christian or not Christian. This is not all. The presumption gains ground that the chain of succession is unbroken, and that, as civilized man unfolded from the barbaric and savage man, so the human race itself is developed from the animal kingdom.

At this point there is a halt It is perhaps the most revolutionary tenet ever advanced. It will be to theology what Newton's discoveries were to the old astronomy. The repugnance that men feel at descending along such a road, and with such an ancestry, would foam and subside in a short time. It is not the retrospect, but the prospect, which givs such almost universal hesitation to the mind and imagination of mere scientific moralists. Its admission would be fatal to the theory of a plenary and verbal inspiration of the Bible still held by some. The first two chapters of Genesis hav been a sword in the hands of theologs of old with which to fight the discoveries of modern astronomy. Next, they were sharpened against the advent of geology. In both conflicts the truth was victorious. Now, again, but upon a more tremendous issue, theology resists evolution. It is an honest resistance. To admit the truth of evolution is to yield up the reigning theology. It is to change the whole notion of man's origin, his nature, the problem of human life, the philosophy of morality, the theory of sin, the structure of moral government as taught in the dominant theologies of the Christian world; the fall of man in Adam, the doctrin of original sin, the nature of sin and the method of atoning for it. The decrees of God, as set forth in the Confession of Faith, and the machinery supposed to be set at work for man's redemption, the very nature and disposition of God—as taught in the falsely called Pauline, but really Augustinian theology, popularly known as Calvinistic—must giv way.

Before the science of mind had an existence, men treated the remote and inconceivable elements of the divine mind with perfect assurance. They knew God's thoughts and purposes as if in confidential relations with him. The debate respecting the persons of the Trinity made the air lurid for hundreds of years. Because the Bible called God king, the kingly government of ancient and of medieval days furnished the elements from which theology formed the theory of God's moral government. A few texts of scripture were enough, whether poetry, narrativ. or pictorial drama, to establish a doctrin. From the marvels of the childhood of the race, from the severity of the imperious Samuel, from the tender hymns of David, from the sublime rage of the prophets, from the dreams and visions of Ezekiel, from the clouds, the trumpets, the horsemen of the Apocalypse, its auroral heavens, its lurid dramas, its thunders and mysterious voices, the honest weavers of theology drew their threads and wove their theories, and stamped them with the Bible brand, and called men Infidels who should set their feeble reason against God's word! Thus it has come to pass that theology may find itself described, after its own manner, in the vision of Daniel—"This image's head was of fine gold, his breast and his arms of silver, his belly and his thighs of brass, his legs of iron, his feet part of iron and part of clay."

In modern hands great change has come over theology, as the result of increasing knowledge. There is a uniform tendency, away from the aristocratic and monarchic toward the democratic; an effusion of tenderness toward man, and especially a revulson from the old representations of eternal torment, so important in the convictions of energetic priests and flaming revivalists. There is still great confidence of theologians in theology. Innovation are resisted Men are cautioned not to lean to human reason, nor to set up their individual conscience against the ripe thought and moral sense of the church of ages.

When even change is feared, what vigorous fear must be felt when a revolution impends? But men do not yet consider how wide apart are religion and the theory of religion. Theology, like the crustacean shell, may at first protect religion, but if it may not be cast off, year by year, for a new one, it soon oppresses and even destroys.

The dread of Darwinian views is sincere; yet a secret fear prevails that they may be true. But hav men considered what a relief they will be from some of the most disgraceful tenets of theology? Are they content to guard and defend a terrific scheme which sullies the honor, the justice, and the love of God, against a movement that will cleanse the abomination and vindicate the ways of God to man? Even if the great truth of evolution led to unbelief, it could not be so bad as that impious and malignant representation of God and his government which underlies all medieval and most of modern theology. We shall quote from the Presbyterian Confession of Faith the account given by the church of the origin of man, and of his moral government, in the light of which the scientific account of the origin of man and the nature of sin is as health to sickness, as life to death. Instead of dreading the prevalence of the scientific doctrin, men should rush toward it with open arms and exultation, as a release from the hideous nightmare of ages.

In chapter iv, sec. 2, is the statement of man's creation:

"Our first parents, being seduced by the subtilty and temptation of Satan, sinned in eating the forbidden fruit. This, their sin, God was pleased, according to his will and holy counsel, to permit, having purposed to order it to his own glory. By this sin they fell from their original righteousness and communion with God, and so became dead in sin, and wholly defiled in all the faculties and parts of soul and body."

Next in chapter vi, secs. 1, 2, is the account of the origin of sin:

"They (Adam and Eve) being the root of mankind, the guilt of their sin was imputed and the same death in sin and corrupted nature conveyed to all their posterity, descending from them by ordinary generation. From this original corruption, whereby we are utterly indisposed, disabled, and made opposit to all good and wholly inclined to all evil, do proceed all actual transgressions"—(chap. vi, 3, 4).

Should a physician place a son of fifteen years in a plague hospital, expecting, nay, certain that he would incur the disease, and that he would propagate it to innumerable others, that he might show his skill in combating it, would not language fail in characterizing the deed? Or, if this illustration be deemed inapt by leaving out the power of choice, substitute the case of a father who should place his daughter of seventeen years in a court where he knew that she would be surrounded by the most cunning courtiers, expert in seductiv flatteries, who should beguile, bewilder, and seduce the innocence of the child who had no experience of danger, or example, or friend, and who should fall, become the mother of immodest children in endless succession; would such a cruel experiment be creditable or excusable because he meant to set up afterward remedial influence?

But the most astounding part of this account of creation is that God, when he had created innocence and inexperience, permitted it to be debauched, and went on to transmit to the whole human race, through all time, the degradation, sin, and suffering of these divinely destroyed experimentalists of Eden.

It appears, then, that the earth was a vast machine for the manufacturing of corruption; that God himself planned that corruption; that instead of stanching the evil at its outbreak he devoted the earth to the production of corruption. It appears, also, that the sin which they did not commit was imputed to all the myriads of human beings born ages after the sin was committed, and that the penalty upon Adam's sin was the total derangement of every human faculty; so that men could not be obedient, but, as a part of the divine will and arrangement, were created not only unable to do good, but by the whole force of God's decree made opposit to all good and wholly inclined to all evil. This we are taught has been the business of God for ten thousand years—to produce infinit sin and suffering.

Even this is but the beginning of that theory of creation and God's design in it, which theologians dread to hav swept away by the revelations of science. It appears that before a step was taken in this mighty tragedy there was a distinct purpose in God that this world should produce innumerable wretched souls, whose sin resulted from the conditions of their creation, for whom no remedy was attempted, who were made with the distinct and avowed purpose of furnishing material for another and after world, designed and built for the purpose of torment endless, increasing forever!

"By the decree of God, for the manifestation of his glory, some men and angels are predestinated unto everlasting life, and others foreordained to everlasting death. These angels and men, thus predestinated and foreordained, are particularly and unchangeably designed, and their number is so certain and definit that it cannot be either increased or diminished. Those of mankind that are predestined unto life, God, before the foundation of the world was laid, according to his eternal and immutable purpose, and the secret counsel and good pleasure of his will, hath chosen in Christ unto everlasting glory, out of his mere free grace and love, without any foresight of faith, or good works, or perseverence in either of them, or any other thing in the creation, or conditions, or causes moving him thereto, and all to the praise of his glory. . . . The rest of mankind God was pleased, according to the unsearchable counsel of his own will, whereby he extendeth or withholdeth mercy as he pleaseth, for the glory of his sovereign power over his creatures to pass by, and to ordain them to dishonor and wrath, for their sin, to the praise of his glorious justice" (chap. iii, sec. 3, 4, 5, 7).

To one who employs a moral sense, this extraordinary representation of the divine nature, and of the plan of creation, seems like an unreal dream. Yet it represents the work of good men, of heroic men, in an obscure age, when absolute monarchy furnished the ideal of God, and when the citizen had no rights which the king was bound to respect. From such a medieval horror all Christian men should fly toward the rising revelation in science, of God's true work in creation, with thanksgiving and gladness.

This doctrin of the fall of man in Adam is not, as may be imagined, an extreme and antiquated notion. It is fundamental to the whole orthodox theology of the world. The system could not stand a moment if it be exploded. It may be summarily said to be the working theory of the Christian theology, as much today as it was five hundred years ago. Every man entering the ministry of the Presbyterian church is obliged to swear to hold and teach it. There is no difference in that respect between the Catholic and the Protestant creeds.

Within the memory of this generation these hideous doctrins were preached widely and vigorously. The outburst of indignation with which they were received was regarded as proof that man's unregenerate heart was at enmity with God. They may still be preached, but no longer with commanding sovereignty, but apologetically. They defend rather than assert themselvs. But in the main this view lies silent in the pulpit like a corpse in a sepulcher. Here and there a good deacon remembers when such sound doctrin was set triumphantly forth, to the confusion of heretics and Infidels, and longs to hear again the refreshing sound. But the new generation, whether of clergy or laity, will not worship it. Yet it is to-day the only exposition, clear and thorough, of what the church has to say as to the origin of man and the method of creation.

Not only is the method of creation thus disfigured, but over against it has been erected a scheme of reparation and redemption, if not so shocking, yet equally fictitious and delusiv, and destined to giv place to a nobler view of divine nature and of providence, and of the divine thought of the redemption and elevation of mankind.

When the creeds of the past era hav passed away we shall enter upon the creeds of a new era. These will differ not alone in their contents from former doctrinal standards, but they will differ in the very genius and method of construction. Our reigning creeds begin with God, with moral government, with the scheme of the universe, with the great invisible realm beyond. These are the weakest places in a creed, because the matters they contain are least within the reach of human reason, and because the alleged revelations from God upon them are the most scanty and uncertain. The creeds of the future will begin where the old ones ended—upon the nature of man, his condition on earth, his social duties and civil obligations, the development of his reason, his spiritual nature, its range, possibilities, education—the doctrin of the human reason, of the emotions, of the will—man as an individual, man social and collectiv; and from a sound knowledge of the nature of mind, developed within the scope of our experience and observation, we shall deduce conceptions of the great mind—the God idealized from our best ascertainments—in the sphere within which our faculties were created to act with certainty of knowledge. Our creeds will ascend from the known to the unknown, which is the true law and method of acquiring knowledge. Hitherto they hav expended their chief force upon that which is but dimly known.

A TRUTH SEEKER

Around the World.

Illustrated with fifty cuts, and with a steel plate engraving of the author in Vol. I.

BY D. M. BENNETT,

Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, author of "A Truth Seeker in Europe," "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," "Champions of the Church," etc., etc.

FOUR VOLUMES FOR $6.50.

The Most Instruction for the Least Money of any Book of Travels yet Written.

In 1880 the Freethinkers of the world held an International Congress at Brussels, to which Mr. Bennett was sent as a delegate. He took the occasion to make the tour of Europe, and his observations were embodied in "A Truth Seeker in Europe" (price, $1.50). The letters were also published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and the readers were so well pleased with them that the proposition was made that he make the journey around the world, and giv the world the benefit of a Freethinker's observations. The proposition was accepted if the ones desiring such a work would advance five dollars each, the volumes to be dedicated to them. On July 30, 1881, Mr. Bennett began the journey, sending letters back to be published. The work will make

FOUR VOLUMES OF NEARLY 900 PAGES EACH.

The first volume describes Scotland, Ireland, England, including also an account of the Freethinkers' International Congress at London, in 1881, Holland, the Netherlands, Germany, Austria, Greece, Turkey. Smyrna, Ephesus, Rhodes, Cyprus, Beyront, Baalbec to Damascus.

Volume II. embraces visits to Damascus, the Sea of Galilee, Bethsaida, Nazareth, the Dead Sea, the Jordan, Jerusalem, and other places of interest in Palestine; Egypt and Egyptian history, and Egyptian towns, manners, and customs the pyramids, etc., to Bombay, India.

Volume III. describes India, Ceylon. Penang, Singapore, Java, an China.

Volume IV. Japan, the passage across the Pacific, and the tour over the American Continent.

There hav been many books of travel printed but none like this. IT IS THE ONLY ONE OF ITS KIND.

Mr. Bennett has a shrewd habit of seeing everything going on, and in his book he has faithfully chronicled the habits and customs of the different people of the many places he visited. The every-day life of all nations is laid before the reader by one who has visited them and beheld them with his own eyes. We feel sure this work is greatly superior to any account of a journey around the world we now hav.

ALL THE VOLUMES WILL BE ILLUSTRATED

Which adds greatly to the interest of the work, and with the close description will present Old-World places in a very familiar light.

The volumes separately will be $2. Those sending $6.50 now will get Vols. I. and II. by return mail and the others as soon as issued, which will be in a few months, or just as soon as they can be got ready.

Vol. I. or II. mailed on receipt of $2.

DEITY ANALYZED

AND

THE DEVIL'S DEFENSE

By Col. John R. Kelso, A.M.

Not since Hudibras has there been such damaging blows given to these old myths and fables. The colonel has made the sacredness of the scriptures appear as absurd as Cervantes made that of the knights of the age of chivalry. The singular audacity with which he attack. the foundations of Christianity shows the earnestness of his own convictions in regard to its fabulous origin.—L Hutchison.

A NEW BOOK BY ROBERT G. INGERSOLL,

ENTITLED

INGERSOLL ON TALMAGE,

BEING

Six Interviews with the Famous Orator on Six Sermons by the Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, of Brooklyn, to which is added

A TALMAGIAN CATECHISM.

Stenographically reported by I. NEWTON BAKER.

Printed in bold, clear type, on heavy, tinted paper, and handsomely bound in muslin, with heavy boards, beveled edges, gilt top, Octavo, 443 pages.

Price, $2.00. Paper Edition from same plates, $1.00.

Those who wish to hav Col. Ingersoll's latest lectures on 'Talmagian Theology," will find them here, in full, together with many other points necessarily excluded by the limits of a lecture. "The Talmagian Catechism" puts n the form of direct question, the plainest and profoundest inquiries of modern doubt, and answers them according to Talmage and orthodox Christianity. As a piece of satire, with earnest purpose, this production stands alone, and in the literature of Freethought has not its equal.

SYPHILIS positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system; GONORRHŒA, GLEET, Stricture, Orchitis, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

Middle-Aged and Old Men.

There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuation of the bladder, often accompanied by a slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen, will appear, or the color will be of a thin or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and torpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the organs. ☞ Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable and correspondence strictly confidential.

PRIVATE COUNSELOR.

Gems of Thought.

ALL hail, ye tender feelings dear!
The smile of love, the friendly tear,
The sympathetic glow!

Long since, this world's thorny ways
Had numbered out my weary days,
Had it not been for you!

Fate still has blest me with a friend
In every care and ill:
And oft a more endearing band,
A tie more tender still —Burns.

IN the minds of almost all religious persons, even in the most tolerant countries, the duty of toleration is admitted with tacit reserves. One person will bear with dissent in matters of church government, but not of dogma; another can tolerate everybody—short of a Papist or a Unitarian; another, every one who believes in revealed religion; a few extend their charity a little farther, but stop at the belief in a god or in a future state.—Mill's Liberty.

THE right of private judgment, in matters of faith and worship, is now more generally recognized in practice than it used to be, though such is human pride that even yet many resent the exercise, by their neighbors who differ from them, of the freedom which they claim for themselvs. They seem to forget the maxim that we should do to others as we would hav others do to us—a principle admirably applied by St. Paul to the case of religious differences (Romans, chap. xiv), and which, indeed, is the only one that has been found to work well in all circumstances for every sect; it condemns not only political disabilities and restraints unwarranted by the exigencies of the state, but, still more, that uncharitable treatment through which, almost exclusivly, the spirit of intolerance can now find vent in free Protestant countries.—Chambers' Encyclopedia.

CONSIDER now, if they asked us, will you giv up your Indian Empire, or your Shakspere, your English; never hav had any Indian Empire, or never had any Shakspere? Really it was a grave question. Official persons would answer doubtless in official language; but we, for our part, too, should not we be forced to answer? Indian Empire or no Indian Empire, we cannot do without Shakspere! Indian Empire will go, at any rate, some day: but this Shakspere does not go, he lasts forever with us; we cannot giv up our Shakspere!—Carlyle's Hero-worship.

IN our halls is hung
Armory of the invincible knights of old;
We must be free or die, who speak the tongue
That Shakspere spake: the faith and morals hold
That Milton held. In everything we are sprung
From earth's first blood, hav bibles manifold.
—Wordsworth.

WHEN the great Kepler had at length dicovered the harmonious laws that regulate the motions of the heavenly bodies, he exclaimed, "Whether my discoveries will be read by posterity or by my contemporaries is a matter that concerns them more than me. I may well be contented to wait one century for a reader when God himself, during so many thousand years, has waited for an observer like myself."—Colton's Lacon.

WE wish to break with nothing that is worthy of admiration in the past. We can see and appreciate how much of the good and noble there was and is in Christianity. But we cannot see that one iota of this was or is due to the supernatural element in it. That men hav been inspired and sustained in virtue and self-sacrifice by love of the man Jesus is not only apriori probable, but historically true. But what nobler art ever had its source in the devotion of the Trinity, in the existence of the devil, or the story of the exodus? Where is the perfume from the Dead Sea flowers of theology? What sustenance is there from its fruit? We find none. On the contrary, we know not a good cause which is not hindered by it. It only ceases to be mischievous by becoming ridiculous. While the people perish for lack of knowledge, theologians are busy wrangling over vestments and candles, negus and genuflexions. The supposition that this is the religion that is to regenerate human life is an insult to common sense.—D. in National Reformer, Aug. 28, 1881.

THERE is the greatest difference between presuming an opinion to be true, because, with every opportunity for contesting it, it has not been refuted, and assuming its truth for the pursose of not permitting its reputation. Complete liberty of contradicting and disproving our opinion is the very condition which justifies us in assuming its truth for purposes of action; and on no other terms can a being with human faculties hav any rational assurance of being right.—Mill's Liberty.

MIGHTY fleets and armies, harbors and arsenals, vast cities, high-domed, many-engined—they are precious, great; but what do they become? Agamemnon, the many Agamemnons, Pericleses, and their Greece; all is gone now to some ruined fragments, dumb, mournful wrecks and blocks; but the Books of Greece! These, Greece, to every thinker still very literally livs; can be called up again into life. No magic "Runa" is stranger than a book. All that mankind has done, thought, gained, or been: it is lying as in magic preservation in the pages of books. They are the chosen possession of man.—Carlyle.

THERE is nothing that we are such spendthrifts of as of health. We spare everything sooner than that, though whatever we sacrifice to it is worth nothing without it.—Locke.

TAKE away from Genesis the belief that Moses was the author, on which only the strange belief that it is the word of God has stood, and there remains nothing of Genesis but an anonymous book of stories, fables, and traditionary or invented absurdities, or of down-right lies The story of Eve and the serpent, and of Noah and his ark, drops to a level with the Arabian tales, without the merit of being entertaining; and the account of men living to eight and nine hundred years becomes as fabulous as the immortality of the saints of mythology. —Paine's Age of Reason.

"WHAT'S that you're playing?" said a New Haven man to his daughter, who was pounding at the piano keyboard with more noise than skill. "It is Wagnerian, pa; that is the music of the future." "Oh, it is, is it? Let it be a long time in the future before I hear any more of it. Play me 'Comin' Through the Rye.'" "Oh, pa, ain't you horrid; always thinking about something to drink!" Honors are easy in that family.—New Haven Register.

AN Austin lady, who is very anxious to acquire the prevailing art of painting placques, brought some of her drawings to a cynical artist for examination "Ought I put a coat of varnish on the plate before I transfer this drawing to it?" "No, miss," responded the artist, looking at the badly-drawn picture, "you ought to put the varnish on afterward. It would make the plate look better." When the lady shut the door it made such a noise people thought it was burglars blowing open a safe.

AN irresistible pun: When Fogg went to look for rooms in the apartment house he was shown about the premises by as handsome a piece of calico—young, bright, and rosy—as ever gladdened the eye of a bachelor. "What do you think you should prefer, sir?" she asked. Fogg said he couldn't help it if he was to die for it, and he replied, in his most killing manner, "Sweet sixteen." "From what she said," added Fogg, "I somehow got the impression that 'sweet sixteen' was already engaged."

SHE was a stylish young lady, about eigh'een years old, and, to accommodate a friend, she took the baby out for an airing. She was wheeling it up and down the walk, when an oldish man, very deaf, came along, and inquired for a certain person supposed to liv on that street. She nearly yelled her head off trying to answer him, and he looked around, caught sight of the baby, and said: "Nice child, that. I suppose you feel proud of him?"

"It isn't mine," she yelled at him.

"Boy, eh? Well, he looks just like you."

"It isn't mine," she yelled again. But he nodded his head and continued:

"Twins, eh? Where's the other one?"

She started off with the cab; but he followed and asked:

"Did it die of colic?"

Despairing of making him understand by word of mouth, she pointed to the baby, at herself, and then shook her head.

"Yes—yes; I see—t'other twin in the house. Their father is fond of them, of course?"

She turned the cab and hurried the other way, but he followed and asked:

"Do they kick around much nights?"

"I tell you 'taint mine," she shouted, looking very red in the face.

"I think you're wrong there," he answered. "Children brought up on the bottle are apt to pine and die."

She started on a run for the gate, but before she had opened it he came up and asked:

"Hav to spank 'em once in a while, I suppose?"

She made him about twenty gestures in half a minute, and he helped the cab through the gate and said:

"Our children were all twins, and I'll send my wife down to giv you some advice. You see——."

But she picked up a flowerpot and flung it at him. He jumped back, and as she entered the house he called out:

"Hope insanity won't break out on the twins!"

ON the day of Guiteau's execution Michael Geary was standing behind his bar. There entered from the Cedar street side, breathless, and seemingly excited, a man in seedy black. He advanced to the counter and dealt it a blow that made it tremble.

"So they've hanged Charley Guiteau?" he exclaimed. "It was a shame (giv me a little whisky). If I had been back in time to defend him (sugar, please) they never should hav perpetrated that outrage," and he drained his glass and set it down so hard as to send its fragments flying over Michael. Geary's brow began to blacken, and his voice sounded ominous as he remarked inquiringly, "No?"

"No, sir; if that chucklehead Charley Reed had read his Blackstone and Chitty, or even his Peterbaugh, he never (some more whisky, please)—I say he would never—(I'd like some more whisky, if you please)—would never hav permitted that case to even go to the jury. Ain't you going to set out that whisky?"

Michael had quietly come out from behind the counter and confronted the lawyer. He touched him on the shoulder and remarked slowly and impressivly: "My friend, you owe me fifteen cents for whisky and twenty-five cents for the glass. I would like forty cents, if you please."

The man of genius made a weak and abortiv search through his vest pockets, and said, "Yes, yes, that'll be all right; just get behind your counter, please, and set me out some more whisky, and I will discharge the whole obligation at once."

Said Michael in deepest tones, "Are you a lawyer?"

The fellow said he was.

"Hav you read Blackstone and Chitty, likewise Peterbaugh, of whom you spoke but now?"

"The lawyer said, oh, yes, he knew 'em by heart.

"There is one law work with which you are not conversant," said Michael, solemnly, as his fingers began to twitch.

"What is that?" asked the lawyer.

"Geary on Ejectments," thundered Michael, and did the bounce act with a vim that landed him into the middle of the street.

PRICE, $3.00 per annum; single copies, seven cents. Specimen copies sent on receipt of a two-cent stamp to pay postage.

The Investigator is devoted to the Liberal cause in religion; or in other words, to universal mental liberty. Independent in all its discussions, discarding superstitious theories of what never can be known, it devotes its columns to things of this world alone, and leaves the next, if there be one, to those who hav entered its unknown shores. Believing that it is the duty of mortals to work for the interests of this world, it confines itself to the things of this life entirely. It has arrived at the age of fifty-one years, and asks for a support from those who are fond of sound reasoning, good reading, reliable news, anecdotes, science, art, and a useful family journal. THE

BIBLE—WHENCE AND WHAT?

BY

Richard B. Westbrook, D.D., LL.B.,

A theologian of high degree, and a counsellor learned in the law, on the origin and character of the Bible.

The author, though possessing all the prerogativs of a clergyman, repudiates the title "Rev." as a relic of Brahmanical caste and Roman sacerdotalism. He is entirely independent of ecclesiastical supervision and censure.

The questions, Where did the books of the Bible come from? What is their authority? and, What is the real source of dogmatic theology? are treated fearlessly in the light of history, philosophy, and comparativ religions. It is impossible to giv even a condensed statement of what is itself a marvelous condensation.

WHOLE LIBRARIES ARE HERE CONCENTRATED INTO ONE LITTLE BOOK.

The author's conclusions are, of course, against the supernatural origin and infallibility of the Bible, while the dogmas of the dominant theology are shown to be priestly perversions of the ancient mythologies.

The principles of natural religion are ably stated, and the claims of true morality are warmly adgocated.

The strong commendations of the secular press show that is just the book for these times of agitation and "revision."

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Entered at the Post-Office at New York, N. Y., as Second-class Matter.

Vol. 9. No. 33. { PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY D. M. BENNETT. } New York, Saturday August 19, 1882. { SCIENCE HALL, 141 8th St., NEAR BROADWAY. } $3 per year.

Notes and Clippings.

A STONE weighing eighty-five pounds recently fell at Salina, Kan., and another, cigar shaped, four inches in diameter and over twelve inches long.

A PRETTY girl of 18, neat in dress and polite in manner, is a bootblack in Galveston. She has a chair on a street corner, and makes $3 to $6 a day.

MR. BRADLAUGH has received a practically unanimous vote of confidence from his constituents of Northampton. They seem disposed not to desert him though the Christian bigots continue to persecute him.

THE statue erected by the people of Boulonge to Mariette-Bey, the distinguished French Egyptologist, is on the Esplanade. It is a pyramid, on the sides of which are inscribed the names of his principal discoveries.

LET all friends remember the Watkins meeting from the 23d to the 28th inclusiv, and be there as much of the time as possible. There will undoubtedly be more good speaking during the meeting than ever at one meeting before.

THE Rev. Joseph Bartlett, a retired Congregationalist minister, or Gorham, committed suicide by drowning in the Little River, Maine. He was seventy years of age. May the hope not be indulged in that he is now with Jesus?

IT is estimated that in Delaware, Maryland, and a part of Virginia, there are 6,000,000 peach trees; several growers have each 100,000 trees in bearing, and that this year's crop will aggregate some 6,000,000 baskets of the fruit. Everybody should eat and can all they are able.

SINCE the London Freethinker has been prosecuted for blasphemy, a part of which consisted in printing comic pictures of the Bible, it has taken to reproducing quaint old pictures from Dutch Bibles. Serious Bible Sketches, No. 1, for the 6th inst., represents Yahweh showing his back parts to Moses as per Exodus xxx, 21-23.

MR. D. M. BENNETT arrived home safe and sound last week from his trip around the world, and thus again hav Christian prayers been thwarted, as in the death of Garfield, whose life they prayed for, and the life of Bennett, whose death was invoked. Very discouraging this must be to Christians; very.—Kansas Blade.

PROF. SEELEY is the author of a somewhat anti-theological book entitled "Natural Religion," in which he attempts to sail very close to the wind by sustaining Christianity on general principles, but throwing aside supernaturalism in toto. His task is a most difficult one; if supernaturalism is discarded Christianity has not a leg to stand upon. If supernaturalism is untenable—as it really is—Christianity is one of the most dishonest frauds in existence.

BISHOP IRELAND, in his address before the National Roman Catholic Total Abstinence Union, at St. Paul, said things which hav stirred up the feelings of Irishmen considerably. The following sentence especially meets with disapprobation: "The woes of the people of Ireland are mostly brought about by intemperance, and if they could be made temperate and kept so for about fifteen years they could buy the entire island with the money they would otherwise spend for strong drink."

THE devil for once has been too much for the evangelist Barnes, who, having succeeded in making a Christian horse-racer of Buford and an honest Christian politician of Gov. Blackburn, both of Kentucky, now confesses to having found his match in Dayton, O., where he has been wrestling with the evil one for a month without making a single conversion. But the great converter is not discouraged; he is under contract to put in a part of the autumn in Chicago, with the winter in this ungodly city of New York. It is to be feared, however, if he cannot make headway against the devil in Dayton, he will stand a very poor chance in Chicago and New York.

"HOME Again" are the first words written by D. M. Bennett as he enters his sanctum and resumes the editorial chair of THE TRUTH SEEKER after his journey around the world. We regretted his departure, believing there was never a time in the history of the great conflict in which we are engaged when his presence on the immediate field of battle was as much needed as now. Perhaps we are wrong in the idea that his going was a mistake; be that as it may, we hail his return with joy, and very much regret that we could not somewhere in his journey across the continent hav met and extended the hand of welcome—welcome back to the land we know he loves so well, notwithstanding its past unjust and inhuman treatment of him. Realizing the dangers by land and sea of such a journey, we hav watched its progress with anxiety for his safety, knowing of no man whose loss to the Liberal cause would be more severely felt than would D. M. Bennett's. We cannot do better than giv several paragraphs from his salutatory words to the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER in its first issue after his return. —Spiritual Offering.

D. M. BENNETT, of THE TRUTH SEEKER, having arrived in New York in health and safety from his long journey around the world, was last Thursday evening given a reception by his friends in that city. Mr. Mendum and ourself, who went on to assist in the exercises, were kindly met at the New York depot by Mr. Geo. Macdonald, who escorted us to the banquet room, where we found quite a gathering, and we, too, had a fine reception. After a superb supper, which gave us "material aid and comfort," for we had taken a long ride and were tired and hungry, Mr. Wakeman began the speaking. He was an excellent chairman, and his happy faculty of introducing the different speakers inspired them all to make good speeches. The whole affair, which was very well managed and prolonged until a late hour, was unusually interesting throughout and gave the highest satisfaction. We enjoyed our visit very much, and were greatly pleased with the the fraternal feeling exhibited toward us by our New York associates in the Liberal movement. Our friend and correspondent, S. P. Putnam, who was one of the party and largely helped to make it successful, kindly sends us a two-column sketch of it.—Boston Investigator.

D. M. BENNETT, having made the tour of Europe, Palestine, Egypt, India, China, and Japan, landed in San Francisco more than a month ago. The Liberals of California gave him a very cordial and very handsome public reception. After visiting many of the places of note on the Pacific coast he has been slowly making his way eastward, stopping and lecturing at Salt Lake City, Ogden, Denver, Omaha, and at other points. On the evening of the 16th he his expected at Hershey Hall, Chicago. The Liberals of that place hav arranged for a hearty reception of the world-round traveler. It is proposed to tender him a dinner and public reception at the Freethinkers' Convention to commence at Watkins Glen, N. Y., August 23d. As this is the place where Mr. Bennett was first arrested, and where the infamous prosecution against him by Comstock and his clan commenced about four years ago, it would seem that there would be an eminent fitness in thus humoring the veteran champion of human rights, after his long pilgrimage. The writer of this is no hero-worshiper. No man that ever lived has been good enough to deserve an apotheosis, whether before death or afterward. Mr. Bennett, like other men, has his faults—none of his friends and admirers claim perfection for him. But whatever may be his faults no one can charge him with the sin of hypocrisy or of avarice—the two great damning sins of the times. Like the great Horace Greeley he approaches the simplicity of childhood in his devotion to candor, truthfulness, and unselfishness. And although making no claims to saintship it is probable that very few men of this or any other age can show a cleaner, purer record than Mr. Bennett can show. The crime charged againt him and for which he was imprisoned was no crime at all—so stated and so acknowledged by the attorney-general and by President Hayes himself. Mr. Bennett became involved in the trouble not because he expected any emolument from the sale of the condemned book—not because he indorsed, even, the sentiments contained therein, but simply from a manly chivalrous desire that every honest man should possess and enjoy the same right that any other man has or ought to possess—the right to publish and defend his honest convictions through the medium of the public press and the public mail.—Kansas Liberal.

THE Sunday morning Bazoo (Mo.) has a long and painful account of the way in which the Rev. T. J. Shepherd, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, attempted to deeply wrong the Rev. M. F. Wells, of the same church, by seducing his wife. Wells had been preaching at Mount Olivet, Benton county, Mo., but had been removed to Deerfield, when he was succeeded at Mount Olivet by the Rev. Shepherd Their families had not moved, and as each had half-fare tickets on the railroads they occasionally went home to see their wives. Mrs. Wells is the mother of five children, but the Rev. Shepherd evinced a fondness for calling upon Mrs. Wells and talking religion with her. He became so earnest in this religious conversation that to giv emphasis to his words he placed his hand upon Mrs. Wells's knee and held it there for some minutes. When Mr. Wells returned home his honest, simple-hearted wife narrated to her husband how earnestly the Rev. Shepherd conversed with her, and asked what she should do when the Rev. Shepherd placed his hands thus upon her lower limbs. The Rev. Wells, learning that the conversation was upon religious subjects, told his wife that the Rev. Shepherd was "a man of a pure heart and clean hands," and probably had the purest motivs. Shepherd, however, continued to visit Mrs. Wells oftener; he visited her at night, he tarried long, and his religious conversation became so earnest that he kept one or both hands upon Mrs. Wells nearly all the time. His late visits at length attracted attention in the neighborhood, and created much scandal. Jacob Smith, who boarded where the Rev. Shepherd did, concluded to play the spy and watch the holy man. Sad to state, after the religious conversation had been continued till a late hour one night, Jacob saw the Rev. Shepherd take hold of Mrs. Wells' hand and inquire "Do you enjoy connection?" The simple-minded woman thinking he was alluding to her relativs, innocently answered "Yes." He then talked more religion, interspersed with passes over her face and mouth, which nearly put her to sleep, so that she became powerless to resist him; when the lecherous clergyman threw his arms around her and drew her close to him, followed by the most disgusting conduct unfit to narrate. Mrs. Wells recovered herself somewhat and she pushed the clergyman away, saying "This thing has gone far enough," but he expressed the opinion that there was no danger. She forcibly replied, "You should not get me into anything that will send my soul to torment." He again assured her there was "no danger, the best of Christians do worse than this every day." Mrs. Wells at once left the room and entered where her five babes were sleeping, and in this way the clerical sinner was foiled. The result is the scandal is widely spread. Wells has entered a complaint against Bro. Shepherd, and has retired unhappy and disgusted from the pulpit. What makes the matter still worse is the fact that Wells is a blind man and poor; while Shepherd is well off, owning a good farm. Wells feels too much disgraced to preach longer, and Shepherd will be permanently relieved from any more breaking the bread of life. It is a very sad thing that men of God will act in this way.

A MAN who has for years been a writer on the New York Sun was arrested and clubbed severely one evening last week for sitting on his own doorstep when the guardian of the peace conceived that he ought to be in bed. The act is causing considerable indignation among liberty-loving citizens.

ARABI PASHA has been declared a rebel by the sultan of Turkey; but the Mussulman jurists, whom the sultan frequently consults, explain that, in so far as he has disobeyed the caliph, he is a rebel, and may be unceremoniously treated as such; but, in so far as he has been a defender of a Mohammedan country against the aggressiv designs of Christians, he has merely fulfilled the duties of a good Mussulman, and consequently the caliph cannot make common cause with England. The sultan may punish Arabi if some act of rebellion can be proved against him; but he must not associate himself with those who wish to crush Arabi as a defender of Islam. It is thought that this decision will seriously influence the action of Turkish military. So it seems that with religion left out the aspect of the war would be greatly simplified. More troops from England hav arrived in Egypt.

PLACE FOR CREMATION.

In the rear of the temple is a Chinese garden (what is left of the garden, which once occupied the entire grounds), and here I saw many curious plants, particularly the slow-growing and small-leafed slimber-tree, trained and trimmed so as to represent numerous objects, such as bridges, ships, pagodas, temples, dragons, serpents, dogs, fishes, men, and women, much the same as those I saw in the Chinese garden near Singapore. To the animals and men artificial eyes are supplied. The effect is curious.

In the rear part, and in one corner of the grounds, is a furnace for cremating the priests and monks when they finish their earthly labors, as is the practice everywhere with Buddhistic priests. The building in which the burning is done is a small brick structure, about six feet square inside, and about the same in hight, with a roof somewhat in the shape of a dome, with plentiful openings for smoke and vapor to escape. In the earthen floor is a trench or depression a foot in width and nearly that in depth. The dead priest is taken into this place sitting in a sedan-chair, and the wood used for fuel is placed under and over him. His brothers, the priests and monks, arrange themselves before the door of the pyre and spend five minutes in chanting a prayer for the repose of the departed soul, when one of the number takes a torch and lights the pile. When the flames are well spread over the fuel another prayer is chanted, when it is supposed that the soul of the dead priest is placed at rest. Sandal-wood is used for fuel, or pieces of it are occasionally thrown on the fire while the burning takes place. When the ashes have become cold they are carefully gathered up, placed in a cinerary urn, which is deposited in a small building for the purpose, where it remains till the third month of the year, the time when the Chinese gather around the tombs of the dead to worship their ancestors, when the contents of the urns are put into a red bag and deposited in the finely-built stone mausoleum, or ossuary, also standing in the garden. There are two or three ossuaries in the grounds, one being full, or rather the ashes of five thousand and forty-eight priests and monks having been deposited in it, which is the full number permitted to be so deposited in one ossuary, and it is securely sealed, where the ashes of these once living men will undoubtedly remain quiet for a long time to come.

On the west side of the grounds is the Sai-Kwai-Tong, or Hall of Death, where the sick, aged, and infirm priests and monks are taken to die when that event seems about to take place. On one side of the court, attached to it, are a row of small, dingy cells, and in these the priests and friars draw their last breath—here to them the scenes of life close. This hall is said to be placed on the west side of the grounds to shorten to that extent the distance which the liberated soul will have to travel to reach the Western Paradise, which is the place where good Buddhists are supposed to go. The body of a dead priest or monk is attired in the suit of his order, and twelve hours after his death is conveyed in a sedan-chair to a fane, in which is an altar, and on this altar the dead priest is placed, occupying the meditative position in which Buddha is represented—sitting with crossed legs, the soles of the feet turned up, and the hands placed in the attitude of prayer. Here the companions of the dead man gather and offer a prayer to him. Then the corpse is conveyed, as described, to the place of burning, and in going there a paved passway is used, walled up on each side and covered over, and which is never used on any other occasion, the door at each extremity being kept locked. It may well be called "the path of death."

OTHER TEMPLES AND GODS.

The temple of Cho-Shing is near the temple of Five Hundred Genii. This is one of the patron saints of medicine, and here is a large porcelain vase containing holy water, for sale to the sick. It is not claimed that if they drink of that water they will live forever, but it is believed that it possesses power to heal many diseases. In the second hall are sixty gods, who preside over the sixty years of the Chinese cycle.

The temple of Chang-Ti, one of the great gods of the Chinese, is on Great New street, and is one of the richest and most gaudy in the city.

The Emperor's Temple should be mentioned, in which state worship is held by all the mandarins gathering there on the Chinese New Year, and when the emperor's marriage is celebrated.

Kwong-Hau temple is one of the oldest Buddhist temples in the city, having been founded in 250. There are two small granite pagodas in the court. In the second story is an image of Buddha sleeping.

Kun-Yum temple, founded in 1403, is high up, and is approached by a long flight of granite steps. In front is a stone elephant. In the chief pavilion is a gilt image of the god Kun-Yum sitting on a lotus-flower. Many votaries resort to this temple, and state worship is performed here.

There are more than a hundred other temples and monasteries in Canton which might be described, but I did not visit them; besides, I am tired of temples, and doubt not you are. From what I have said I think you can easily see the superstitious bent of the Chinese mind. The gods and ceremonies of all the other temples can readily be imagined. I will therefore leave the temples and enumerate some of the other places I visited.

EXAMINATION HALL

Is a noted place, where the scholars of the two provinces, of which Canton is the capital, are examined for the degree of bachelor of arts, this being the second degree of learning in China. Examinations for the first or highest degree—master of arts—are made in Pekin. Examination Hall and the buildings and courts connected with it occupy a space measuring 1,380 feet by 650 feet. The inclosure is divided into two sections, that for the officials and that for the candidates. On each side of the grand avenue leading from the entrance are apartments or cells for the students, numbering eleven hundred and sixty. These are five and a half feet long, and three feet eight inches wide, with ledges in the brick walls for boards for a seat, and a table on which to write. The sheds in which these cells are located are over two hundred and fifty feet in length, and are no farther apart than to admit of ingress and egress. The examinations take place once in three years. The examiner is the literary chancelor, assisted by the prefects and learned men of a lower grade.

The preliminary course of study for those who wish to pass examination here is very rigid. Each candidate is required to furnish to the ruler of the district where he lives a certificate signed by two graduates (bachelors of art), who pledge themselves as sureties for the applicant, giving at the same time his age, his name, the name of his parents and grandparents, with the name of the village or hamlet where he was born and resides. It also must state that he is not the son of a soldier, a play-actor, a slave, a whore, or of those whose occupation it is to attire dead bodies for burial, for sons of such are not permitted to become bachelors of art. His first examination takes place before the ruler of the district, assisted by able members of the litterati. This examination takes place at the capital city of the county or district, in the hall with which every capital city is provided. All the candidates meet in the hall at six in the morning; at seven the examiners appear, and at eight the business commences, when the subjects for examination are made known, and these consist of two essays on themes or texts selected from four books, and one poem. Each essay must have not less than four hundred characters or words, and not more than seven hundred. The poem must consist of twelve lines, and each line must measure five metrical feet. At two P.M. those who have completed their essay and poem are allowed to retire, while those who have not completed them are given till ten o'clock to finish, and at that hour the productions must all be handed in, whether completed or not. As soon as these productions have been examined the names of the successful candidates are made into a list and placed upon the temple of Confucius. Eight of these preliminary examinations are held at an interval of but a few days. The candidates who have been successful in three of these examinations then become candidates for eight similar examinations at the prefectural city before the prefect and his assistants. If they pass well here they are pronounced fit candidates for the grand examination before the chancellor in Canton, which examination is limited to one day.

The candidates are admitted in companies of fifty during the night previous to the day of examination; and at six o'clock all are to be ready, for at that hour the ordeal commences. Each candidate is examined to see if he has in his pockets or secreted anywhere about him a copy of the four classics in which he is to be examined. To make sure of the matter this search is repeated by another party, and with the greatest care. The candidates are then recognized by their sureties—graduates—who on this occasion wear their official costume, after which a certain number of sheets of paper are furnished to each candidate, for which, however, he has to pay the cost price. The candidates then take seats at the various stone tables with which the hall is supplied, when the subjects for the theses to be written upon are read to them. Each student must write an original poem, as in the primary examination. They are then relegated to the stalls or cells already described, when, in a certain number of hours, unaided by books of any kind, they must write the essays and the poems, which must be ready to hand in at a certain hour. The numbers, not the names, of those whose productions have been accepted are placed upon the walls of the literary chancellor's yamen. This, however, not being deemed sufficient, the candidates are subjected to still another examination equally severe three or four days after the first examination described. After this those who have passed this last ordeal acceptably are dressed in the garb of the bachelor of arts, and they repair to the chancellor's yamen, where a gilded ornament in the form of a flower is placed on the apex of their hats, as a mark of honor, after which they are seated in sedan-chairs, and their friends cause them to be conducted through the principal streets of the city. These candidates are afterward eligible for the examination for the highest degree at Pekin. The examination is so rigid here that only one or two per cent are usually able to gain the coveted prize. Some go back for the second and third time at subsequent examinations, since having undertaken the struggle they do not wish to yield until they have triumphed. It is said men as old as fifty or sixty years present themselves among the young students, being equally anxious to receive the chancellor's approval.

THE PAGODAS.

There are several of these in the city, but they do not require a lengthy description. The first to be mentioned is called the "Flowery Pagoda." It is nine stories in hight, octagonal in form, and two hundred and seventy feet in hight. It was commenced in the year 502, and was intended for a dagoba or shrine in which to deposit some relic of Buddha, or some portion of his vestment. It was also designed to represent the style of mansions which abound in the Western Paradise, where the faithful hope to go when the time comes for them to leave the bustle and turmoil of earth, and there spend a few decillions of years in perfect bliss, each one being a Buddha, emancipated from all care, trouble, and suffering. Latterly all pagodas are supposed to exercise a beneficial geomanic influence over the spirit of the dead, or Fung-Shuey. The structure is also regarded with such reverence that the faithful believers resort to it to be healed of their diseases. They scrape from the external walls particles of mortar, etc., which is mixed with an ointment which heals the most intractable sores and wounds, and performs cures as wonderful as Christians boast of from the effects of the mortar from the shrine at Knock, in Ireland, where the Virgin made her appearance, and to which thousands make pilgrimages, with precisely the same kind of faith which influences these superstitious Chinese. This pagoda, like most others, is simply a tower to look at externally; it is not allowed to be entered or ascended. Its diameter at the base must be about twenty-five feet. It is quite ornamental in appearance, bells of ornamentation hanging at each octagonal angle. It is also painted in brilliant colors.

Smooth Pagoda is another of these towering ornaments, and was erected by some Arabian voyagers about the year 900. It is one hundred and sixty feet high. A spiral staircase leads to the minaret on the top, but the entrance is closed.

The Five-Story Pagoda, so called, is not really a pagoda, but a tower, or rather a building, on the north wall of the city. The building is about one hundred feet in length and half that in width. The roof projects several feet over the balconies on the sides, giving it the general appearance of a pagoda. It affords a splendid view of the city, the windings of the river, and the surrounding country. Down the river two nine-story pagodas are seen in the distance; eastward runs the range of White Cloud hills, and in the southwest the Sai-chin hills are easily seen, thirty miles away. On the north is a wide plain dotted with villages, farms, and the scenes of busy industry. The hills near the wall are covered with cemeteries, and up their ascending grades are to be seen thousands of the Chinese resting-places for the dead, with their vault-like appearance and circular fronts in the shape of the Greek letter Omega. Here, I easily imagined, thousands upon thousands of the Chinese gather at stated periods, and call to mind their ancestors and departed friends, remember their virtues and worship their memories. Near this pagoda are stone tables and stone seats, on which refreshments are partaken of, and here we took our lunch, which Ah Cum had brought for us from the hotel, and we ordered a pot of tea made by those in attendance, and, as it was very good, and so much riding and sight-seeing had given us a good appetite, we enjoyed the repast highly there upon the old walls of Canton.

The walls are twenty feet in hight, and about the same in thickness, faced on each side with layers of stone or brick, and filled with earth. We ascended the wall in two or three places. Towers are erected upon it at intervals of a quarter or half a mile. The walls around the old city were constructed in the eleventh century, and were completed as they now stand in the fourteenth century. What is called the new city was inclosed in the sixteenth century. The city has sixteen gates, of which four are in the dividing wall, two in the west wall, six in the south, two in the east, and three in the north. There are besides two water gates. The wall makes a circuit of six miles. The Five-Story Pagoda was first built in the fourteenth century, but, burning down, was rebuilt in the seventeenth century. During the Canton rebellion in 1854-'55 the Viceroy Yeh was accustomed to station himself here, and with great interest watch the movements of his forces in their efforts to suppress the rebellion. The first and second stories of the building were occupied by the French troops, and the third, fourth, and fifth stories by the British soldiers, during their operations against Canton and the Chinese in 1857. As a favorable position for viewing operations, and for safety from attack, it is not surpassed in the city.

Leaving this locality we passed for some time through the Tartar quarter of the city, occupied as dwellings and stores for family supplies. Canton was taken by the Tartars in 1650, who destroyed much and slaughtered many thousands of the inhabitants. Since that time the Tartar dynasty has occupied the imperial throne, which rule has continued to the present time. There is some difference between the features and looks of the Tartars and the Chinese, but it is not so great as to attract observation were one not apprised of the fact.

CHINESE PRISONS.

I think I have indicated before that I have some reasons to be interested in prisons, so of course I wished to visit some of the prisons of China. I saw two of them, and found them not so formidable and solid as the one in which I was confined. The Canton prisons are of one story and constructed of wood, made by setting round posts of small trees in the earth, so close together that no man can get between them, and still admit some light and air; next to the street it is boarded up or walled, I forget which. The prisons are about twenty feet square, and in an apartment of this size I counted twenty prisoners, ten of them wearing the wood collar (the cague) made of boards one and a quarter inches thick, the whole two and a half or three feet square, with a hole in the center large enough for the neck, but not large enough to allow the head to pass through. It is put together on the culprit, and can not be gotten off by the one who has not the key or tools for the purpose. As the poor wretches are naked, or nearly so, the rough edges of such a collar are calculated to chafe their feelings, and the skin also. I saw a number with sore-looking necks. I made up my mind at once that I would not wish to wear a necklace of that kind. The floor of the prisons are the native earth, and I saw nothing that looked like beds or anything to lie upon. They probably have nothing but Mother Earth to rest upon, and that without a rag to cover them. I could easily realize that the Chinese treat their evil-doers with great severity, and I thought if I had to again go to prison I would prefer the American style to the Chinese, though in American prisons talking is prohibited and labor has to be performed, which is not the case in the Canton prisons which I visited, for the prisoners talked constantly and came to the aperture and begged us very earnestly for money. Even those wearing the wooden collars were as anxious for money as though they had no ornamentation about them.

In the first prison visited the sentences of the inmates do not exceed a year, and the offenses were stealing, picking pockets, assault and battery, etc. In the second prison, much of the same character, the terms were for a number of years, and the offenses of a more aggravated character, such as housebreaking, robbery, counterfeiting, arson, manslaughter, etc. I did not hear that one in either prison was convicted of mailing a copy of "Cupid's Yokes." But then we must remember that China is a heathen country, and is not yet blessed with Christian laws, Christian courts, Christian judges, Christian prisons, and all the other Christian blessings. Possibly she is not sensible of the deprivations which she labors under.

I noticed that some of the convicts in the second prison had shackles and fetters on their limbs, and I could not help feeling sorry for the poor wretches, and that they could not have behaved themselves so as not to be placed in such unpleasant quarters. In the street, also, in the vicinity of the prisons, where there is a wider space than in the usual streets, I saw dozens of offenders who were permitted outside the prison walls, but they had shackles on them so they could not get far away; besides, they were under the eye of a keeper. I certainly did not envy their condition, and wondered if they had all been justly convicted, or whether some of them had not had a Benedict to sit in judgment over them to send them to prison when not guilty.

THE EXECUTION GROUND.

It was but natural that from the prison one should go to the place of execution. This is called Ma-Tau, or the "Horse's Head," because the plot of ground is supposed to bear some resemblance to the head of the horse. This small lot is usually occupied in drying coarse pottery-ware, like furnaces, etc., which are made in shops adjoining, on either side of the premises; but on this plot, containing in the neighborhood of a quarter of an acre, the lives of thousands of human beings have been taken, more even than on many of the noted battle-fields of Europe. Criminals are executed here in all numbers, from three to fifty at a time. In the year 1855 fifty thousand rebels were beheaded here. The lot is unpaved earth, and the stench from the human blood that is shed upon it is often so great as to be smelt half a mile away.

Criminals are conveyed here from the prisons in baskets carried like a sedan-chair, and are emptied down without the slightest ceremony or feeling, as though they were the merest dirt or rubbish. Each criminal has a card or piece of bamboo attached to him, on which is given his name, age, place of residence, the crime of which he was convicted, etc. The usual mode of death is beheading, and the execution is presided over by the chief man in the county, or by a representative of the viceroy, or the governor of the city, as the case may be, and in regard to the nature of the crimes committed. Several of the criminals are ordered to kneel in a row and to incline their heads forward, and at a signal given by the presiding functionary the executioner, or executioners, for there are often three or four of them, raise their long, heavy, glittering blades, much like a scimetar, and with a single blow sever the head from the body. No block for the head to rest upon is used in any case. The bodies are then borne by members of the lowest or pariah class, whose duty it is to attend to that kind of business, and are buried without coffins, in grounds east of the city appropriated for the purpose, and named "The Temple for Ten Thousand Men." Death is usually met here with perfect stoic indifference, for the Chinese, like most of the orientals, are not afraid to die. There are, however, as said, occasionally some exceptions to the rule. One case is given of a facetious character who while being conveyed to the place of execution was lively in his remarks to the crowd who had gathered, as people in all countries assemble at such places, and said that he had at last risen to a position of dignity in the world, and could afford to be carried abroad in state. On another occasion a condemned man refused to bend his head forward, saying he had a long neck and a good marksman ought to be able to hit it with his inclining his head. The executioner reasoned with him, assuring him that he was a friend and not an enemy; that he did not follow the avocation of taking life from choice, but from necessity, and that he acted strictly in accordance with the command of the governor, and did not strike a blow until ordered to do so; that it was his wish to take life with as little pain as possible, and if the condemned man would incline his head forward he would take it off with a single blow, whereas if he had to do the work with the head held erect he might have to strike two or three times, and cause much more pain. This reasoning was effective; the condemned man inclined forward his head, and the next instant it was rolling upon the ground. A writer in the China Mail gives an account of an execution he witnessed there when twenty-eight condemned men were carried to the fatal lot, and more than half the number exhibited decided objections to being disposed of in that summary manner. Even after they had kneeled in a row to submit to the fatal blow some of them sprang to their feet, although manacled, and cried out lustily to the spectators, "Save life! save life! save life!" and the headsmen were placed under the necessity of striking off their heads the best way they could, while the poor wretches were thus upon their feet. One argumentative sort of convict reasoned in this way with the executioner: "Well, according to the teachings of our religion I will have to come back here to this earth in about eighteen years, and enter life again in the lowest form of existence. I will then probably be an executioner as you are now, and it will be my pleasant duty to take off your head about as you are to take off mine."

Archdeacon Gray narrates seeing three condemned men executed there on a certain occasion; two of the men had been pirates, and one a colonel in the Chinese army, who had exhibited cowardice in time of action and had tried to save his life by escaping from danger, and thereby lost it. One of the pirates gave a withering scowl when he was unceremoniously emptied out of the basket, as though if under other circumstances they would not dare to treat him in that manner, but they were vile men of the lowest class, and no respect was shown them before their heads were severed, or afterward. But the colonel, being a man of wealth, was conveyed in a closed sedan-chair, a carpet was spread in the mud for him to kneel upon, when the last moment had arrived, and when his head was severed his servants, who were permitted to attend him, took charge of his body, said prayers in his behalf, placed his remains in a coffin, and buried him in his own burial lot. All met their fate without a tremor.

It is the custom when the condemned have friends to furnish them with food and wine while being conveyed to the place of execution, for it to be done. The Chinese are very fond of pork, and wine is taken with it. Those who are to die within the next half hour partake freely of these while en route to the place of death, and it is not uncommon for them to drink so much wine that they are nearly intoxicated when their decapitated head falls to the earth. This, perhaps, is a single instance when intoxication does no harm. The poor outcasts who have no friends are not feasted with pork and wine, and they often arrive at the terrible place in an emaciated condition as though they had not had a "square meal" for many a week. The food given to the convicts, as described, has to be placed in their mouths while in transit, by accompanying friends, for, their arms being pinioned, they are unable to help themselves.

There is some diversity in the modes of execution at this place. There are leaning up against one of the walls three rude crosses, upon which condemned men are fastened and allowed to remain there for hours, and perhaps days, and sometimes they are cut to pieces with knives. Even condemned women have been served in this manner. Others have been strangled by hanging, somewhat as is the custom in our country.

I saw lying in a pile four or five human skulls belonging once to condemned wretches who were executed upon the ground. As I stood there looking at those skulls and thinking of the immense numbers that had met their death upon that plot of ground, I realized that it was a fearful place, and that the most horrible thoughts and feelings must have been experienced on the part of many thousands in that circumscribed lot. "Ah," thought I, "it is all over with those poor fellows, and where are they all now? Their bodies have returned to the elements of nature; is there anything else left of them which can think and feel?"

THE WATER CLOCK

Is visited by those who go about Canton, though it is by no means a very great curiosity. It is called a "clepsydra," or copper jar water-dropper. The apparatus consists of four copper vessels, sitting on ledges or stairs, so that as the water slowly drops from the upper one it falls into the one next below, from which it also drops into the one next below again, and so to the last; and by the period of time required for the water to thus drop out of one receptacle into another time is measured somewhat upon the plan of an hour-glass. Besides, there is an index placed in the upper jar by which the time can be told at any hour. The upper jar is twenty-three inches in hight, and the same in diameter; the others are a trifle smaller, decreasing somewhat as they descend. When the water has dropped into the lower jar it is dipped back to the upper one, and is occasionally renewed. In this way the Chinese measured time five hundred years ago; but it is not accurate, and merely an imperfect arrangement. One good Connecticut clock, costing two dollars and a half, is worth a hundred water clocks. The tower where the clock is is approached by passing under three or four monumental arches and ascending a long flight of stone steps. Here is a fire clock, which consists of a composition somewhat like a slow-burning fuse formed into a coil. The time is calculated by the number of inches burned of this fuse. This is also inaccurate, but tends to show the ingenuity of a people who knew no better way of measuring time. Both these clocks were used hundreds of years ago, and are only kept in operation now to show the expedients of former centuries.

DOG, CAT, AND RAT MEAT.

I can no longer have any doubt about the Chinese indulging in these delicacies, for I have seen, with my own eyes, the meat nicely dressed and offered for sale. I must say cats and dogs, when nicely dressed, look as well as pigs and rabbits. The dogs are not skinned, but probably scalded, as hogs were in our country when I was a boy, and the hair scraped off. The meat looks white and inviting, and I am not prepared to say that the flesh of dogs and cats does not contain as good nitrogen as pigs and ducks; neither can I say that rats have not in their organized elements just as good and as nourishing meat as are contained in frogs, eels, and turtles. At all events the Chinaman seems to like them, and as he does I am as willing he should eat them as that the Frenchman should eat horse and frogs, the Englishman sheep and hare, and the American hog and bear meat. Every man to his taste. I presume there are many of us who, if half starved, and served with a nice stew of cat or dog meat, and we were ignorant of what it was, could be persuaded to believe it veal or lamb; it would taste very good to us, and we would be duly nourished. There is no doubt that usage and prejudice have much to do in causing us to regard some animals as fit for food and others not.

I did not learn the ruling market prices for cats, dogs, and rats, but I imagine I can see the Chinese butcher carefully feeling pussy's sides, seeing how much meat is on the ribs of the dog, and squinting to see whether the rat had been well provided for. The animals of these varieties which I saw hanging up in the butchers' stalls looked as though they had been pretty well fed, and as though Wing-Wong and his wife, and King-Koon and his family, might make a good dinner upon such viands.

There are in Canton restaurants where the animals named are exclusively served up, and, with Archdeacon Gray's assistance, I can give you the bill of fare of some of them. The particular restaurant of the kind which he visited bears the euphonious cognomen of "Whoon-Hang-Kan-Maan-Yank-Poo." In the stew pans of the establishment, the hind and fore quarters of puppy and pussy were being converted into savory dishes calculated to make John Chinaman laugh from ear to ear. Placards in large letters informed visitors that the finest of black cats were served up in all styles and at all hours, that dogsteaks hot from the griddle would be produced at the shortest notice, and that rat soup and stew were always on hand and kept warm. In the eating-room on the second floor happy parties were sitting, with chop-sticks in hand, putting those rare delicacies out of sight at a rapid rate. On the wall was posted in large characters the following dishes and prices: "One tael of black dog's flesh, eight cash; one tael's weight of dog's fat, three kandareens of silver; the genital organ of a black or yellow dog, three kandareens of silver; one large basin of black cat's flesh, one hundred cash; one small basin of ditto, fifty cash; a large basin of fat rat stew, one hundred cash; quarter of a rat-pie, three kindareens; the same of puppy-pie, four kindareens of silver; one bottle of common wine, thirty-two cash; one small bottle of wine, sixteen cash; one large bottle of dark rice wine, sixty-eight cash; one small bottle of dark rice wine, thirty-four cash; one large bottle of plum wine, sixty-eight cash; one small bottle of plum wine, thirty-four cash; one large bottle of pear wine, sixty-eight cash; one large bottle of Teintsin wine, ninety-eight cash; one basin of congree, three cash; one small plate of pickles, three cash; ketchup, three cash; vinegar, three cash; one pair of black cat's eyes, three kandareens of silver." (I think it requires ten or twenty of the round brass coin called cash, with square hole in the center, to equal a cent.)

Do not some of you wish you could order a meal at that restaurant? I am compelled to confess that I left Canton without availing myself of the opportunity of patronizing that restaurant for a dinner.

Pork, however, is the great favorite of the Chinese. I saw far more of hog meat in the butcher's shops than all other flesh put together, and it uniformly was very fat. The dogs of Canton are of the "yaller" variety, and have quite a different expression of countenance from the dogs of our country. They are of medium size, their noses sharp, bearing considerable resemblance to the wolf and the fox. They look intelligent and good-natured. They undoubtedly make very good hash, but they do not seem to be aware of the destiny that awaits them.

The Canton markets are pretty well supplied with poultry and game of the kinds peculiar to the country. On Hing-Lung-Tai street is an extensive market, where may be found in considerable quantities live ducks, geese, chickens, pigeons, partridges, quails, teals, divers, storks, and, not to be omitted, owls, lizards, tortoises, and salted, smoked, and preserved rats. The storks, as you are aware, are large, long-legged birds; to keep them in their places they are fastened to their perches with cords, and to prevent their being frightened at the approach of customers who wish to examine them before buying, their eyelids are kindly sewed together with fine thread. That is a trick that our people have probably never adopted; but there is no end of the cruelties practiced in all countries where animals are used for food. I have seen in our own country half a dozen young calves just torn from their mothers, with their legs corded tightly and thrown together on a hot day, in a small wagon-body, on their backs and sides, thus transported for miles to the slaughter-house. We can hardly with consistency condemn the Chinese for cruelty to animals. Lizards are supposed to impart strength to invalids convalescing from an attack of illness, and of course are regarded as a luxury. Tortoises are eaten by those suffering from running sores and ulcers. Those who have lost their hair and hearing seek for this kind of food, under the belief that will contribute to the restoration of what they have lost. I cannot speak from personal knowledge as to the quality of lizards and tortoises, but I cannot see why they should not contain as much nutriment as many similar animals that are eaten by other people. I cannot say why a tortoise is not as fit for food as a turtle, or a lizard as a frog or an eel, and I know the latter are good. Inasmuch as all animal flesh, especially the lean part, is of about the same composition, it is somewhat hard to say which animals shall be used for food and which not. The classification and prohibitions ascribed to Moses are without reason, and are totally disregarded by ourselves and other nations in many particulars, notably in the swine, which does not chew the cud. It is somewhat difficult to see how the parting of the hoof or chewing of the cud makes any special difference with the nitrogen, which is the principal ingredient in animal flesh.

In Ui-lan street is an eating-house and garden of fashionable resort. The bill of fare presents one hundred and forty-six dishes, from six cents to ninety cents each. In the kitchen the Chinese culinary art may be seen. The rooms for parties and the garden are decidedly attractive.

SMALL FEET OF CHINESE WOMEN.

I like many things I see among the Chinese, but not their abominable custom of dwarfing and deforming the feet of women. While they are not foolish, as the women of America are, in contracting the waist, chest, and abdomen with corsets, so they can hardly obtain a natural, free breath, they have for many centuries—yes, for thousands of years—followed the miserable practice of confining the feet of female infants in iron shoes, or other equally horrible appliances, to prevent them from attaining their natural and proper size, and this to follow a most absurd fashion. Oh, what fools fashion makes of people in nearly all countries! I have seen many of these small-footed women tottling along on the streets of Canton, walking much as a man would on two wooden legs. The least push would throw them over, and some of them have to be steadied by a servant or some other person. They are absolutely cripples; made so to be in the fashion.

The average length of the feet of these unfortunate women is from three to four inches. I have seen the shoes that had been worn by a Chinese woman not any more than three inches in length; not too large for a babe two years of age. Think of the cruelty, the torture, that is constantly being inflicted in this country in cramping the feet of poor little girls to keep them at the size of infancy and prevent their attaining the proportions designed by nature, when, instead of making them look better, they look far worse. Those little deformed feet are not pretty—not half so beautiful as a good-sized natural foot, and are not of one-tenth part the utility. A Chinese woman with such feet can walk but little, and that little with less grace than that with which a duck waddles. Fortunately the fashion is not universal. It is only the upper classes, or those who ape them, who make such fools of themselves. The lower classes let their feet grow naturally, and they are not a bit too large, for the Chinese have small feet as a rule, and they look infinitely better in every sense of the word than those who are made cripples for life by fond but foolish parents. I forget how long a time is required that the feet of the little ones should be confined in iron clamps so that they will not afterwards grow again, but I think it is several years, and the agony thus produced cannot be described. The toes sometimes turn under in the most deformed manner, and even grow into the soles of the feet. Oh, it is horrible to contemplate! But scores of millions of children have been thus tortured, and millions more will be in the same manner. The long queues or pigtails of the men are foolish in the extreme, but they bear no comparison with the deformed foot folly. I asked Ah Cum how much it would require for me to cut off his queue to carry home as a Chinese curiosity. He replied that he would not have it cut off for thirty thousand million dollars. That sum is rather more than I thought the pigtail would be worth to me, so I did not cut it off. Truly, the superstitions, prejudices, and fashions of this people are oppressive in the extreme, and it will be a long time before they are removed. They do not take to Western notions and customs "worth a cent."

A VISIT TO THE MISSIONARIES.

Among the calls of that busy day in Canton, was one with Mr. Clark, upon the missionaries Mr. Masters and wife, who are intelligent people, living in a very comfortable two-story house of stone, plastered on the outside and of a white color, much after the style of good European houses. Mr. Masters is an Englishman, and Mrs. Masters an American woman, a native of Vermont, and several years a missionary before marriage, though they both are still young people, not more than thirty-five years of age. They are genial and pleasant, and are undoubtedly devoted to the work in which they are engaged. Mr. Masters has mastered the Chinese language and is able to talk to the natives in their own tongue, and tell them how much better Jesus was than Confucius and Buddha. He has preaching regularly two or three times a week, and the people are good enough to step in and hear him talk, but from the representations of both Mr. and Mrs. Masters the success by way of making converts of Chinamen is poor. The Chinese do not take readily to Christianity. The children attend the schools, somewhat, which the missionaries conduct, but as to their becoming good, firm Christians there is room for much doubt, and on this ground the two people shook their heads in a discouraging manner and seemed to think the natives might rise against them at almost any time.

I do not wish to speak unfairly with reference to the work of the missionaries here or at other places in Asia. The majority of those who come out here to plant the gospel are undoubtedly sincere, and, so far as they are introducing western education, customs, and civilization, they are doing good. And even with the utmost success they can hope for they are perhaps planting no worse superstitions than they find here; but that Christianity contains truths or good morals not taught in the religions of Confucius and Buddha you very well understand I do not believe. In the progress of science and many of the arts we are ahead of the Asiatics. Our civilization is superior to theirs, but that our religion has more truth than theirs, that we also have not superstitions and errors as well as they, is quite another thing.

It is a serious question whether the Asiatics who have embraced Christianity have really been benefited thereby. I perceive it is the general impression of Europeans and Americans, so far as I have met the latter, that the natives have not been benefited by the missionaries. I have conversed upon this subject with officers of the army, with officers on steamers, and with business men when I have met them, and the almost uniform testimony has been that the natives are not improved by the missionaries and their intercourse generally with the people of the western nations. They learn many new vices and few new virtues. There is no question but what intemperance and licentiousness have increased largely among the simple-minded people of Asia since they have become acquainted with missionaries and Christians of other grades. Honesty and truthfulness have not been increased among these people by the introduction of the new religion and western customs. They undoubtedly knew how to lie and be dishonest before, but they did not practice it to so great an extent as since they became somewhat Christianized, for Christians can out-lie, out-cheat, and out-swindle the world.

I say it is a grave question whether the small number of Asiatics who have embraced Christianity have been benefited thereby. As a truth, it may be stated that their morals have not been improved. They are Asiatics in character and abilities, and will continue to be Asiatic whatever religion they adopt. Religious beliefs and superstitions do not greatly change national and racial peculiarities. Perhaps the effect of the adoption of Christianity upon the natives of this eastern world is pretty well illustrated by a short dialogue which was repeated to me, and which took place between a European and native, as follows:

"Well, Sam-Sou, I hear you have become a Christian."

"Yes, sabe, me Christian now."

"Well, what do you dŏ, since you have become a Christian, that you did not do before?"

"I do like sabe (master); I swear some, I get drunk sometimes, and I pump ship standing up" (the last a true oriental never does).

It may not be hard to judge whether that poor native has been greatly benefited by following the example of "sabe," but he is a fair representative of the Asiatic converts.

I am clearly of the opinion that the tens of millions of dollars that are annually given by well-meaning people in Europe and America for the spread of the gospel, or what is called the "gospel," in heathen lands had much better be retained at home, to be used in ameliorating the condition of the poor—providing them with remunerative employment, by which they can support themselves, affording them comfortable places of abode where they will not become the victims, as now, of the odors and miasmas which exist in the miserable cellars and close, crowded tenements, where disease and ill-health are natural results. If the people of London, Edinburgh, Dublin, Paris, Berlin, New York, Philadelphia, Chicago, and thousands of other cities and towns, would use their surplus means in aiding the poor and helpless—the heathen—in their own communities, instead of sending it to the most distant parts of the earth, they would, in my opinion, be acting far more wisely.

Why send to Asia's distant shores
To cure the ills at our own doors?

We assuredly have in Europe and America enough that are needy, enough that are ignorant, enough that are down-trodden, enough that need to have the gospel of cleanliness, industry, and real truthfulness preached to them, to use up all the spare dimes and surplus energy our people can boast of. As "charity begins at home," so ought charitable deeds and labors. When we have fully converted the heathen in our own lands, and have found useful and remunerative employment for the idle and dissolute, when we have spread cleanliness, health, industry, and good morals among the lowly and needy in our own country, it will then be time enough to undertake the conversion to a similar gospel in countries on the opposite side of the globe.

Foreign missions seem to be one of the fashions of our time—one of the rages which people run into. The churches or communities which raise the most money for foreign missions feel that they have thereby shown superior virtue, and pride themselves accordingly; and the preacher or Sunday-school superintendant who squeezes the most money out of the scanty purses of the little boys and girls, to be used in sending the gospel to the people of Asia, Africa, etc., thinks he has done a great thing. This is all a mistake. Not one dollar in ten so contributed really reaches the heathen for whom intended, and the fraction that does reach them effects quite as much harm as good.

When the inquiry is made in these Eastern cities:
Who live in the best houses?
The answer is, the missionaries.
Who have the most money to spend?
The missionaries.
Who have the most servants and the prettiest servant-girls?
The missionaries.

I have seen in many cities in this Eastern world that the missionaries occupy larger and better houses, have larger retinues of servants and attendants, have apparently more money to spend than almost any other class of people. Many come out here and live in comparative luxury and ease who at home would hardly be able to make a living. Those who give their money freely to keep up this absurdity are not making the most wise use possible of their means.

All this, however, need not be complained of if the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth were taught these people. But when I realize that hundreds, and even thousands, leave their homes and country, that millions of dollars are annually employed, to plant here superstitions quite as great as those which have existed here for thousands of years, I mentally exclaim, "What misdirection! What folly!"

At the house of Mr. Masters I met Dr. J. G. Kerr, an American, who is principal of the Hospital of the Medical Missionary Society of China, the headquarters of which is in Canton. I am pleased to be able to report that he is doing a very commendable work, and is most successful as a surgeon. He has performed some very critical operations for ovarian tumors, stone in the bladder, etc. In the year 1880 there were treated in the hospital 16,860 out-patients and 1,121 in-patients. The number of surgical operations amounted to about five hundred, which in the main were very successful. The doctor is a modest, hard-working man, and seems wholly devoted to the pursuit of spreading good health and Christianity at the same time. I cannot speak too highly of the first, and am confident he would not wish to spread falsehoods. If his religion were equal to his practice I am sure it would be of an excellent character. I have no doubt of his sincerity, neither have I of the sincerity of the Mohammedan dervishes, the Siva-worshipers of India, and the millions of Buddhists scattered nearly all over this great continent. Nothing is surer than that sincerity is no test of truth. The greatest errors and superstitions the world has known have had myriads of sincere and honest supporters.

There is not a question but what Dr. Kerr is pursuing the course best calculated to win converts to his religion. There are plenty of people in China with various ailments,and when relieved of them by scientific and skilful treatment it is very natural that they should feel kindly disposed toward the person who cured them, and look favorably upon the doctrines he teaches. If they had received great physical good, they would hardly hesitate to take a modicum of the spiritual also. With the doses of physic which gave them relief they will hesitate to spurn a few doses of theology, though it is not much better than what they have already. From what I hear from two or more places where the medical practice is connected with the missionary, I judge the union of the two to be beneficial to the acceptance of new religious dogmas. Pills and piety go better together than the latter does alone. Let it not be understood, however, that the doctor has been able to make great accessions to the church, but pills and powders lend a helping hand. The Roman Catholics have considerable of a foothold here, and are erecting a fine cathedral with money that has been sent from Europe. If their religion is any better than the teaching of Buddha and Confucius I am unable to see it.

Let me remark in this connection that branches of the Canton hospital have been organized in two or three other places, and that encouraging success has been met with. The Canton hospital was started by Dr. Peter Parker in 1839, but was burnt in a large fire in 1857, and was rebuilt in 1866. The expenses are met by foreign and native contributions.

The Chinese are themselves prominent in establishing several charitable institutions where the needy and helpless are furnished with a home and such aid as they require. Thus in the vicinity of Canton there is a Home for Old Men, a Home for Old Women, a Home for the Blind, a Home for Lepers, a Foundling Hospital, etc. It is a cause for rejoicing that whatever religion men may have there is much in human character that is grand and noble, and that even the darkest superstitions upon religious subjects cannot crush out of humanity all the native kindness and goodness inherent to it.

MECHANICAL TALENT OF CANTON.

I regret that I had not time to visit more of the establishments where various mechanical work is being performed, inasmuch as it is in general so different from what is to be seen in our country; but being under the necessity of getting back to Hong Kong at a certain time to take the steamer for Yokohama, I was not able to extend my operations so fully as I otherwise would have done. It would have been very interesting to visit many of the places of mechanism and taken time enough to become fully familiar with the various operations there conducted. Canton is noted for its many manufactures, especially fine and excellent silk goods, grass cloth, mother of pearl carving, wood carving, porcelain wares, jade-stone work, jewelry of many kinds, copper work, fine embroidery, gold and silver thread, furniture, bamboo work, including hundreds of different articles, pictures, a wide variety, glass-blowing and cutting, gold-beating, felt work, cotton fabrics, colors and pigments, etc., etc. I only had time to take a hurried glance at some of these, leaving many unnoticed.

I should also have been glad to take a day and go up the river twenty miles further to a city by the name of Fat-Shan, the Birmingham or Pittsburgh of China. Here iron-work in its numerous departments is conducted, including many foundries. It is said by good judges that the castings here produced are much thinner and smoother than are made anywhere else in the world. The rice kettles and other hollow ware are but about as thick as heavy paper, and as smooth as though ground and polished. Some American mechanics who have examined the ware admit that nothing of the kind has been accomplished in our country. This degree of perfection is attained by the molds being of a smooth material that will bear heating and being used repeatedly; they are brought to a high heat before the fused metal is poured into them, so that the latter is not chilled, but runs freely into the smallest interstices. A large match factory has also recently been started, where matches equal to any made in Europe or America are turned out in large quantities. The establishment is conducted upon western principles, a large number of hands and a steam-engine being employed therein. The whole thing is managed by Chinese operators. I, however, had not time to visit Fat-Shan.

I have said nothing about the dried-fish stores of Canton, but there are many of them, and they smell strong enough to deserve a word or two. The Chinese are very fond of dried fish, and shops where this kind of food is sold are often met with, but oh, how loudly they do smell to heaven! An ordinary fish-market has rather of a fishy odor to persons of acute nasal organs, but polecats and sauerkraut! they cannot begin to smell like these dried-fish establishments! I was not fond of lingering around them longer than necessary.

I should mention that I visited a printing establishment and book-bindery or two, and found them conducted very differently from similar establishments with us. The printing is done on engraved wooden blocks, the same as two thousand years ago. The presses are simply constructed, and are worked by hand. I can hardly describe them except by saying they are not at all like Hoe's improved eight-cylinder presses. The book-binding is not so elaborate and elegant as with us, though the books are put together with neatness, and the work is done with but little machinery. A large proportion of the books are with limp covers like our pamphlets. The paper for blank-books is ruled by hand. I was struck with the neatness and accuracy with which it is executed. The writing of the Chinese is performed with a brush or camel's-hair pencil, the lines running from the top of the page to the bottom, instead of across the page, and the paging commences at what we call the end of the volume, being in this respect like the Hebrew. Their singular-looking characters are executed with greater rapidity than one would suppose.

The Chinaman never uses figures to make calculations as we do. They have in all their banks and business places small calculating boards, containing eleven, thirteen, fifteen, seventeen, or twenty-one rows of what may be called buttons—turned blocks of wood, smaller than ordinary checker-men, sliding on wires, six buttons on each wire; the outside row being separated from the other five by a slight division. By manipulating those buttons, they add, subtract, multiply, divide, and work out all sorts of problems, but how it is done I have not learned, and cannot explain. If they wish, however, to see what the interest on fifty dollars amounts to for three months at five per cent per annum, or what twenty-five yards of silk amounts to at seventy-eight cents a yard, they resort at once to their reckoning apparatus and work it out in a moment. The way their fingers make those buttons change places is very rapid.

OPIUM SMOKING

Is one of the bad habits which Chinamen have contracted and of course is much to be deplored, but I am certain it has been greatly exaggerated, and is not nearly so gross an evil as the use of alcoholic beverages in Christian countries. I think I said something upon the subject in a former letter, but will revert to it again here. I have looked into several opium-smoking establishments and have seen a few scores of Chinamen smoking; but it is a far simpler affair than I supposed, and does not produce the stupefaction and intoxication which I had been led to believe from what I had read and heard upon the subject.

The opium is softened with water or some other liquid to a semi-fluid condition. Of this enough is taken up on the point of a long wire, like a fine knitting needle with a point, to amount to half the size of an ordinary pea. This is placed upon the pipe, which seems to be neatly constructed of wood, the bulb at the lower end being not an open bowl like a tobacco pipe, but a slightly crowning dish with a small hole in the center, connecting, of course, with the tube leading to the mouth. The opium taken up with the needle is deposited on and around this small hole and held near the blaze of a small lamp until dry, it being worked into the proper shape over the hole and an opening being made though it with the needle, when the opium is lighted in the lamp, three or four whiffs are taken, and that is all of it; the opium is consumed, and the Chinaman, who is lying on his side in the meantime, either gets up, or engages in conversation, or lies quietly and says little, waiting to take another smoke after a while. Among those I have seen smoking I saw no dropping into an unconscious state, none who acted as though they had lost their senses, none who even went to sleep. In short, they acted little different from those who smoke tobacco, with the exception of the length of time required to do the smoking. An opium smoke does not last over half a minute. Of course the indulgence can be repeated often enough to produce stupefaction, but I saw no one even approaching that condition, and I am told by reliable Europeans who have been familiar with opium smoking for years that it is very rare that anything of the kind is seen.

Of course opium is a deleterious drug if used in excess in any form, and produces a very injurious effect upon the system, destroying the nervous tone, debilitating the stomach, ending in an emaciated, impoverished, cadaverous, broken-down, and ruined condition. But opium is not the worst article used, nor does it do the most injury. Alcohol is a hundred per cent worse; and opium does not produce a hundredth part of the annoyance to others as does the imbibing of intoxicating drinks. If a Chinaman smokes opium, even to excess, he is quiet and disturbs nobody. He does not become a demon in human shape, wishing to annoy and frighten everybody around him, to disturb the peace of an entire neighborhood, to commit the worst of crimes, including taking the lives of his fellow-beings, as has been done thousands of times by those under the maddening influence of alcoholic drinks, but, at the worst, passes into a quiet, passive, dreamy state, which disturbs and harms no one but himself. There is probably hardly a person in Great Britain or America who has not heard the midnight howlings of intoxicated men, and whose lives have not been more or less endangered, and whose peace and comfort have not been totally destroyed by those who indulge in intoxicating drinks, which place them below the brutes. The difference between the evils of opium-smoking and alcohol-drinking is immensely in favor of opium-smoking, though I by no means wish to be considered an advocate of, or apologist for, the pernicious habit. But such a hue and cry has been raised by leading Christians, both in Europe and America, against the enormous sins of the Chinese for their use of opium, and so many exaggerations and falsifications have been indulged in by them and the missionaries now in Asia, that I simply wish to throw the light of truth upon the whole subject. In a former letter I think I made some mention of a paper read by Sir Rutherford Alcock, formerly minister from the British government to the empire of China, which paper was read before the Society of Arts in London, and which was practically the same as appeared in the Nineteenth Century for December, 1881, under the head of "Opium and Common Sense." Sir Rutherford having resided over twenty years at the head of the Chinese government, and in the largest city of the empire, in the capacity of minister plenipotentiary, and besides being a man of great intelligence and general information, is a most competent witness. I wish to make some further allusion to what he had to say upon this subject, or rather to give you a part of a letter, commenting on Sir Rutherford's paper, from a London correspondent of the Hong Kong Daily Press, in which he makes quotations from the ex-plenipotentiary.

The correspondent goes on to say that amongst the leaders of the anti-opium movement are such pious men as the archbishops of Canterbury and of York, Cardinal Manning, and the Earl of Shaftesbury. Sir Rutherford accuses these eminent philanthropists of ignorance upon a subject in which they take a deep interest, and of giving currency to gross exaggerations which, although entirely disproved long ago, are still repeated and indorsed.

The pretext of these ecclesiastical dignitaries for taking the matter in hand is the statement put forth by the missionaries in China, that their efforts to make converts are marred by the disgrace which is attached to the foreign name by reason of the importation of opium. On this pretext Sir Rutherford is very severe. He not only affirms that it is totally untrue, but that the presence of the Christian missionary in China is a far greater eyesore than the importation of opium. He held in his hand a certain pamphlet compiled by a Chinese statesman of great literary attainments, which contained the most slanderous and disgusting libels conceivable on Foreign Barbarians, whose wholesale butchery the author advocated. His grievance was the teaching of false doctrine by foreign missionaries. Sir Rutherford accuses the mandarins of promoting and encouraging the circulation of this pamphlet, and declares that the Tientsin massacre was the outcome of it.

With respect to that tragic affair he accuses the Tientsin authorities of being absolutely implicated. He gives the details in a most authenticated shape, and they form anything but pleasant reading. A difference is made between Protestant and Roman Catholic missionaries, greatly in favor of the former, but Sir Rutherford maintains that this difference is unknown to the Chinese generally. He is very severe upon the French Roman Catholic missionaries, whose conduct he describes as rapacious and aggressive, and he blames the French government in unmeasured terms for supporting their pretensions and maintaining their position. He does not speak from hearsay, but from an absolute personal knowledge of the subject.

Sir Rutherford, having refuted the assertion that England forced opium on China, turns round upon the ecclesiastics, and sets forth that missionaries, who are far more odious to the Chinese than opium, were forced upon the Middle Kingdom by treaty, and, what is more, have caused much more trouble and risk of a rupture than opium has ever done. In short, he shows that whilst opium is a source of revenue, missionaries are a constant source of anxiety and danger.

He accuses the missionaries of writing to the societies to which they belong on the subject of the opium trade and making grossly exaggerated statements. These being read by clergymen at public meetings, and printed in the missionary reports, have fed the agitation against opium. One of these statements computes the number of Chinese who die annually from smoking opium at a higher figure than there are smokers altogether—that is, if the opium imported be divided by the small allowance of a mace per man per day. These exaggerated statements have been contradicted and disproved by leading authorities and medical missionaries, adverse to the use of opium—but still they are reproduced and re-lied upon.

The tables are thus entirely turned upon the missionaries. Sir Rutherford has doubtless aroused a nest of hornets about his ears, but it seems that he is so sure of his ground that the clericals may waste their breath on platform and in pulpit without doing themselves much good. It is unprecedented, however, to find a diplomat who has retired upon his laurels coming forward and assailing the highest ecclesiastical dignitaries in the land by accusing them of lack of knowledge on a subject which they are conspicuous in agitating—of making mischievous and misleading statements—of indorsing and repeating exaggerations which have been refuted and disproved years ago, winding up with a tu quoque charge, that the mode adopted of propagating their respective creeds is far more objectionable than the grievances of which they make so great a hobby.

The rise and progress of the opium trade is given by Sir Rutherford in a very comprehensive manner. The import first commenced about 1767, when about 200 chests were shipped from Goa to China. This source of supply was increased to about 1,000 chests annually, and no more. In 1773 the East India Company commenced to export opium in very small quantities until about 1790, when they sent forward a cargo of 1,600 chests. This proved unsaleable and had to be sent back.

AVERAGE ANNUAL SUPPLY FROM INDIA.

From 1790 to 1820,	4,500	chests.
" 1820 to 1830,	16,877	"
" 1830 to 1840,	20,619	"
" 1840 to 1850,	52,925	"
In 1860, when it became legalized,	89,744	piculs.
" 1870,	95,043	"
" 1880,	96,839	"

The deduction which Sir Rutherford draws from these figures is this—that they prove the trade was not tolerated because of the fear of the might of Great Britain, as is alleged by the Anti-Opium League, inasmuch as they (the figures) display the fact that the increase was steady and gradual from the commencement of the trade until 1840, when the fear of Great Britain's might became developed and illustrated by Commissioner Lin's coup of imprisoning her majesty's representative and the entire foreign community, and extorting from them, under the threat of their lives, 20,000 and odd chests of opium which lay in the receiving ships at Lintin.

I now proceed to the review of what I consider to be the most important part of Sir R. Alcock's paper, namely, the relative deleterious effects of stimulants, whether narcotic or alcoholic, over the entire area of our planet. He produced a map illustrative of this point, and he developed some singular and instructive conclusions. From the negro, debased and barbarous as he is, to the citizen of the most civilized countries in the world, he showed that some strange instinct led and prompted him to seize upon the most available natural product which nature had placed at his disposal, and to extract from it some sort of a stimulant whereby intoxication or mental excitement might be promoted. Some of the modes of preparation are disgusting, some ingenious, some rude, and some scientific. My space does not allow me to go beyond the two stimulants best known to civilization, namely, opium and alcohol, the first named being by far the most antiquated. I must therefore confine myself to a comparison of the deleterious effects of these stimulants, and, to be concise, to their respective results in China and in Great Britain.

Sir Rutherford says: "I have lived for the last twelve years in this great city of beer and spirit-drinking people, after more than twenty years passed in the midst of dense populations of opium-smokers, and I can conscientiously aver that I see more degradation and brutality in a single day in the streets of London—more of violence and misery, with danger to all who come in contact with it—than I ever saw in twenty years of life in China; and I would rather live, so far as personal safety and freedom from outraged feelings for humanity, in a heathen population of opium-smokers, than in a Christian community where drunkenness from alcoholic drinks is the prevailing vice among the mass and the working classes."

Here he alights on grounds which are not only perfectly unassailable, but which relegate the anti-opium philanthropists to the same category as that enjoyed by the society for sending flannel singlets to the infant niggers of Jamaica. He shows by elaborate and authentic statistics that whilst the Chinese spend twenty-five millions sterling ($125,000,000) annually on opium (imported and native grown), or 1s. 8d (40 cents) per head on the lowest estimation of the population, namely, 300,000,000, the people of the British Islands spend annually £142,000,000 ($710,000,000) on strong drinks and intoxicating liquors, or £4 10 ($22 50) per head on the ascertained population of 35,000,000. This is 40 cents per head against $22.50.

Furthermore, he sets forth, on grounds supported by facts and figures, that whilst the entire supply of opium, Indian and native grown, is only sufficient for the moderate requirements of three millions of opium-smokers, the abuse of intoxicating liquors in the British Isles is the rule and not the exception.

Finally, he submits evidence of the very highest medical authority, and facts stated by unimpeachable witnesses, to show that opium is less deleterious than alcohol. In short, I can hardly see how the force of reasoning can further go. It can hardly be expected that high ecclesiastical dignitaries, lynx-eyed grievance-mongers, and simple-minded missionaries will accept such a defeat on tu quoque lines, but ridicule must reconcile them to the situation. They must allow the Chinese to spend in peace his twenty pence per annum on the "drowsy syrup of the East," or turn the head of their hobby to the Englishman and teach him to spend less than his one thousand and eighty pence.

Sir Rutherford thus, you see, clearly shows up the ignorance, meddlesomeness, and arrant misrepresentations of those pious souls who have little else to do but live upon the money which they have, but never earned, and occasionally meet at Exeter Hall and cry out against the heathen in Asia and other quarters of the globe, and discuss some arbitrary measure of reform. We have the same self-righteous class in America, who are far more troubled about the sinfulness of people on the opposite side of the earth than their own shortcomings and delinquencies. Here is to be seen a very fair specimen of the incorrectness of the representations of missionaries and Christians generally about the immoralities of what is called the heathen world. Take Great Britain, for example, the first Christian nation; on the globe, who spends $710,000,000 per year for intoxicating drinks, and in whose principal cities intoxication, crime, prostitution, poverty, and wretchedness exist to a shocking extent, is intensely troubled, or at least her leading Christians are, because of the wickedness of the people of China, who expend annually the sum of $125,000,000, while the population of China is ten times that of Great Britain. These sanctified hypocrites seem to think it far worse for John Chinaman to spend his forty cents per year in the opium he quietly smokes than for John Bull to guzzle down his $22 50 worth of maddening, debasing, alcoholic drinks, which make him a noisy, infuriated demon. This plain case shows just about how much truth and consistency there is in the Christian howlings about heathen sinfulness and immorality.

America is really little better than England either in the truthfulness of her Christians or in the use of alcoholic drinks. She follows closely the example of the mother country. If the Christians of both countries would busy themselves more about their own sins and misdeeds, more about the evils, vices, crimes, debaucheries, ignorance, poverty, degradation, destitution, and wretchedness which exist at home in their own cities, and less about the sins and unbelief of people who live fifteen thousand miles from them, they would exhibit far more honesty, consistency, and good sense.

Sir Rutherford quietly but effectually shows up the heartless hypocrisy and inconsistency of the class of pious busybodies alluded to, and also makes clear the real source of anxiety, disturbance, and danger of missionaries as a class, who make themselves so officious and meddlesome in the countries where they are unwelcome aggressors, under the pretense of bringing from their own homes and their own cities a purer and more moral religion.

As to the use of opium, England and America are not as faultless and sinless as they assume to be; they are by no means free from the sinfulness of using large quantities of this drug in excess of what is needed as a medicine. In both countries enormous quantities of opium and morphine—the active principle of opium—are used as intoxicants and narcotics in addition to the enormous quantities of alcoholic drinks guzzled down. There is scarcely a druggist in England or America who cannot bear witness to this truth, and who does not know of from one to twenty persons who make an excessive use of opium in some form, until many of them have become the merest sots and wrecks of humanity. Great Britain and America have really but slight grounds for throwing stones at the Chinese on account of their immoralities.

I again repeat that opium-smoking is an evil which I by no means wish to defend, and I would be very glad if the Chinese would abandon it, but it certainly is not so bad as represented. It does not destroy and kill off men so rapidly as has been asserted. I saw many men who have smoked opium for years who show very little of the appalling appearances attributed to the use of the drug. They do not begin to look half as bad as many a man I have seen who had been drinking whisky but a single year. Opium-smoking does not cause riots. It does not make husbands beat and kill their wives; it does not endanger the lives of almost everybody who comes in contact with it, as the use of alcoholants does. So, with all the evils which are entailed to opium-smoking, I repeat, it will be quite as well for the pious and over-officious souls of Great Britain and America to spend their redundant energies in lessening the consumption in their own countries of the maddening, death-dealing alcoholic drinks before they make themselves too unhappy about China and the Chinese.

CHARACTER OF THE PEOPLE.

I need say but little on this subject. We have many thousands of Chinamen in America, and they are coming to be pretty well understood. It must be borne in mind, however, that it is the lowest and most ignorant, and the most criminal class who go to America to perform menial labor. The merchants, the statesmen, and the educated remain at home, so the entire people cannot be fairly judged by the class sent under contract to America.

John Chinaman has his vices and his virtues. He is full of superstitious and absurd religious beliefs; but from my standpoint I regard him in some respects as head and shoulders above the other Asiatic nations I have met with. The Chinese nation is perhaps the oldest nation in the world. We know it is one of the oldest. Its government certainly has continued far longer than that of any other nation that exists. It has for thousands of years been foremost in discoveries, art, literature, and works of industry. While other nations and peoples have risen, flourished for a period, and then fallen away and died, China has continued on in her steady course, still the same plodding, industrious, methodical, contemplative people millennium after millennium. While anarchy and change has been the order elsewhere, China has remained firm and unmoved. She has not devastated other countries; she has not destroyed other peoples, but has stayed at home and minded her own business. She has developed one of the finest and greatest countries on the earth. The Chinese empire extends 3,400 miles east and west, 2,000 miles north and south. She has probably to-day more of the coined wealth of the world than any other nation, with the exception, perhaps, of Great Britain.

The Chinese are good mechanics, good laborers, good business men. There is an integrity and reliability about them in trade and commerce scarcely to be found in any other Asiatic nation. They know how to build up a trade and hold it. They show themselves worthy of confidence in the most extensive transactions. They appreciate the nature of a contract, and live by the terms of treaties they enter into. I have talked with many business men with respect to the Chinese character, and find the uniform report to be that they are sharp, enterprising—will get the best of a bargain if they can, will even beat the Jews, and have done so, driving them from Hong Kong and other cities in Asia; but they will do as they agree; their representations can be relied upon; they will not play false when they have given their word. I heard a gentleman say, whose business it is to buy teas largely for a shipping firm, and to examine the quality of the teas, and to see if the various chests are as represented, that he finds their teas just as they represent them, and that it is unnecessary to open more than one chest in a hundred. But with other teas, which it is his business to examine, it is very different. The Japanese in this respect fall far short of the Chinese. Every chest of their tea has to be examined, the quality often falling short of representations, and various dishonest tricks and expedients resorted to which a Chinaman would scorn to be guilty of.

As regards the crime of intemperance among the Chinese, I wish here to repeat the testimony of the intelligent Dr. Kerr, who has lived among them in Canton for thirty years. He says, to the great credit of the Chinese, that in all that time he has not seen more than one intoxicated person in a year. The same testimony is given by the Rev. Mr. Chandler, who has been seven and a half years in China, and in that time has seen but three drunken men. How I wish the same could be true of the people of England and America! I believe it would even be better for them to part with a small portion of their Christianity and imbibe a little paganism, if they could thereby become as temperate as these heathens.

I am not an advocate of vast numbers of the Chinese being sent to California to compete with our laboring classes and force them out of the market. The Chinese coolies have been raised to live more economically and on a less amount of money than any other people in the world, and they are very willing to work for one-third the price necessary to support an American or a European. But I believe it is not claimed that the Chinese are not faithful as laborers, nor that they do not do their work well. It seems un-American to discriminate between nationalities, saying to the people of ninety-nine nations, "You may freely come to our shores," but to the hundreth, "You shall not come." To those who have labor to perform it is a great desideratum to have cheap and reliable labor, the qualities that are prominent with the Chinese; so, while one class is injured by an influx of Chinese, another is benefited.

The charge is made against them that they do not assimilate with our people, and do not become citizens; that they go to America to make money, and then take it with them upon their return to their own country. This is undoubtedly true. The Chinaman loves his own country, and this is hardly a crime. Besides, the laws of his land forbid his leaving his country for permanency. That feature would, however, be changed in time. True, too, the Chinaman carries with him, when he returns to his own country, the money he has worked for; but he leaves his faithful labors behind him to enrich the country at least to the amount of the small wages paid him. We ought not to begrudge him what he has toiled faithfully for, especially when he does it at one-third the price another man would ask. This Chinese problem, however, is a difficult one to solve, and I only hope it may be decided according to the principles of right and justice.

The Chinese have their vices. They are not an anomaly in the world. All nations have them. But one of the most serious crimes charged upon them is infanticide. There is undoubtedly truth in this, though a visit to their country does not make the fact apparent. There seems to be no children missing. The cities and the country are full of them. There are no grown people missing. With the great numbers that have been sent to Peru, Australia, the Cape Colony of Africa, and America, with all who have emigrated to other Asiatic countries, there seems to be a plenty left. The country is swarming with human life of a vigorous, healthy quality. Four hundred millions of people are said to be in the country. It is very clear that there are many children who have not been killed.

But I have no doubt that in the past centuries infants, particularly female infants, have been put to death by their parents, not from want of affection, but because they were unable to support them. This was a gross crime, but they have seen no other course. They did not know how to use preventive means, and resorted to the course they did understand. But this belongs, I hope, to the past. I am informed that the custom has been largely discontinued. If the custom still prevails it is certainly a great crime.

But take this crime in its worst aspect, I am far from sure that the Chinese are any worse than Christians. There is scarcely a Christian nation in the world, particularly Protestant countries, where child-murder is not persistently followed. It makes little difference whether the murder is performed after birth or before, the principle is the same—it is the taking of life. There is probably no country where this is done to the same terrible extent as in America. Christian mothers are killing their unborn children more rapidly in the United States than in any country under the sun. The physicians of the land well understand this, and, I fear, quite too large a proportion of them are lending their help in this direction. It is but a small proportion of American mothers that now raise large families of children. They have heard how to get rid of them, and too many are availing themselves of the knowledge, and greatly to the injury of their own health. This is all wrong. Mothers have the natural and inherent right to govern the size of their families. Poor, destitute parents should not bring into the world three times as many children as they can possibly take care of. Mothers who are debilitated and unable to bear children should not be compelled to do so. But all this could be effected by prevention, and not by infanticide, or child-murder, before or after birth. It is a positive evil for some mothers to bear children. To prevent an evil is not wrong. Prevention, then, is not a crime, but in many instances a positive good; while child-murder, before or after birth, is surely a crime; besides, those committed before birth are attended with most positive injuries to the mother's health. As regards, then, the health of mothers, the Chinese custom of putting daughters to death after birth was less merciless than the custom among American women of taking the lives of their unborn children. There is also this difference: the Chinese women did not put their redundant children out of the way to hide their criminal or improper conduct, but rather to dispose of their offspring, which must otherwise suffer from want and hunger. The same cannot be said of the hundreds of thousands of American Christian mothers who procure the death of their unborn babes.

In point of cleanliness the lower classes of Chinese do not take as high ground as they ought to. Their habits are not all cleanly, and their dwelling-places are not tidily kept. The higher classes are more particular about their surroundings, and their houses are neat and clean. I saw the house of the viceroy of these two provinces, and also the house of the governor of the city, but did not go in them. They stand within a court or large lot walled about. I also saw several of the government buildings, some of them pretty large, but not particularly elegant.

The quarter of the city called Shamien is where Europeans principally reside, and is beautifully situated on the Macao passage of the river, where coasting steamers and gun-boats anchor. It is situated on an island over half a mile in length and a sixth of a mile in width. A canal one hundred feet in width divides it from the western suburbs of the city. The public buildings are the British Consulate, the library and reading room, Concordia Hall, and a Protestant chapel. The site was formerly occupied by two forts, which were surrounded by mud flats, left bare at low tide, but covered with rickety boats and shabby shanties on piles. In 1859–62 it was inclosed by a granite wall and filled in, at a cost of $325,000. The eastern fifth belongs to the French, but is unoccupied. Two bridges connect Shamien with the city.

Chiu-Chau, or the Guild Hall, was erected at an expense of over $20,000, and decorated in the highest style of Chinese art. Over the doors of the grand entrance the wood carving in bas-relief, lacquered and gilt, is very elaborate. In the first court stone pillars, encircled with dragons, support a canopy at the entrance of the shrine of the goddess Tin-hau, or Queen of Heaven. The altar, the image of the goddess, and all the fixtures are rich and showy. In the second court is a platform for theatricals, and accommodation for spectators in the great hall below and rooms above. In the upper hall two gods, Pak-tai and Man-cheung have a shrine. On the east side of the large court, on the river front, is an ancestral hall, in which tablets of the deceased members of the guild are set up.

The vegetable markets are fully supplied with early growths of lettuce, radishes, turnips, cucumbers, squashes, etc.

The arsenal is under the control of the viceroy, and is conducted entirely by Chinese. Breech-loading guns, Gatling guns, steam engines, etc., are made in the establishment, in which from two hundred to four hundred men are employed.

In the evening I visited what are called the Flower Boats, a series of large boats permanently fastened together in two rows, standing end to end, with a space of some thirty feet between them, with a walk on each side, the ends of the boats open, like a store or saloon, the same, of course, being covered in like a house. I saw no quantity of flowers, but the boats were well illuminated; musicians were playing in some of them, and all had the appearance of gayety. A boat is often hired for an evening, and gay parties are given. Women of easy virtue resort there, several of whom, I presume to say, had their faces elaborately painted even to the very eyes, giving them the appearance of blushing deeply. I saw no lewd conduct, and nothing to indicate that they were disreputable characters. I learned there are no theaters in Canton, the authorities having prohibited them on account of some disturbances and disorders which took place at them. These pleasure-boats, when concerts, etc., are held, are visited as a substitute for the theater.

In connection with the character of the Chinese, it may be said that they have strong prejudices against Western people and Western civilization; but though they are a slow-going people they are moving some, and are gradually adopting some of the later and more scientific discoveries and improvements. Though their advances in this direction are slow and careful, they are sure and permanent. What they find to be good, and to stand the test of experience, they will be very sure to hold on to. What they gain they will be very likely to keep, and will hardly have a reaction and go back to the old modes which they are slowly leaving behind.

Of course they are prejudiced against foreigners, and consider their country and themselves superior to other countries and other peoples, whom they regard as infidels and outside barbarians. While Christians believe themselves to be better than other people, the Chinese know themselves to be. In such an old and densely populated country it is to be supposed that no small amount of vice and crime must almost necessarily exist among the various classes. China has its thieves, its robbers, its swindlers, its bigamists and polygamists, its counterfeiters, and murderers in sufficient numbers. But when the vast population of the country is taken into consideration, I believe a lesser number of criminals, a far smaller number of evil-doers are found here than in any Christian country.

JOSEPH COOK AGAIN.

This falsifier and maligner followed me to Canton, taking the next boat after the one I took, so I arrived there in the morning and he in the evening of the same day. I have not the slightest idea that he did this designedly, but it so turned out that we were in Canton at the same time, though we did not meet. He did not put in an appearance at the hotel, but made his way to the missionaries, who were only too glad to entertain him. Of course he was called upon to deliver one of his scientific (?) Christian lectures, which he did in his grandiloquent style. In defining his avocation and position, I am informed that he declared himself not a clergyman, but a "teacher of axiomatic theology," if anybody knows what that means. Had he prenounced himself a peddler of dogmatic absurdities and barefaced falsehoods and slander, we would have understood the meaning of the words quite as well, and the assertion would have contained quite as much truth. He returned to Hong Kong on the next boat after me and I learn than that we are to go on the same boat to Yokohama, though we will not be in the same cabin or saloon.

On my return to Hong Kong the ride down was pleasant. A few Europeans were on board, with two or three hundred Chinamen of the better classes. I became acquainted with Dr. Young, of Hong Kong, where he resided several years, and learned from him many facts relative to the character of the Chinese, and I am pleased to say that he gave them a good general character. He is a Scotchman by birth, and has resided in Canada, and is a man of fine intelligence. He is soon to make a voyage to America, to take in charge twelve hundred Chinese coolies to British North America to aid in building the Northern Pacific Railroad. He thinks he will remain in America.

I found the officers of the steamer Kiu-Kiang very pleasant gentlemen; they are Europeans, and having been running here in these Chinese waters for many years, they are well acquainted with the natives of the country. I learned much from them, and their report was in keeping with the points I have stated. Upon the opium-smoking subject especially, and with reference to the effects of the missionaries, their testimony was entirely to the effect of what I have written. The second officer took me through the large saloon, in which were many Chinese merchants and traders—men in good circumstances—and here I saw no less than twenty smoking opium. I conversed with some while they were smoking, and found them intelligent and communicative. Some said they had smoked for several years, and had not discovered that it had injured them at all. Some said they smoked, as then, when they had nothing to attend to; and when they had business on hand they did not care to smoke. I had half a mind to try one of their small puffs, to see what the effect would be, but fearing it would leave me with a headache, which is the usual effect with beginners, I concluded not to try it.

GOOD-BY TO CHINA.

I should have been glad to have visited Shanghai, and made a trip up the Yang-Tse-Kiang river—the largest in China—but it would have necessitated an expenditure of three or four weeks extra, and as I have already seon a pretty good representation of Chinese life, and as I begin to feel not a little anxiety to get home, I concluded to forego further explorations in the Flowery Kingdom. It has been said, doubtless with much truth, that if one visits any principal Chinese city he sees all, and having taken a good view of Canton, I concluded that must suffice. The facilities for traveling in the interior of China are not good, and the language is so utterly different from all others, that a foreigner labors under great disadvantages in trying to get on among them. After looking more over Hong Kong, I decided it would answer, so far as China is concerned.

The steamer that is to take us to Japan is the Sunda, of the P. & O. line, and, notwithstanding its name, it did not leave till Monday afternoon of April 17th, the cargo, which consisted largely of some two thousand parcels of Chinese sugar, not having been taken aboard until that time. Japan gets its sugar from China; it is taken over in a dark-brown state, and is refined there. It is packed in bales of matting, or piculs, weighing 135 lbs. each, so our cargo is a tolerably sweet one.

But this letter is quite long enough, and I will close here. Yours truly, D. M. B.

Book Notice.

FOR GIRLS: A Special Phisiology, being a supplement of the Study of General Physiology. By Mrs. E. R. Shepherd. Illustrated. Fowler & Wells. Price, $1.00.

This is a most excellent work in the right direction. There is no information of which girls stand more in need than is contained in this little volume. It has been the great mistake of the past to keep from this portion of humanity the very information of this kind which more than all others they most need. In addition to the subject of female physiology the talented authoress ably discourses upon dress, reproduction, motherhood, female diseases, love, passion, marriage, self-abuse, etc. These subjects are ably handled; and parents cannot do better than place this little work in the hands of their daughters.

CONCLUSION OF MR. BENNETT'S REMARKS.

While looking over those 5,500 square miles—hardly one-tenth the size of the state of New York—and two-thirds of that naked, sterile rock—I could not believe that country was ever capable of sustaining six or eight millions of people, or of raising two millions of soldiers or more at a time, to engage in internecine war, one army of which, according to the book of Chronicles (xiii, 17), lost 500,000 killed on one side alone, and in a single battle. Such a story is utterly incompatible with the diminutiveness and miserableness of the country. I furthermore realized the great improbability that that small country, without a seaport, without foreign trade, without manufactures, without gold mines, without any visible source of wealth, emerging from a state of semi-barbarism, and without a settled government, should within the reign of one king be able to accumulate the enormous wealth of one million talents of gold—to say nothing of the other treasures—which Hebrew scholars tell us would be sufficient to build a temple of solid gold of the size of Solomon's. Such a mass of wealth was not accumulated in the same period by any nation in the world up to that time, and I was fully convinced that the claim is devoid of truth. I was convinced, too, that more exaggerations and falsehoods have been told about that miserable piece of real estate than any portion of the earth's surface of twenty times its size.

But, notwithstanding the contracted and worthless character of the country, notwithstanding its lack of ruins and antiquities, it still possesses no little interest, in consequence of our having read so much about it and the wonderful events which are said to have transpired there, since the days of our childhood, when we were Sunday-school scholars. The speaker then narrated the incidents of his visiting a cavern in Nazarath, under a Christian church, where Joseph and Mary were said to have lived, where the Angel Gabriel is said to have visited the little girl Mary and made an appointment for his master, Yahweh, to come and see her and overshadow her; of seeing the carpenter-shop where Joseph and Jesus used to use the hand-saw and jack-plane; also the large oval stone where Jesus and his companions used to eat their picnic dinners when children together. He described the church of the nativity at Bethlehem, where Joseph and Mary resorted to pay their taxes, and where Jesus was born. He saw the exact place where the Virgin lay, where the manger was where the new-born babe was laid; the very spot where the three wise men sat when they called in to worship and make offerings. He also saw the small apartment in the same cave where the Virgin retired to nurse the young god when she and Joseph were about to set out for Egypt when the cruelty of Herod was feared, and when a few drops of milk from her breast falling upon the rock turned it all white, and charged it with such medicinal qualities that to this day a lump of it added to a pint of water is claimed to perform miracles in increasing the flow of milk in the breasts of such women as are deficient in the lacteal fluid; and also aiding those to bear children who hav previously been unable to do so. It is not quite claimed that with the aid of this highly-blessed stone the services of a male are unnecessary, as with the Virgin herself, but the next thing to it, for with the use of the stone and the services of one of the opposite sex, a child is sure to be the result. In view of all this it is not difficult to be appalled at the marvelous power of virgin's milk, and to conclude that if it was a few drops of the milk which caused the rocks of Bethlehem to turn white, a few drops must also hav escaped at Nazareth before she left home, for the rocks in that locality are of the same whitish color, and that a few more drops must also hav fallen while resting in the vicinity of Jerusalem, for the rocks round-about there, and even on the Mount of Olives, are of the same chalky complexion. Yes, great indeed is the miraculous power of virgin's milk.

The speaker also recounted some of the wonderful things he saw in Jerusalem, particularly those in the Church of the Holy Sepulcher, erected over the very place where Jesus was crucified, where the true cross was found, where is the stone on which he was laid to be washed and embalmed, the sepulcher in which his body was placed, together with the stone which the angel rolled away from the mouth of it, and the stone upon which Mary Magdalene stood when Jesus appeared to her at the resurrection. In the lowest portion of these subterannean apartments is the place where Empress Helena is said, after considerable dreaming and blasting, to have found three crosses—two, those on which the two thieves were crucified, and the one on which Jesus was crucified, which was "the true cross," portions of which are shown in in many of the cathedrals and churches of Europe. The skill which St. Helena evinced in determining which was the true cross, or the one on which Jesus was crucified, was very remarkable, the matter being accomplished by taking them one at a time in the presence of a sick woman The first two came near killing the poor sick woman from the distressing effect they had upon her, and these of course were know to be the crosses on which the two thieves were executed, but the third and last cross had a wonderful curative and happifying effect upon the feeble patient, and from this Helena and everybody else knew this last was the one on which Jesus gave up the ghost, after painfully crying out, "Eloi, eloi, lama sabacthani: My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?"

Among the wonders of this holy place is the tomb of old father Adam, but a few feet from the spot where the second Adam was crucified four thousand years later in consequence of an apple which the first Adam ill-advisedly ate. One is constantly struck with admiration and wonder at the great number of marvels clustered in this one holy place. A deep regret, however, lingers from the fact that here at this holy sepulcher, as at Bethlehem, the Infidel soldiers of the prophet Mohammed have to be stationed to prevent the Christians of the Roman church and the Christians of the Greek church from fighting each other. In Bethlehem many years ago the two kinds of Christians named contended so persistently as to which should have precedence in the use of a certain altar, as to come to blows, since which time the Turkish government have felt obliged to keep the devotees of this "religion of love" from fighting each other. It is the same at the church of the Holy Sepulcher where the two kinds of Christians, fought on the occasion of the holy fire descending from heaven—which it does once a year—such a bloody carnage took place that three thousand people were killed upon the spot. That, after all, is but a small number of lives to be taken in the name of this religion of love which has been the cause of the shedding the blood of nearly a hundred millions of the human race.

The pilgrim also spoke of seeing the stones along the way from the Judgment Hall to Mount Calvary, which had been indented, the one by the elbow of Jesus when he fell under the weight of the cross which he was bearing, and another against which he leaned his head to rest at another time when he fell, thus making a large dent in the rock. He marveled why an infinit God should fall so many times under the weight of a cross in the short distance of three squares, especially, as according to the statement of Matthew, Mark, and Luke it was not Jesus who bore the cross, but Simon, the Cyrene. It is only John who speaks of Jesus bearing the cross, and it is only he who tells of his falling under the weight of it, and it is thus according to John that the stones were indented in connection with those falls. If, however, Jesus did fall, and Matthew, Mark, and Luke told the truth about Simon carrying the cross, Jesus must have fallen because Simon bore the cross. If four witnesses in a court of justice of our own time should agree no better than these do on this and other points, their testimony would justly be thrown out and utterly discredited.

The pilgrim also showed how the Christian miracles were thrown into the shade by those of the Mohammedan brand. The Mosque of Omar, which stands where the temple is said to have stood, incloses a large rock fifty or sixty feet long, forty broad, and eight or ten feet deep, from the top of which Mohammed started when he made his celebrated journey to heaven on horseback. When the feet of the horse, Al-Borak, left the rock on that wonderful journey the rock itself undertook to accompany Mohammed and the horse, and absolutely rose some six feet, and would undoubtedly have flown all the way to heaven had not the angel Gabriel, who luckily was standing there, caught the rock in an instant and held it back. So firmly, however, did he grasp it that his fingers sunk into the solid rock, leaving immense indentations therein. Gabriel must have had a tremendous fist, for the print of it in the rock is three times the size of an ordinary man's hand. And the faithful Mussulmans claim that ever since that time that rock, by a continual miracle, has remained suspended in the air. The pilgrim said he went underneath the rock and found a good-sized room there, where Abraham, Samuel, David, and Mohammed used to resort to pray, and the place is pointed out where Abraham, when rising suddenly from his knees, knocked his head against the rock and made a big indentation in it. What a hard head old Abraham must have had, to be sure!

The pilgrim, however, had strong doubts about that big rock being still suspended in the air, for he was very sure it is firmly resting on the solid rock all the way around the room. Still, he said he could believe the Mohammedan miracles just as easily as the Christian miracles, and considered them quite as true and remarkable. He could believe that Gabriel's fingers and Abraham's head indented the large rock in the Mosque of Omar just as easily as he could that the elbow and head of Jesus had made indentations in other rocks, or that the body of the prophet Elijah made an indentation when he lay down to rest on the soft side of a rock when fleeing from the wicked Queen Jezebel, half way between Jerusalem and Bethlehem, which is piously pointed out to this day. Elijah seemed to be able to play heavy and light as he wished, as much as another could blow hot and cold, for when he stopped to rest on that rock he was so heavy as to sink into it eight inches, while on a subsequent occasion his body became so light as to rise up into the upper atmosphere where a feather could not float. Great indeed is the mystery of godliness and godly stories.

The pilgrim remarked that there was much about other countries of which he could talk to those present, but better speakers were present to address them. Thanking them for the honor done him on this occasion, and for the friendship they bore him, he took his seat.

The President then spoke as follows:

Friends: You see that, as a result of the services of these Liberal pilgrims, the people in this land will be enlightened as to the true grossness and superstition which the Christian church is attempting to put upon them. In consequence of the personal observations of these Liberal pilgrims and the dissemination of this information through the Liberal press, the church will not be able in the future to control public opinion in this country as it has in the past. Among those who have contributed largely to spread the truth and uproot superstition is one whom we delight to honor, Horace Seaver, of Boston; and we will ask him to speak to the toast, "The Liberal Press."

Mr. Seaver spoke substantially as follows:

Mr. Chairman and Ladies and Gentlemen: I thank you most sincerely for this kind and cordial greeting you give me, as it assures me that I am among friends and not strangers. I am always glad to meet a company of Liberals, for I regard them as "the chosen people." May their numbers increase, until a genuine liberality shall everywhere be the rule and not the exception, for then we shall have, to the fullest extent, free thought, free speech, a free press, free mails, and the equal rights of men and women. In the maintenance and promotion of this great cause we are all engaged, and let us continue our work in its behalf as long as we live, and never cease our opposition to bigotry, priestcraft, superstition, proscription, and every form of tyranny over the mind of man.

It is now some forty years or more since I had the pleasure of speaking to an audience of New York Liberals. At that time my friend Mendum and myself were young men, just entering upon our work in the Liberal movement. But as I look around this table "I think of more than I behold," for I miss the pleasant faces of the good old friends who encouraged us in our labors—Gilbert Vale of the Beacon, Benjamin Offen, James Thompson and father, John Morrison, Edward J. Webb, John Ditchett, William E. Rose, Oliver White, George H. Evans, John Windte, Oliver Hull, and others. All are gone, and as they were brave and devoted workers in our common cause, let them be gratefully remembered. But two, if I am not mistaken, of those friends of other days now survive. One of these is the venerable Lewis Masquerier, who is yet laboring for humanity and freedom. The other is "the Rose that all were praising" forty years ago for her ability, eloquence, and wit; and though the Atlantic now rolls between her and us, I am sure that you will all agree with me in the hope and wish that the last days of Mrs. Ernestine L. Rose in her English home may her happiest and best.

It is cheering, however, to know that the mantles of our departed friends have fallen upon such able and earnest laborers as Messrs. Wakeman, Bennett, Leland, Putnam, Rawson, Macdonald, Post, Foote, and others with whose names you are familiar; and that notwithstanding our soldiers fall by the way, the ranks close up with the tried and true, and the march is forward. So may it ever be while liberty needs to be defended and religious bigotry opposed; and for our encouragement the prospect of the success of Liberalism at no very distant day is becoming brighter with every year. Formerly we had but one or two papers and no lecturers; now we have ten or a dozen of the first, and many more of the last, and, besides all this, the leading men of the world to day in literature and science are drifting into Liberalism, if they are not there already.

Amongst our best and most efficient helpers is a free and independent press, "the tyrant's foe and the people's friend;" and in maintaining such a press Mr. Bennett has fairly earned the name and fame of a martyr by a year's imprisonment, and we all honor him for his fidelity to his convictions, nor do we consider that he was guilty of any crime. It was a saying of the world-renowned philosopher, David Hume, that "the liberty of the press and the liberty of the people must stand or fall together;" and our friend Bennett, as if impressed with that grand sentiment, seems to have inscribed over his press this glorious motto:

"Here shall the Press the people's rights maintain,
Unawed by influence and unbribed by gain;
Here shall the Press its sacred precepts draw,
Pledged but to Reason, Liberty, and Law."

In conclusion, as the Liberal movement depends for success on a public avowal of its doctrines, and as some of our friends in other parts of the country do not seem as yet to have learned this lesson, perhaps the following toast may not be inappropriate:

"The times that tried men's souls are over, but the times that try the moral daring of men's minds are even now!"

Said Mr. Wakeman:

In answer to the toast Mr. Seaver has proposed there is only one I can think of to call upon, one who has always been in the vanguard of the battle against superstition in this country, who has sat with those whose names our worthy friend Seaver has called as having passed away, but he still remains with us, and I hope he will remain to receive the applause of victory at least, for the dawn is here, enlightenment has penetrated the mists and darkness of the church. Such articles as that of Mr. Beecher's in the last number of the North American Review show that our labors outside of the church are prying up the church into the light of human reason. I call upon our friend Mr. Mendum to respond to the sentiment proposed.

Mr. Mendum responded to this toast in the following happy manner:

Ladies and Gentlemen: It was impossible in my best days, and when I felt the strongest, to be eloquent, or to speak in terms that should inspire you much; to-night I am old, weary, and fatigued, and did not expect to be called upon to respond to any toast. But I will say, in the first place, that I am happy to find our friend Bennett has returned to us in full health and strength, that he is armed for the battle against Christianity and superstition, and that he is determined to wear the armor which shall carry superstition to its tomb and the weapons that shall help to bury it so deep that it will never be resurrected. Let, us every one of us, do the best we can to hold up his arms, help him carry on his paper, and keep it above the fear of failure. Before friend Bennett started THE TRUTH SEEKER, my friend Seaver and myself were engaged in the arduous task of carrying on the Investigator, and we stood for years alone, battling superstition, the venal press, and the pulpit. We look around now and find that most of the secular press are ready to take an advance step for freedom and humanity. This is due to the enlightenment of the rising generation, the men and women who were educated, I am proud to say, from the pens of the Liberals of my own day; and I am proud that the Boston Investigator, with all its faults, has been one of the instruments that has opened the eyes of the people to see the encroachments that have been steadily advancing and infringing upon the rights of the people, until now the press—even the daily press—is in some degree awakened to the cause of the people. My friends, let us for a moment look upon the condition of the people. Here, in this city of New York, where there are so many Liberals, I am bound to say that you are like the people in Boston, the great majority of you Liberals, in your daily intercourse with those on whom you are dependent for support and patronage, do not dare express your sincere convictions upon the religious questions and tendencies of the age. Had it not been so the politicians you sent to Congress would not have enacted your Comstock law, and we would not, in Massachusetts, have elected the men who are tools of Anthony Comstock and who have enacted the law there, which stands to day upon our statute book, by virtue of which any one can go into our houses, stores, and shops and examine what books and papers they may consider to be an infringement of that law. Ladies and gentlemen, or rather, gentlemen, for it is not the ladies that make the laws, and it is not the ladies who elect our senators and representatives; gentlemen, it behooves you, in casting your votes for senators and representatives, to inquire whether, in the first place, they are Liberal men, and, in the next place, whether they are men who dare to stand up for their Liberal sentiments. If they are such men as we have sent to Congress and to our legislatures, we might as well send Catholic priests and monks there. And when we give our wives and daughters the privileges we ask for ourselves, of going to the polls and throwing their ballots for senators, representatives, governors and presidents, I do not think we shall find such encroachments upon our liberties as have been enacted in Congress and in our legislative halls. I believe that our laws should be so liberalized that women may come to the ballot-box, and that whatever men are permitted to do with impunity women may also have the privilege to do; and when that day comes, when we have elevated women, men will also rise superior, but if we crowd women down we must expect inferiority in our own ranks. In conclusion, let me express the hope that I shall have the privilege some day of coming to New York and finding that you have a public place of your own where you can meet together without being subject to the expense of hiring from a Christian landlord a place in which to hold you public meetings.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

THIS is the last issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER before the Watkins great meeting, and let us once more urge all to be there who can. It will be a glorious gathering, and much good speaking will abound. In addition to the other speakers, W. S. Bell will deliver two addresses, one upon Liberty and one upon Christian Morality. To the many friends of Mrs. Amelia H. Colby we hav to say that this able speaker has given encouragement that she will be present. We hope to meet thousands of our friends there.

THE attention of the reader is specially called to the article from Iconoclast on page 526; let no one fail to read it. It givs a true and faithful account of some of the infamous conduct of Judge C. L. Benedict, the Christian bigot, to whom several thousand dollars of the people's money is annually paid for exercising the most abhorrent intolerance and injustice toward men far better than himself. America has produced no judge, so complete a Jefferies as he. May we not hav his like again.

Christian Intolerance.

The Christian bigots and repressors of England, led by Sir Henry Tyler, M. P., are showing the meanness of the religion they advocate by prosecuting, under an obsolete law against blasphemy, Charles Bradlaugh, W. J. Ramsey, and G. W. Foote, as publishers of the Freethinker. A preliminary examination, before the Lord Mayor, has been had, and the parties have been remanded for trial under bail of £100 each. The real object of the trial is to injure the political prospects of Bradlaugh, and to prevent his admission into Parliament, as, by an old law, a conviction for blasphemy debars a person from being eligible to a seat in Parliament. The contemptible nature of the prosecution is easily understood when it is stated that Bradlaugh has no control over and no pecuniary interest in the publication, Foote being the editor and Ramsey the publisher.

In a terse and telling article upon the subject Mrs. Besant uses this language: "One thing is clear. Our organization is a very powerful one, and outside of our organization is a vast mass of friendly opinion. We must strain every nerve now against the common foe. We must no longer, as many of us hav tried to do, trouble ourselves about sparing the feelings of Christians as much as possible. We must leave the constructiv work on which we have been so much engaged, and devote ourselves to the destruction of the vile and persecuting disposition which menaces our leaders with the jail. Christianity has drenched Europe with blood over and over again. It has retarded science, supported tyranny, been the bulwark of political oppression, the enemy of human progress. Every book which has aided humanity has had to fight for its life against Christianity. Ireland and Spain are the most backward and the most unhappy countries in Europe. France, which is shaking off Christianity, is prosperous and free. There are no prosecutions for blasphemy there. The teeth of superstition have been broken and its claws pared away. Here we are less fortunate. Christianity is strong, and it is sapping both the intellectual and moral life of the people. The gross indecencies of the Salvation Army pass unrebuked, while the Queen and the Archbishop of Canterbury smile on the demoralizing movement. All-night services are held, in which young men and young women are shut up from 11:30 P.M. till the following morning, and this scandalous orgie shelters itself under the pretense of religion. We see the Salvationists dancing and yelling in the daylight, and can guess something of the unbridled license of the 'all-night meeting,' to which only 'friends' are admissible. Such is Christianity in England now, and it is this low superstition which is invoking the laws left us by the Dark Ages, in order to stop the heresy which, in the wake of education, is spreading among the people. Those petty imitators of the Christian brutality of the past are doing their worst. 'The devil has come down in great wrath, knowing that his hour is short,' but he will soon be chained up in the bottomless pit of scorn and contempt by the Reason and the Liberty he is trying to destroy."

The Watkins Convention.—Mr. Green's Last Word.

MR. EDITOR: Allow me this last word about the Watkins Convention. If your readers each knew as well as I do what the prospect is for a great convention at Watkins Glen next week, no one one of them would stay away if they could possibly get there. I know of but two Northern states but what will be represented at Watkins, and those are Delaware and California. And I am not sure they will be left out. I predict we will hav fifty from Canada. There will be a large number from Michigan, a goodly number from Wisconsin, Iowa, Illinois, Indiana and Missouri; and Pennsylvania and Ohio will each be represented by a very numerous delegation. I hav just received two or three letters from Kansas informing me of a number of friends who are coming from that state, and we shall hav a strong delegation from Maine and many from Massachusetts, and most of the other New England States will be well represented.

Then remember, friends, what a galaxy of star lecturers, of both sexes, we shall hav on the platform at Watkins Glen. I predict it will be a body of as noble and eloquent persons as ever addressed any one convention in America.

I hardly think I shall ever attempt the work of getting up another great convention, but I want every Liberal in the United States and Canada to help make this second Watkins Convention one that shall for years be remembered as the great Freethought Convention of 1882. No Liberal can afford to stay away who can possibly get there.

RATES OF FARE..

Mr. John M. Abbott, general passenger agent, N. Y., Lake Erie & Western R. R., says: Persons purchasing excursion tickets at Jersey City, Paterson, Newburg Junction, Suspension Bridge, Buffalo, and Dunkirk, should inquire for regular summer excursion tickets to Watkins Glen. At the other points hereafter named they should ask for excursion tickets to Elmira or Corning. From the East these rates will be: From Port Jervis, $7.40; Lackawaxen, $6.50; Binghamton, $2.30; Owego, $1.45; Waverly, 70 cents. From the west there are two prices, the first to Corning, the second to Elmira: Adison, 45 cents, $1.15; Canisteo, $1.45, $2.20; Hornellsville, $1.65, $2.35; Castile, $2.95, $3.65; Warsaw, $3.35, $4.05; Wellsville, $2.65, $3.35; Friendship, $3.30, $4.00; Cuba, $3.65, $4.35; Olean, $4.15, $4.58; Salamanca, $4.85, $5.55; Dayton, $5.85, $6.55; Bath, 80 cents, $1.50; Avoca, $1.10, $1.80; Wayland, $1.80, $2.50; Avon, $3.00, $3.70; Batavia, $4.00, $4.70; Cornwall, $9.50; Conewango, $6.45, $7.05; Bradford, $5.10, $5.80; Custer City, $5.25, $5.95. These tickets will be on sale from Aug. 22d to 27th inclusiv, and will be good for return until Aug. 31st. There is not much difference between the railroad fare from Corning and Elmira to Watkins Glen. Rather better and oftener from Elmira.

Seneca Lake Steamboat Company.—This company has decided not to run an excursion boat on Sunday. It will sell round trip tickets week days for $1.00.

SPEAKERS.—ADDITIONAL SUBJECTS.

Hon. Thaddeus B. Wakeman will speak on "Liberty, Science, and Humanity the Basis of Constructiv Liberalism;" "Is the Bible Divinly Inspired?" by Hon. A. B. Bradford; "Thomas Paine, the Apostle of Liberty," by Hon. John E. Remsburg, of Kansas; "Liberalism in the South," by Hon. John F. Engle, of Scotland Neck, N. C.; "Radicalism the Heart of Reform," will be Charles Bright's subject at the Watkins Convention. "Paine Hall" will be the theme of J. P. Mendum's lecture. A number of the speakers announced hav not as yet named their subjects.

WESTERN FRIENDS.

Those who get tickets to Chautauqua Lake had better come direct to Jamestown, then purchase an ordinary ticket to Salamanca, and at Salamanca get an excursion ticket to either Corning or Elmira as above stated. H. L. GREEN,
Secretary.

To New York City Liberals.

Liberals of New York City desiring to attend the Watkins Convention will inquire at the Erie Depot, Jersey City, for "regular summer excursion tickets to Watkins Glen."

Mrs. A. Stoll, who keeps a pleasant boarding-house near the park where the Freethinkers' Convention is to be held in Watkins, would like some twenty boarders at one dollar per day.

H. L GREEN.

Iowa Convention.

Good news from Tama! Comrade E. S. Beckley writes me the preparations for the approaching camp-meeting and Liberal League convention are going on finely. It will be the largest and best Freethought gathering ever known in Iowa, or the West even. Mrs. H. S. Lake, Dr. Juliet H. Severance, Nettie Pease Fox, M. Farrington, Col. M. E. Billings. G. L. Henderson, Col. D. M. Fox, Mattie E Hull, W. F. Peck, and S. D. Moore are among the speakers, representing all shades of Liberal thought, who will address the light-seekers there assembled.

Let all who can bring camping equipments. The hotels will giv reduced rates, and the friends will accommodate all possible. Remember that the platform will be free to all within the limits of reasonable time. "No mental popery upon this platform" will be the dominant idea there.

By the Constitution of the Iowa Liberal League each local League may be represented by its president and secretary and one additional delegate for each ten or fraction of more than five members. All charter and life members are also delegates. So far the business sessions of the League; otherwise the convention is a mass-meeting, and we want the masses to attend. For further particulars address E. S. Beckley, Tama, Tama county, Iowa, or, Yours fraternally, E. C. WALKER, Sec.

Norway, Iowa.

What is the Matter With Chainey?

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I am one of your subscribers, and hav been for several years. I hav never written anything for The Truth Seeker before, but would like to say a word in reply to an article in your last issue by G. Chainey. Chainey has not only freely criticised Free Religion, but has made Underwood a target in one of his lately published lectures, and openly abused him in first-class style.

The most that Underwood has done has been to point out some of the most glaring faults of the class of lecturers to which Chainey belongs. In my opinion Chainey would do well to take the advice that Underwood has given in a general way, apply it to himself, and see if he cannot improve in the lectures he intends to deliver in the coming year.

I hav taken a great deal of interest in Chainey since he first came to this city, and think he has a splendid opportunity to do a grand work in preaching the gospel of Liberalism. I hav been a subscriber to his publication, This World, from its commencement; hav heard nearly all his lectures. But many of his hearers are tired of hearing him talk about theology, as they gave up all interest in that subject before he was born. Chainey is evidently a young man of talent, but having gone from one extreme to another one, suddenly, he is as intolerant, in my opinion, as he was before he left the church. He seems to hav but one leading idea; and that is to make all his hearers Atheists. When he changes from his usual course it is to giv us some of Walt Whitman's nastiest productions. He is in his glory when he is doing this, and seems to think he is doing a splendid work for humanity.

All this may be well enough in its way, but it is not what the earnest thinkers among the Liberals care for.

We hav had theological bosh long enough from the pulpit.

Underwood has had many years of experience in the ranks of Liberalism, and has done a splendid work. He has lately taken up editorial work, and is making his influence felt in the Index.

Chainey has talked from the Paine Hall platform with perfect freedom, and has said whatever he pleased about Underwood or anybody else.

It would be equally interesting if Underwood would giv us, with the same freedom, his opinion of Chainey.

Both are good men in their respectiv spheres, but Underwood is a close student and has won his way to distinction by continual application to the great problem of the Liberal cause and hard study.

What the Liberals need is science; let theology go. Very few care to hear a man get up Sunday after Sunday and say that he don't believe in a god. Who cares whether he believes in a god or not?

What men want to know is how to liv in this world; how to make life a little sweeter and the better worth living.

If Chainey can do something in this direction he will do a better work than he has done in the past. Agnostic.

Boston, Mass., Aug. 7, 1882.

Reply.—Although our correspondent has failed to comply with the usual courtesy accorded to the press (to giv his real name, if only for the information of the editor), his communication is given a place in these columns. Many editors refuse to publish any anonymous articles; but as "Agnostic" writes with an apparent good motiv, his real name is not insisted upon.

We will not undertake to decide the question as to which is the most in fault in point of recrimination, Underwood or Chainey, as doing so is clearly unnecessary, both being quite able to defend themselvs. It would seem, however, that neither of them should feel it necessary to mark out a course for the other, and neither should be over-fond of criticising the other. While both hav intelligence enough to manage their own line of work it is unnecessary for either to be too much disturbed about the misjudgment of the other.

The teachings of scientists and the truths of nature are unquestionably of the highest value, but it does not therefore follow that the showing up of the falsity of supernaturalism and theology is not also commendable. So long as seventy-five thousand priests are constantly employed in our country in preaching up the infallibility of the Bible as God's word, so long as supernaturalism is preached from every pulpit, so long as the God idea remains the central superstition of all the superstitions among men, so long as over two hundred million dollars are annually expended in this country alone to keep up the delusion, so long will it seem advisable, at least, that the modes of warfare adopted by Voltaire, Diderot, Paine, Volney, Taylor, Ingersoll, Bradlaugh, and others should not be discarded, though such a "student" and "scientist" as the associate editor of the Index recommends it. Both modes of combat will probably be attended with profit several years to come.

It is possibly very wrong for Mr. Chainey to say an unkind word of the associate editor of the Index; but before condign vengeance is wreaked upon the head of the unfortunate Chainey it will be well for the associate editor to recall some of his own exploits in that same line. If he has forgotten these there are those who can refresh his memory. It is still fresh in the mind of the editor of The Truth Seeker how the associate editor of the Index maliciously treated him while in prison, placed there by the common enemy, and upon a most unjust charge and conviction. While The Truth Seeker man was thus in a narrow cell, with the clanking bolts turned upon him no less than ten times every day, the associate editor of the Index conspired with a man by the name of Ellis, of whom the associate editor had previously strongly expressed the opinion that he was "morally corrupt and rotten." This same Ellis, with the co-operation of an unprincipled harlot, had, in the most dishonorable manner, obtained possession of some silly, private letters which The Truth Seeker man had written some years before, and which the accomplices in this dirty business deemed sufficient to utterly ruin both The Truth Seeker and its editor. These the moral vultures seized upon with the voracity of hungry wolves, regarding them a perfect "godsend" to enable them to beat out the brains and dollars of this editor.

After these letters had been examined in secret conclave by the accomplices it was decided to publish them to the world while the writer was still immured in his prison cell. Here was an opportunity where a moderate amount of charity would hav been a grand quality to exercise. Had the associate editor, when he had read over those private letters, possessed any generosity he would hav said, "The old man has evidently been a little indiscreet in writing these letters, but no crime is proposed in them; he has done a good deal of effectiv work; no good can possibly arise from publishing the letters; it is long since they were written; they are probably nearly forgotten; no harm has been done by them, and the less said about them the better, especially while the old man is in prison." But the associate editor had not charity and fairness enough to think and speak thus. He saw what he conceived to be a rare opportunity to ruin the hated Truth Seeker, though it had shown nothing but kindness to him, and had never spoken an unkind word of him; and he embraced it with alacrity. The animus of the associate editor cannot be mistaken when it is remembered, that while visiting Mr. and Mrs. A. B. Brown, of Worcester, Mass., soon after the Greenwood conspiracy, he said to them emphatically, "Bennett must be crushed." He knew that every dollar The Truth Seeker man had in the world was invested in his publishing business, and that if his paper and his business were destroyed he would come out of prison without a dollar for himself or his companion of a third of a century, in their old age. He saw, as he supposed, a chance to ruin them, and he said, "Bennett must be crushed."

The crushing process was soon put in operation. The man utterly and "morally corrupt and rotten" was dispatched to Chicago to serve in the capacity of "agent," or assistant editor of the Religio-Philosophical Journal, not yet purified from the reeking filth and nastiness which had infested it for years. This "rotten man," designed for assistant editor, had assorted garbled extracts of those private letters and sandwiched them with the grossest falsehoods, and interlarded them in large type with such expressions as "libertine," "adulterer," "old Lothario," etc. The associate editor also went West on a lecturing tour, and at the instance of his accomplice, Bundy, he rode in, post haste, some three hundred miles, under the pretense of looking at the letters to see if they were genuin, when that matter had been fully settled at the Greenwood meeting. In this the hypocrisy of the man is clearly evinced. He knew just as well about their genuinness before he came to Chicago as after. Fourteen columns in the Journal were occupied with those letters, interlarded with the "rotten man's" slanders, defamations, and lies. All its regular subscribers were supplied; advanced sheets were sent to the principal papers of the country, and tens of thousands of extra copies of the same slanderous journal were sent all over the country. The same malicious, defaming matter was published in the Index, and ten thousand extra copies more were mailed to all parts of the country, and a list of the names of The Truth Seeker patrons (which list was stolen from The Truth Seeker office in the night when the editor was asleep) was used for the vile purpose.

It was this contemptible kind of warfare waged upon an old man cruelly and unjustly imprisoned by Christians which was denominated by that grand man, James Parton "a warfare of mud," and he advised every one who received the vile papers to burn the same and go at once and obtain five new subscribers to The Truth Seeker. The Boston Investigator, in an article upon the subject, and immediately after the publication of the distorted letters, used this sensible and charitable language:

"Until Mr. Bennett leaves his prison and has a hearing it is only just that he should hav extended to him the charity of silence and a suspension of judgment. We will only add, what must appear obvious to all, that if it is wise and judicious to assail a man's moral character in a public newspaper, the accuser should at least giv his own proper signature, and not hide himself under the mask of a nameless or anonymous correspondent. A brave man never stoops to such conduct, but is willing to rest upon his veracity and to take the responsibility of what he may publish. For our own part, we would as soon think of plunging a knife into the breast of the dead, that we might wreak our vengeance on a corpse, as to cowardly creep behind the battery of a newspaper and attempt to assassinate a man's moral character by stabbing him under the mask of 'a special agent.'"

A private note from Col. R. G. Ingersoll, written soon after the publication of those scandalous letters and head-lines, to the wife of The Truth Seeker man, contained these passages:

"I sympathize with you from the bottom of my heart. I am afraid Mr. Bennett is losing his health and courage. It is a dreadful thing to be in prison, and I do not see how any man endures it. I regret that so many people hav taken advantage of Mr. Bennett's troubles to stab his reputation and to try to ruin his business. I think it will come out all right. . . . When you write Mr. Bennett tell him for me that I hav not, and will not join in the cry against him. I am no Pharisee. If opportunity offers I will do all I can to get a pardon.

"R. G. Ingersoll."

Ah, what a marked difference is apparent between the conduct and attitude of these men just named and that of the editor of the Index and he that is now its associate editor!

It was this contemptible course of the conspirators which induced hundreds of intelligent and fair-minded people to write that they had never known such villainous and despicable conduct as the conspirators were guilty of. If any meaner or more contemptible treatment was ever measured out to a man shut up in a prison-cell and utterly unable to defend himself, or even to know what attacks were being made upon him, it is desirable that the same should be pointed out.

The purpose of the associate editor of the Index to "crush" The Truth Seeker man was further evinced in what the associate editor had to say of The Truth Seeker and its editor to a reporter of the Chicago Inter-Ocean, after the scurrillous letters referred to, by his procuring and co-operation, had been published. In fact, the basis for the malice and falsehood with which the Inter-Ocean has since, and quite recently, pursued and injured the editor of this paper may justly be charged upon the associate editor of the Index. In the interview alluded to, the associate editor, as reported, said that The Truth Seeker was a coarse, obscene sheet; that its patrons were "Freelovers," and the "tag-rag and bobtail" of the Freethinkers of America, while, said he, "the party I represent, on the other hand, and which is entirely distinct from the before-mentioned, are as entirely opposed to the man, on account of his offense against the laws of decency, as are the most conservativ Christians in the country." This student, this representativ of high culture, further denounced The Truth Seeker man as "an aged sinner," "a culprit," and with having made efforts to seduce a virtuous young lady. He furthermore claimed that Col. Ingersoll had been induced to try to obtain a pardon for the old sinner from President Hayes at his, the associate editor's, entreaty; but since the failure, Col. Ingersoll with the best men of the party, had left the culprit "to his fate and on account of his immorality." That these statements were all the grossest falsehoods constant readers of The Truth Seeker do not need to be told. The patrons of this paper are as honorable and high-minded as the patrons of any paper in the country. They are no more "Freelovers," no more the tag-rag and bobtails of society, than the readers of the Index. The associate editor did not induce Col. Ingersoll to use his influence with Hayes. The Liberals of New York sent T. C. Leland to Washington to confer with Ingersoll upon the subject, and he it was who secured the colonel's services, and not the little hypocrit who lied about it. The editor did not try to seduce anybody, and, the woman referred to was neither young nor virtuous. But it is not strange that the Inter-Ocean, believing the man it was interviewing was telling the truth, should hav formed a most unfavorable opinion of The Truth Seeker and its editor.

In connection with this very unfriendly conduct on the part of the associate editor of the Index, he, about this time, wrote letters to the Religio-Journal, the Index and the Investigator, in which The Truth Seeker man was denounced as being "vulgar," "immoral," a "despicable character," a "deliberate, malicious culminator of a virtuous woman," "unfit to represent any decent movement, or to associate with decent men and women;" "tried to corrupt and seduce a virtuous young woman;" "has trailed the banner of Liberalism in the dust;" "the perusal of his letters has left in my mind a feeling of unutterable disgust," etc. The Index also published the enormous falsehood that "the editor of The Truth Seeker had done greater damage to the cause of Liberalism than any other man in America." To make this statement anywhere near the truth it would be necessary to entirely lose sight of the years of constant toil The Truth Seeker man has put in, and the fourteen thousand pages of books and pamphlets he has written within the past eight years, in addition to the editorial and business management of his paper and book publishing.

All this was followed on the part of the associate editor by letters written to near friends of The Truth Seeker man, in which not only the grossest falsehoods were uttered, but the effort was made to injure the old man to the fullest extent. Comments are hardly necessary in reference to such conduct as this, but the remarks of Col. R. G. Ingersoll are to the point: "Meanness cannot descend beyond the level of him who will endeavor to blacken the reputation of another, simply because he could not answer his arguments. I despise, I execrate with every drop of my blood any man or woman who wilfully attempts to destroy the reputation of another."

In reviewing the conduct of the associate editor of high culture, it is scarcely necessary to remark that in addition to all this slander, vituperation, and abuse, he has been guilty of more than a score of positiv falsehoods in reference to The Truth Seeker man. His accomplice, the former editor of the Index, was guilty of nearly a hundred falsehoods with reference to the same hated individual; another of his accomplices he has denounced as "morally rotten;" another is the representativ and successor of the vilest and filthiest den in American journalism; another is a corrupt prostitute; another can easily be proved to be guilty of the vilest sodomy; another who uttered the vilest lies with reference to the abused man, is charged with committing adultery with his hired girl, with the knowledge of his wife. Such are the accomplices and coadjutors of the associate editor of the Index in the attempt to crush The Truth Seeker and its publisher. Such is the modern phase of "cultured Liberalism." of scientific teaching; such is the man now having direct control of the spotless Index.

In connection should be mentioned the vile, scurrilous, and anonymous pamphlets designed to deeply injure The Truth Seeker man, and which hav been sent over the country, to the publishers of papers, to patrons of The Truth Seeker, and to private individuals, with the sole object of causing the deepest injury to the man who had intended to wrong neither the maligning party nor any other person. The circulation of those anonymous pamphlets has been kept up more than two years. When The Truth Seeker man recently reached his nativ shores on the western side of our continent he found the pamphlets had been forwarded to the publisher of every newspaper, as was the case with the principal papers in the cities across the continent. It takes but a cent to send three copies of it, so it is easy to largely disseminate the vile stuff with a limited outlay of cash. In Milwaukee the leading Index man of the town, R. C. Spencer, has busied himself in handing out large numbers of them with the evident object of deeply injuring the returning traveler. It is believed they emanated from the Index-Greenwood crew. To show the manner and purpose of their circulation the following is herewith presented:

Welland, Ont., July 31, 1882.

Mr D. M. Bennett, Dear Sir: To-day I received a tract by mail with a U. S. postage stamp upon it, headed by two roosters and "These be thy Gods. O Israel." I suppose some of D. M. Bennett's left-handed friends had seen a letter of mine in The Truth Seeker of July 15th. and by that means got my address, and thought it a good opportunity to set me right in regard to the character of "the apostle of liberty," as it calls him. No doubt you hav seen the tract. I can assure my left-handed friend that he is barking up the wrong tree. All these scurrilous attacks only show the character, color, and motiv of those resorting to them, and how anxious they are to crush one who so ably advocates the cause so directly opposed to their own.

I am much obliged to the sender, as it helps me to sympathize with the party most abused. John Ray.

If there ever was a shameful, dirty, and contemptible mode of warfare resorted to to ignominiously wrong an injured man the issuing of those anonymous pamphlets is that mode; and it is in keeping with the vile conduct measured out to The Truth Seeker man for the past three years. It is not claimed that the associate editor of the Index has been the only one who has mailed them, but that it is but a part of the program which he helped to inaugurate, and that he has himself mailed a portion of them, there is the strongest proof. The editor of The Truth Seeker has received letters from his patrons of the highest reliability saying they hav received these filthy pamphlets directed in the handwriting of the associate editor of the Index, post-marked at his post-office, Thorndike, and accompanied by a letter from him.

With all the dishonorable and persistent efforts of these accomplices they hav failed to show that The Truth Seeker man committed any crime or was guilty of any wrong save that of indiscretion. They hav not even charged him with having committed adultery. The extent of their basest insinuations is that he wanted to. What a pity that he should be so wholly unlike all his brother-men!

But how is it with the self-righteous associate editor of the Index? Has he been guilty of no impropriety? Has he written no naughty letters? Has he not only not wanted to, but has he not actually done it? There is the strongest proofs upon which to answer these interrogatories in the affirmativ. Several persons hav seen a letter which the associate editor wrote to a lady in Watertown, Wisconsin, proposing that she accompany him as a traveling companion to California and Oregon, prudently suggesting that if the matter was acted upon the fact must be carefully kept from his wife. Inasmuch as this hypocrit was intensely disgusted with the letters of The Truth Seeker man, the latter in return could do no less than be disgusted with the associate editor. Persons of the highest credibility who hav read the letter referred to will make oath to the fact, and it is believed the letter is still in existence. Can it be possible that the man who has been so deeply disturbed by the letters of others should be guilty of writing such naughty letters himself? It seems so. A man who is so deeply disturbed at the letters of others, should naturally hav a little care in writing his own billet-doux.

With all the charges and aspersions made against The Truth Seeker man it is not even insinuated that he has committed adultery, that he has illegitimate children in Toronto, Ont., Mason, Mich., or in any other place. It is not claimed that he ever held unlawful intercourse with Josie Palmer, of Dubuque, with women in California, in Oregon, in Illinois, or other places. With the associate editor it is different. Men sometimes, especially after sitting awhile over the whisky bottle and several times imbibing the exhilirating contents, become inclined to boast of the conquests they hav performed, the good times they hav enjoyed, and they become so communicativ as to confess to adulteries they hav committed. That the associate editor of the Index has done this, as men truthful as liv will testify under oath if necessary, and that particular cases were detailed in the recital. These sworn statements can be brought out if the associate editor calls for them or denies them. There are also other incidents, which may be brought out, showing who is most amenable to the charge of "Freelover," and whose conduct is most productiv of "unutterable disgust." In such event the true character of the man who is held up as the teacher of cultured Freethought, of the censor who assumes to criticise the conduct, motivs, and modes of teaching of others while his own conduct will not bear investigation, will be shown. It may be proved that by appointment he met at night a woman of easy virtue in the office of a certain doctor in Ottumwa, Iowa, with other little episodes in the life of a traveling lecturer.

A man who livs in a glass house should not commence stone-throwing, and a man of repeated adulteries should not too often allow himself to become "unutterably disgusted" with a man whose only offense has been to write silly private letters. A man who gets sick at the stomach at the impurities indulged in by others should hav a slight hesitancy about wallowing in filth himself.

Apropos of private letters, let it be remembered that Justice Story, one of the most eminent jurists of which America can boast, in a noted case in which private letters had been published, gave this opinion:

"The publication of private letters is one of the most odious breaches of private correspondence, of social duty, and of honorable feeling which can well be imagined." This high moral principle the deadly enemies of THE TRUTH SEEKER most evidently did not incorporate into their moral creed when they so eagerly gave his private letters to the common foe and to the world. They were guilty of conduct which no gentleman would stoop to.

Under the circumstances it felt to the sufferer far meaner, far more cruel, far more infamous, than the dastardly conduct of Comstock, Benedict & Co.

Let not the associate editor of the Index and his accomplices and conspirators feel that they are being treated with any severity in this article. They should rather realize that they hav many a time, again and again, needlessly caused the cruel iron to enter the soul of THE TRUTH SEEKER man and his affectionate wife to the extent that death was often desirable. If they hav any sense of justice at all they ought to be willing to hav in a small degree meted out to them what they hav so heartlessly and fiendishly meted out to others. There is in existence such a quality as retributiv justice.

In conclusion let it be said, if the associate Index editor wishes to commence a libel suit, he knows where THE TRUTH SEEKER is published. All that is here said can be proved in any court, and much more besides.—[ED. T. S.]

P. S.—It is to be hoped that "Agnostic," if he has not by this time found out what is the matter with Chainey, has at least acquired some information about his friend Underwood that will not be without interest.

Been to Church.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: After seeing the sights in the big cities of the world, and meeting so many of the grand workers in the grand cause of Liberalism and freedom, I hav wound up by attending the little one-horse Campbellite church here in Snowville—went expecting to hear Mr. Hall, the big gun from Texas, who comes once a year and givs the brethren and sisters here a lift in the way of enthusing the congregation and filling them with holy fire and pious zeal.

But, lo! though the hour had come the man had not, so we only got to see them cannibalize by eating and drinking of their god, and then a portly brother arose and gave his testimony that "Christ had risen," deploring the fact that in spite of "overwhelming evidence" there were so many learned and intelligent people who refused to believe in this wonderfully plain phenomena testified to so strongly by the great St. Paul himself. "Why," said he, "they will believe that a magnet will attract iron, even when they cannot giv us the first reason why it does so, nor can any person giv us the source of this power; but tell them 'The Lord has risen,' and they cannot believe it, though so strongly testified to!" But this "wise reasoner" never told his hearers that the power of the magnet was just as strong now as it was ten thousand years ago, and that anyone could convince himself by actual experiment to-day that it did just what was claimed for it.

But they cannot show one dead man who can be made alive again; no man whose head was cut off, or heart was cut out, or who was really dead, has ever been made to liv anew. They cannot bring an iota of proof that one was ever raised from the dead. They giv us what they call "testimony," culled from an old Jewish book of legends, fables, and irresponsible history that was written no one knows when, where, or by whom, and which contains hundreds of errors and contradictions, and tell us to believe or be damned!

Now, to show the nature of this old Jew book that these Campbellites put such faith in, let us cull a few gems from Hebraic lore, from the holy Talmudistic writings, which are just as sacred and as true as the account of Jonah and the whale, the garden story, or the dead god rising and visiting his disciples again and again, and even letting a doubting Thomas put his hand into the dead wound in his dead side. In the morning I heard the Campbellite myths; in the evening I read the Talmud myths which I append below, and you truth seekers shall read these last also, and then judge if "facts" gathered from such old legendary sources as these are worthy of credence by reasoning, sensible, and thinking men and women:

"According to the Talmud, the patriarchs were much more wonderful people than might be supposed from our uninspired reading of Genesis. The hight of Abraham was as the hight of seventy-four men, and his weight equal to theirs. He ate at each meal more than seventy-four ordinary men could eat; and he built an iron city for his children with walls so high that the sun could not shine into it. Moses was also a remarkably vigorous man; for each of the tables of stone which he carried about so easily were upward of twenty-eight tons in weight!

"But these were pigmies in those days. When we read the Talmud we are in a paleontological period of tradition. 'When I was a grave-digger,' says Abba Shaul in the Niddah of the Talmud, 'I once chased a roe which had entered the shin-bone of a dead man; though I ran three miles after it, I could not overtake it, nor reach the end of the bone. When I returned they told me it was the shin-bone of Og, king of Bashan.' Nevertheless, this fact does not seem so extraordinary when we remember that the soles of the feet of Og, king of Bashan, were forty miles in length, and that at each meal he devoured a thousand oxen, 'and as many of all other sorts of animals,' and drank a thousand measures of wine. It was Og also who desired to throw a stone forty miles wide upon the camp of Israel, and would hav done so had not the Lord sent an army of ants to bore the stone when he was lifting it.

"Og ought, in spite of his alimentativ capacities, to hav been satisfied, however, with a certain Talmudic frog for at least one meal. We are told of this frog in a commentary upon the discussions of certain learned rabbis. In the original Hebrew of Exodus we read that 'the frog' (not the frogs) 'came up and covered the land of Egypt.' Rabbi Elazar held that there was but one frog; but she so multiplied as to fill all the land of Egypt. Rabbi Akiva thought otherwise; he said that there was only one frog, indeed, but that frog was so large that she filled all the land of Egypt. Rabbi Elazar ben Azariah said that this was untrue; that there was indeed at first only one frog, but she croaked so loud that she called all the other frogs in the world into the land of Egypt. So much for the discussion. Rabba, the son of Chanua, said that he himself 'once saw a frog larger than any seen now, although not quite so large as the frog in Egypt. It was about as large as Acra, a village of some sixty houses.'

"Such a frog might hav satisfied the noonday hunger of Og, king of Bashan, in time of famin, but it would not hav made a mouthful for Leviathan, 'who maketh the deep sea to boil as a pot.' For when Leviathan makes the sea boil it does not become still again for seventy years! The snake Jormungund would be only as an eel to such a monster. Another rabbi saw a sea monster whose neck was three miles long, and it had only been born that day!

"After this we can the more readily accept the famous story of Cæsar and the lion. Rabbi Joshua ben Chananja was once at Rome, and the Cæsars (we are not told what Cæsar, any more than in the Gesta Romanorum) said to him: 'This God of yours is compared to a lion'—as it is written in Amos, 'The lion hath roared; who will not fear.' . . . 'Who,' continued the Cæsar, 'cares for a lion. A horseman can kill a lion.' This Assyrian contempt for lions provoked the rabbi to say that the lion spoken of by the Prophet Amos was not an ordinary lion, 'but a lion of the forest of Ilaei.' Cæsar insisted upon seeing that lion, and the rabbi prevailed upon God to grant the emperor's request. Thereupon the lion left his lair and roared; and though it was four hundred miles away, all the walls of Rome tumbled to the ground! Then the lion advanced three hundred miles nearer and roared again, and the teeth dropped out of the heads of men that heard him, and the emperor fell from his throne and shrieked to the rabbi that he would pray God to send the lion away.

"On the authority of Strabo a population of 14,000,000 has been claimed for imperial Rome; but the Rome of rabbinical tradition was a far more wondrous city. The voice of its murmuring was heard over the whole earth; and we hav a legend in the Talmud of three rabbis journeying to it who were almost deafened by its roar even at the distance of two hundred and twenty miles. The lion which shook down the walls of such a city must hav had a mighty voice; yet his voice was even as the cooing of a dove compared to the voice of Judah.

"For when the angel of the Lord interfered to prevent Joseph's brethren from killing him, Judah cried out with such a loud voice that all the walls of Egypt were leveled with the dust, and all the cattle cast to the ground, and Pharaoh was flung from his throne, ... 'and all the men who stood round about Joseph had their heads twisted with their faces to their backs, and so they remained until the day of their death!'

"Some of the rabbis would seem to hav inherited the voice of Judah, or at least a part of it, for there was Rabbi Yehudah who had the stomach-ache for seven years, during which time 'his groans could be heard for three miles.' Nevertheless he was more blest than Korah, who was so rich that it required three hundred white mules to carry the keys of his treasury.

"Everything was in proportion in early ages, however. Every grain of wheat used to be as big as an ostrich-egg, 'as white as snow, as sweet as honey, and as fragrant as musk.' In the time of Enoch they diminished into the size of a goose's egg; in Elijah's time to the size of a hen's egg; finally they became as small as grapes by reason of the sins of men. In the same way the land of Judea has become smaller. After Israel was expatriated the country 'shrank even as the skin of an animal shrinks when its occupant is gone.'

"Sandalphon, the angel of prayer, whom Longfellow has written so exquisitly of, does not figure in the Talmud as a nebulous creature at all—for he towers above all other angels to the hight of 500 years' journey. Is there any such angel, except, indeed, that one whom Mohammed saw, who had 70,000 heads and in each 70,000 tongues wherewith he sang the praises of God? It must not be supposed, however, that the other angels were very small, for the Ladder of Jacob was 8,000 miles wide. The reason it was so wide was to accommodate the angels, for as they were ascending two abreast and descending two abreast space was required for four angels on a step; and the breadth of an angel's body is 2,000 miles.

"And nevertheless when a certain Philemo asked Rabbi Yehudah the Holy, 'If a man hav two heads, on which head ought he to put the phylactery,' the rabbi was displeased, and threatened to anathematize him. Yet hav we not seen two-headed men in these days, although we hav not seen angels?

"But the anathema of a rabbi enters all the 248 members of the body at the same time; and we must not at the present time dilate further upon this matter." ELMINA.

Garrison and Bennett.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: All hearts of Liberals are glad to know that our noble patriot in the great war for liberty, D. M. Bennett, has returned once more to his home and his friends, and to again engage in the hand-to-hand contest with arch enemies of the principles that THE TRUTH SEEKER and its unswerving friends are fearlessly contending for.

A few men in all ages hav been courageous enough to stand firmly by the right, even though prison doors were gaping to receive them; but few hav been compelled to hav the prison doors closed upon them in the pusillanimous and practical manner that D. M. Bennett was treated by that basest of all frauds, Anthony Comstock.

But who has come nobly to the rescue in the case of our noble martyr, D. M. Bennett? Why, of course the Freethinkers, or, as I am proud to be called, from a Christian standpoint, Infidels. And now the time has arrived when THE TRUTH SEEKER commands attention and respect from even the screeching rabble that formerly, en masse, howled for Comstock.

These reflections recall the troublous times a half century ago when William Lloyd Garrison was in Missouri and on duty faithfully for freedom. And what was his compensation? and from whom did he receive it? From the Christian slave-holding ingrates. The noble Garrison was imprisoned for publishing the Genius, an antislavery journal, and upon his release from his imprisonment he commenced a pilgrimage through Puritanic New England; and as an evidence of the great loving kindness that dwells—not in the hearts of Christians, as a rule—and the actions of the few Infidels there in Boston, I giv you a quotation from volume x, "Encyclopedia Britannica," page 77, viz: "He [Garrison] was sure, after his experience at Baltimore, that a movement against slavery resting upon any less radical foundation than this would be inefficacious. He first proposed to establish his paper at Washington, in the midst of slavery; but on returning to New England, and observing the state of public opinion there, he come to the conclusion that little could be done at the South while the non-slaveholding North was lending her influence through political, commercial, religious, and social channels for the sustenance of slavery. He determined, therefore, to publish his paper in Boston; and, having issued his prospectus, set himself to the task of awakening an interest in the subject by means of lectures in some of the principal cities and towns of the North. It was an uphill work. Contempt for the negro and indifference to his wrongs were almost universal. In Boston, then a great cotton mart, he tried in vain to procure a church or vestry for the delivery of his lectures, and thereupon announced in one of the daily journals that if some suitable place was not promptly offered he would speak on the common. A body of Infidels proffered him their small hall, and, no other place being accessible, he accepted it gratefully, and delivered therein three lectures, in which he unfolded his principles and plans. He visited, privately, many citizens of the city, statesmen, divines, and merchants, and besought them to take the lead in a national movement against slavery; but they all, with one consent, made excuse, some of them listening to his plea with manifest impatience. He was disappointed, but not disheartened. His convictions of the righteousness of his cause, of the evils and dangers of slavery, and of the absolute necessity of the contemplated movements, was intensified by opposition, and he resolved to go forward, trusting in God for success.

"On the first of January, 1831, without a dollar of capital save in hand and brain, and without a single subscriber, he and his partner issued the first number of the Liberator, avowing their determination to print it as long as they could subsist on bread and water and their hands obtain employment. Its motto was, 'Our country is the world; our countrymen are mankind.' And the edition in his address to the public uttered the words which hav become memorable as embodying the whole purpose and spirit of his life: 'I am in earnest. I will not equivocate. I will not excuse. I will not retreat a single inch, and I will be heard.'

"Help came, but slowly. For many months Mr. Garrison and his brave partner, Mr. Isaac Knapp, who died long before the end of the conflict, made their bed on the floor of the room—dark, unfurnitured, and mean—in which they printed their paper, and where the mayor of Boston, in compliance with the request of a distinguished magistrate of the South, ferreted them out in an obscure hole, their only visible auxiliary a negro boy. But the paper founded on such inauspicious circumstances exerted a mighty influence, and lived to record not only President Lincoln's 'Proclamation,' but the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution of the United States forever prohibiting slavery."

Now we are passing through another great revolution for the freedom of millions, not only of colored, but of all shades. But as then among the assumed elite of the world, who are to-day more servil slaves to that fearful God portrayed in that old book formerly containing both Old and New Testaments, but since the condemnation of the New by the Committee's labor in London and the issue of the new revision, which they will not adopt, we now only hav the old. Where are our Christians floating to? Let us out with our lifeboats and save them, at least all of them that are worth saving. We want no Comstocks nor Guiteaus. M. O. WAGGONER.

Whose Patronymic?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In a late issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER "Dennis" very properly inquires whether the offspring of marriages where the mother retains her maiden name shall be known by the father's or mother's cognomen.

We might reply to that question as Sir Anthony Absolute in the play answers his son Jack, "Settle that between you, sir; settle that between you!" Husband and wife might arrange that matter satisfactorily, we think, without interference from outside parties; and, considering that the male line has been thus honored for so long a time, it might be well to hav a turn about and perpetuate the mother's side of the house for a few centuries. This would seem to be just, as well as generous, to the mother, as it is upon her devolves all the pain, burden, and risk of child-bearing, as well as the care, rearing, and education of children.

There are honorable instances where children bear the mother's name instead of the father's, and no one suffers thereby. The grandchildren of Horace Greeley, if I am rightly informed, bear the name of Greeley instead of their father's name, as Mr. Greeley left no sons to perpetuate his name! Henry Wilson, the eighteenth vice-president of the United States, made illustrious the name of his mother's family, his father being Colbath, and he being known by that surname till his seventeenth year, when he had his name changed to that of Wilson.

Children born out of wedlock bear the name of the mother, and, by the way, such are the only children that the law recognizes as owned by the mother, and that because the father repudiates and disowns them.

"One of the old school," in the Boston Investigator, thinks nobody would find out that parties were married if the bride should not wear her husband's name.

Oh, yes they would, for there will always be "old school" gossips and Paul Prys enough to spread the news; besides, there is the certificate of marriage, the record in the clerk's office, the publication in the daily papers, and the open acknowledgment of the fact by living together in the same house. Marriage is honorable—true marriage is, and the more marriages the better for society, as Voltaire declared; but I cannot agree with the gentleman of the "old school" that it would be "indelicate" in a wife or "disrespectful" to her husband for her to retain her own name as long as she livs. No man would feel willing to giv up his name and identity and take his wife's name, and why should woman not hav as much respect for herself as man has for himself? Again, suppose a woman has made for herself a name famous around the world; is it right for her upon marriage to lose that name in, say, plain John Smith, whom nobody knows, and who may not care a row of pins for his wife's renown?

The question is suggestiv of much thought, and involves a radical change, and, I believe, a change for the better, inasmuch as it would lift woman to a plane of respect and equality that hitherto she has not occupied. Yours for equal rights,

Fall River, Mass. SUSAN H. WIXON.

Letters from Friends.

MINERSVILLE, UTAH, July 27, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I have just received a specimen copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER for June 10, 1882, from a Free-thinking lady in Minnesota, and find in it a few chapters entitled "A Truth Seeker Around the World," which are so interesting that I cannot refrain from sending you $5 for the whole three volumes. Very respectfully, HENRY CROUSE.

COWICHAN, July 15, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5 for "A Truth Seeker Around the World." I have a dear brother at Niagara Falls who has a large family of the most interesting girls in America, some of them grown up young women, and all of them, I believe, living in the most abject mental slavery. I am doing all I can to emancipate them. Please enter the $5 in the name of my niece; write her name on the book and send to her address, which I inclose, and oblige.

WM. MCKINNON.

P. S.—Mr. Bennett, I hav handed your circulars to some of our friends around here, and I will be disappointed if you do not hear from some of them soon. I am as poor as Lazarus, and cannot do anything myself. Very respectfully yours,

WM. MCKINNON.

SAN FRANCISCO, Aug. 3, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5 for "Around the World," the first volume of which is duly received and read with much pleasure and profit. I regard your work as by far the best five dollars' worth of general geographical and historical information and interesting and instructiv family reading that has yet been published. It is impossible for any one in any other way to get such a good general knowledge of the whole world so easy, so cheaply, and in so short a time as in spirit to take this long but jolly journey with you while sitting by one's own fireside. When one thinks of it, "A Trip Around the World," first-class tickets, good for the whole family and every year as often as you want to take it, only $5, return free and all the comforts of a home thrown in, with the very best of company and perfect immunity from seasickness, bed and board and washing free, with nothing to do but liv and learn, laugh and grow fat and be happy, how can they resist the temptation to take one? Your realistic, conversational style of writing carries the reader along so smoothly with you that after having read your work he feels that he has seen the world and can converse as intelligently about foreign lands and people as if he had traveled, and would be considered well-read and well-informed.

In addition to contributing my mite toward the expense I feel grateful to you for having taken the trip and what you hav written of it. It cannot fail to hav a large sale and do a world of good.

I hope that you are home by this time and well rested; that you are in the enjoyment of your usual good health, and feel good for the next twenty years' service in the cause of Freethought.

Very respectfully yours, R. H. H. HUNT.

WILKES BARRE, PA., July 31, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I hav ventured to contribute this letter to your crowded columns, which contain the interesting materials of Mr. Bennett's labors, with great hesitancy on that account; but as an act of justice to the real Henry Slade, and in the hope of pointing out the criminality of the bogus Charles Slade, who seems to be stealing his mail, as well as endeavoring to play his feats of mediumship by mere tricks, I venture to say that the gentlemen writing from Belleville, Jos. Templeton and his party, hav been imposed upon. I will briefly state what the nature of Dr. Henry Slade's mediumship is by what I witnessed on several occasions at his place in New York. I visited him in 1872, an entire stranger, and this is what occurred: Dr. Slade sat by the side of a table about three feet by four, with his legs on the outside, and not under it, in a room into which the full sunlight was shining, except as protected by a light lace curtain. We placed a cleaned-off slate upon the top of the table, with a small bit of pencil lying between the slate and table. Almost immediately the writing was heard, and while neither of us touched the slate. On taking it up it proved to be a communication from my father, characteristic of my then surroundings, and signed in his usual style. Queries: How did the writing come, and how did Slade find out the name of my deceased father? My wife, upon another occasion, in company, witnessed the same, having a communication from her grandmother, and signed in the same way, the slate not having been touched by either person. How did Dr. Slade find out the name of my wife's grandmother, he never having seen her nor my wife previous to that moment? Now, as to the movements of a slate pencil being snapped upon the table by the bogus Slade, and so fully described in the article referred to from Belleville, it is a mere nothing to what we witnessed, and as to the doctor carrying about a slate upon his feet, etc., it would be child's play compared to what actually did take place.

I am a musical instrument manufacturer, and hav been for eighteen years, and I think I ought to know what an accordeon is. The doctor handed me one to examin, and I did so quite thoroughly. After replacing the slide I handed it back to him, and he held it away from the table and it was played upon. He then handed it to me, and a number of tunes were played upon it while I held it; and, what is still better, the accordeon played any tune which I mentally desired. I then handed it over the table to my wife, and it played several tunes for her. She then requested, mentally, that if that spirit who wrote was her grandmother, to immediately change the tune being played to "Sweet Home," and it was instantly changed to "Sweet Home."

I weigh about 188 pounds, but while sitting at the end of the table the doctor said that my spirit father intended to move me away from the table, and I was moved more than eighteen inches away, and I felt the sensible pressure of a force upon my person as it was being done, just as I felt the pulling of the accordeon and saw the bellows expand and contract while it was playing. I looked down at my chair while being moved back, and no foot of anybody did that moving. Then he said that a large picture hanging upon the wall would be shaken. It was behind me; I turned around to look at it. when it was violently shaken. I got up from my seat and examined the wall and picture closely, but found nothing suspicious. While there a bell was thrown upon the floor under the table. This was taken and used at various points along the edge, from three to six feet away from the doctor. Our clothing was frequently pulled during the sitting, and hands and fingers would pop up around the table while the doctor's both hands were on top in full view. This bell was finally carried out from under the table near my shoulder and deposited plump upon the table before us. The doctor never touched it. It was too heavy to be snapped with the finger. While this was going on, a chair upon the carpeted floor commenced walking toward us; it was at least eight or ten feet away from Dr. Slade. I then inquired whether that chair could walk in any other direction, and in any other manner. Slade said there was no particular way of moving, and, while looking, it was whirled upon one foot, as if taken by the top and spun with one hand upon one leg, and then cast aside. Unless the doctor had some invisible means of controling that chair, he had no agency in its movements; his legs could not hav been attenuated sufficiently to do it.

While sitting there a hand was protruded from beneath the table, and I looked directly at it. This claimed to be a materialized hand. It went directly to my vest pocket and removed my watch, weighing about four ounces, and placed it in my right hand, and then patted me upon my hand with its fingers. I took particular notice of the distance, and I am certain that if that was possible to come from Dr. Slade's body in any way it was from five to six feet long—that was the distance from Slade's shoulder to my vest pocket. One of the doctor's hands rested upon the table and the other upon his lap while this was done. There is one little circumstance connected therewith, however, that is peculiar; the hand into which the watch had been placed had been injured, and there was a slight swelling between the fingers, not sufficient, however, to attract notice, but it was painful. After I replaced my watch I put this hand under the table, and, looking the doctor in the face, said, "I would like the spirit to shake hands." I then purposely placed my hand upon my right knee, farthest away from the doctor. Almost instantly I was taken by the hand, and a vigorous hand-shake was given. Then I attempted to grasp the hand pretty tight, when it seemed to melt away. It came again, and with what seemed to be a thumb on the one side and a finger upon the other side, immediately over the painful part of my hand. It made movements toward the ends of the fingers, as though it were connected with an intelligence that recognized my injured hand and wished to heal it by making these passes. I am quite certain I had given the doctor no intimation of any soreness of my hand. If this was a mere trick, how did it happen that the exact spot should be selected to manipulate it? The passes produced intense pain each time they were made.

I hav been singularly fortunate in my examinations of these matters for some thirty years, and hav discovered some of the most glaring trickery and fraud which is being palmed off upon people as Spiritualism, but aside from all this I hav had sufficient evidence to convince me of intelligent forces akin to humanity in their nature, and if not the forces and intelligence of our departed friends, they act, and think, and know just about what we should expect from them. And until some others offer a better substitute every rational mind will accept them. I think there may be antagonistic forces on the other side who are disposed to mislead us, and who may be helping this Charles Slade to steal the doctor's correspondence and imitate him in his feats. And it may be possible that even the genuin Dr. Slade may, if not watchful of himself, be captured by evil-disposed intelligences and used to dumbfound us in this latest revelation.

The article from the Intelligencer manifests a good deal of assumption. Its exposures and statements are mostly conjectures. As to Slade placing a slate "flat upon the bottom of his foot and passing it around," it implies a wonderful trick. There is no man living can do it and sit upon a chair, for even if he could so draw up his toes as to expose the bottom of his foot and place the slate thereon, the moment he attempted to stretch his leg out to the opposit side or end of the table it would fall off, and, if not, he would be exposing his heel to the sitter and not the slate. That explanation is "too thin," if you please.

When Dr. Slade passed a slate to me, and I held it in my hand for writing, and the doctor withdrew his hand, I pulled against a force of at least ten to twenty pounds in an effort to draw the slate from under the table to my side; and if he had simply placed it upon the bottom of his slipper it could not hav required such a force; and, further, when such a list of physical manifestations as hav occurred in the presence of such minds as Zollner and other scientific persons, as described, the genuin Dr. Slade has no need of resorting to any fraud or tricks to astonish his sitters, or to "carry his slates on the bottom of his slippers."

The description of the manifestations which took place in bed with Slade are a mass of conjectures, and expose nothing more than the writer's suspicions; and his disgusting reference to this person's deformity and lusts may be the vilest of slanders, the writer of which did not attach his own name to his appeal to the press of the country to expose his bedfellow's bad habits, a party to which he thereby admits himself to hav been.

Taking the article from end to end, with its doubts and mere conjectures, it does not expose anything after all is said and done, and, from its ending, may hav been a method used to fleece a poor medium out of his $150 engagement.

I should want much better evidence of fraud than the article or the letter of Joseph Templeton from what I can understand of the recital.

Yours truly, J. R. PERRY.

NEW YORK, N. Y., Aug. 8, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been reading last week's TRUTH SEEKER. Your account of Chinese myths makes them appear to be the nearest to the Druidism of Britain of any of the other religions. Hu or Hea also is the founder of the first dynasty with the Chinese, as he is with the Celts. How is it that countries so far apart, and religions of so many different eras, should invariably crystallize in the father, virgin, and son form, and hav the numbers 3, 4, 7, 10, 12? Is it coincidence, or are these ideas the fragments of an universal philosophy, handed down from the ruins of a prehistoric world? I lately visited Europe, and I noticed that the Christian journals were complaining sadly that the notorious Infidel, D. M. Bennett, had been disturbing the nativ mind in India and trying to overthrow the life-long labors of the missionaries. The Christian Herald, I think that is the name of the paper, stated also that the Rev. Joseph Cook, of Boston, had taken the lecture platform out there and had successfully refuted the specious and flimsy arguments of D. M. Bennett.

Is this true, Bro. Bennett? did the Rev. Joe Cook giv you such a back fall as they claim, or do they exaggerate a little? Christian newspapers, you know, often tell lies! I would like to hear your reply.

Yours truly, JOHN H. DAVIS.

[As the gist of what Cook and myself had to say was given in my letters from Bombay, I will let my readers decide which had the best of it. I will only remark that the Bombay Daily Gazette took Cook to task for his loose and imprudent remarks and admitted that Cook's visit to India had been productiv of no good to the Christian cause. I may further observe that our friends in India were satisfied that we had the best of the argument.—D. M. B.]

LOCUST VALLEY, Aug. 5, 1882.

D. M. BENNETT, ESQ., Esteemed Friend and Instructiv Traveler: I sincerely congratulate you on your safe arrival from that "Round-the-World" journey, to a happy re-union with your family, dear friends, and country. That pleasure will be largely increased by knowing that your friends) and those who choose to avail themselvs of your highly intelligent observations, expressed in three large volumes of unprecedented industry, in voluminous and searching scrutiny of places, history, traditions, and forged myths, will be cherished by all as suited to candid and intelligent minds.

Those volumes are replete with interesting and verv valuable knowledge, particularly in lucid descriptions of places visited, and their renowned objects, especially their antiquities, to which you gave large attention; with THE TRUTH SEEKER'S honest exposure, by a unique method, of the myths, fables, and untruthful traditions in manufactured frauds upon credulity (called sacred history by fanatics), in Bible and other mythological lands.

No former traveler has so fully probed and illustrated such absurdities, by scrutinizing unanswerable arguments, which must culminate in their complete overthrow. Such candor and completeness is not to be found in any other books of travel, and thus you hav conferred a debt of gratitude upon all lovers of truth, for all time, as the champion of nature's dignity in discarding all superstitions and supernaturalisms from her domain. I wish you had treated Occultism with the same deserved contempt.

Your three large volumes, neatly got up, are too much return to your "Round-the-World" $5 subscribers to leave much toward your expenses of travel. So with inclosed $8, please take $3 to renew my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER for nother year, from July 9, 1882, and the balance to add to my previous $5 interest in your expensiv journey and lucid observations and lectures Round the World. My regards to your efficient aid, Mr. Macdonald. Your fraternal seeker after truth,

CHAS. E. TOWNSEND.

SNOWVILLE, VA, Aug. 1, 1882

MR. EDITOR: I was so glad to hear thee was safe back at home, and that thy wife and Eugene had done so splendidly, and thy trip had been so satisfactory, and thy home-coming was so delightfully appreciated by all, but the little cloud that cast its shadow over these gladnesses was the news that many were in arrears for the paper; I somehow fancied that all would be sure to square up, plump and full, their accounts, so as to hav thy home-coming prove as restful and as clear from anxiety as possible. I know I sent my last dollar so as to be sure and send enough, as I did not know what my book bill was, and to my agreeable surprise, I find in my eagerness to do the best I could, I hav overpaid, so thee may send the balance in "Godly Women," as I am determined to do all I can to hav this truly excellent book placed in the hands of every one I can persuade to buy it. Every woman, especially, should read it. Friends of our paper, you hav sent our Bennett Round the World and now I hope you will every one do a little to make him happy at home. Pay what you owe and buy some good books, and it would be real nice if we could send 35 cents for postage on the big Round-the-World books.

SALAMANCA, N. Y., Aug. 1, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: A Watkins correspondent of the Elmira Advertiser thus describes the state of things at Watkins. I send it that the speakers may know how to take them. It seems these Presbyterians don't love each other just now. But I think when they hear that their friend Bennett is coming with a thousand more with him they will cease their family quarrel and fall into line under Captain Waldo and prepare to defend their brimstone citadel as best they can. Here is what the pious correspondent says. The reader will notice this bold writer first attempts to quiet his nerves and those of his pious readers by saying: "No great excitement here over the prospectiv coming of Freethinkers." Do not be alarmed, friends. We are not going to Watkins to "arrest," only to enlighten you and divest you of your Presbyterian superstition.

"There is no great excitement here over the prospectiv convention of Freethinkers. Some new names are occasionally announced for speakers, but the experience of past times shows that you can't tell who will be there until the day appointed. It is given out that President White and other Cornell university officials will take part in the proceedings, which may be, but more likely not, it not being clear what the University is to gain by that adventure. . . . The Presbyterian church, it is presumed, will hav its share of criticism in its present divided state, and probably deserves it. It was a gaining, however, by the doings of the last convention in Watkins, and a first-rate notice by the Freethinkers may bring a second benefit. While the convention is hot, let the convention hammer away, it may weld the parts together."

Surely the Rev. Waldo is in a bad condition to meet President White and the whole Cornell crew with his forces so divided. Brother Bennett, you must take pity on him and protect him. H. L. G.

WEST MERIDEN, CONN, Aug. 14, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I, as well as H. S. Johnson, Sioux Falls, Dak. Ter., read notices in THE TRUTH SEEKER three or four times that it would be five volumes instead of three of the "Journey Around the World," and I see by your answer that it will all be included in four volumes, and as I would not like to lose anything pertaining to your journey, please tell me how much the fourth volume will cost—leather bound.

I am greatly rejoiced at your success in your journey around the world and safe return to your friends, and particularly the reception your friends hav given you, as you are worthy of all you hav received for your sacrifices.

Mr. Bennett, I agree with Mr. T. Winter, of Cincinnati, that if you were to start on a journey around the American continent, as you did around the world, you would be the means of accomplishing much good for the cause and for yourself. First, you would be the means of arousing stagnant Leagues—like ours in Meriden—to life. Second, you would get more subscribers than anybody else. Third, you would sell more books. Fourth, you could deliver lectures and write a history of America. I would be glad to subscribe for it. It would be very pleasant, as you could take Mrs. Bennett with you. I remain Yours most respectfully,

JOSEPH FRANKOWSKI.

[Though the foregoing was not intended for publication we will venture to print it and add a few words of reply. We did at one time think it would require five volumes to contain all our letters from foreign countries, but now find that four volumes will hold them. The first three volumes will be furnished for the $5, as agreed, the fourth volume will be $1.50 in addition. As we hav given three full volumes of nearly nine hundred pages each, well illustrated, we hope none will feel that they hav not had their money's worth. We hav furnished for the five dollars fully twice as much as was originally intended. Probably few will wish to be without the closing volume, especially as the price is made very low. The four volumes in cloth are $6.50; 75 cents per volume addition for leather binding and red edges; and $1 per volume additional for morocco binding, with gilt edges. Our friend has somewhat anticipated our intention of traveling over our own country giving lectures and writing up some account of the same in our style. It would seem one or two volumes could easily be furnished descriptiv of American towns, American country, and American Liberals. Those who are disposed to subscribe $1.50 per volume for such a work are requested to indicate it.—ED. T. S.]

CORN PLANTER, PA., Aug. 8, 282.

MR. EDITOR: Your two favors, one written on the ocean between Hong Kong and Yokohama, dated April 23, 1882, and the other on the steamer Oceanic, one hundred miles west of San Francisco, dated May 29, 1882, were duly received, with the accompanying flowers, ferns, etc., requested by Mrs. Morrison, and we jointly tender our thanks for your remembering us when cumbered with so many other cares and employments.

It is, perhaps, rather late to make the amende honorable. Sickness and other pressing engagements hav prevented me from doing many things ere this I had fully intended to do.

And another thing. The Mississippi of incense that has been rolling upon you lately render my little rivulet of praise of very slight moment.

As to your travels, too high praise cannot be awarded them. I hav been a great reader of travels from Herodotus and Marco Polo down to Bayard Taylor, and I consider yours equal, if not superior, to any of them. This is outside of their religious photography—this feature is totally incomparable—vivid, new, true, and so original as to be an entirely fresh departure in the domain of literature. These travels, if widely disseminated, would of themselvs topple over in a few years the whole structure of Christianity. It is impossible for any person of common understanding to read these truthful thrusts at the Christian system and further believe in its divine origin.

It is a matter of gratification that you encountered Blatherskite Cook and was able to worst him on the very spot where he had fled for safety. Hit him every time you can. He is worth striking at; and it is some honor to roll him in the gutter. Your last thrust at him on the marriage question is too "good for anything." Hit him again and again. He is the most dangerous man the fetich of Christianity has raised up in these latter days. His hodge-podge of scientific scum and foam is jumbled together in a way to befog and darken the common mind; and he is dishonest and untruthful to a marked degree and wants to be exposed at every turn. Don't lose sight of him as you sit in your editorial chair.

I hav some intention of attending the Watkin's Glen meeting; if so, I may see you there.

I hope your good health may hold out for years to come, as it probably will do, since it stood the constant strain of a year's travel in different climes and under so many different conditions of food and temperature.

I hope to do more for THE TRUTH SEEKER in the year to come than I hav in the year that has passed, health and fortune pemitting. In conclusion, I remain as ever, Yours fraternally, B. G. MORRISON.

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J., August 4, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: In looking at my tab upon wrapper of TRUTH SEEKER, received to-day, I find I am one of the delinquents in paying my subscription. Inclosed find three dollars for one year's tribute to you and Uncle Sam for twelve months to come. Also inclosed find two dollars for one seat at the Bennett banquet at Watkins. I wish you would present the chair to some worthy Agnostic, as my local duties will not admit of my absence even for a day. I would gladly giv ten times the cost to be a silent witness at the Convention, but when duty calls we must obey, and it will be impossible.

I am well pleased that you hav returned home in good health and spirits, and trust that nature will be kind enough to spare you for many years yet of brilliant labor and usefulness. Your paper is the most welcome of the many literary guests I receive, and your counterfeit, as well as Col. Ingersoll's, greets me every morning as I arise, for they decorate my bedroom walls. Paine has the post of honor—over my mantel, and the trio are worthy of my wife's punning, as she dubs them my "three graces." As I do not take much stock in the "grace of God," which "passeth all understanding," perhaps there is more truth than poetry in her title.

Another duty. Inclosed find one dollar for Bro. Green. I had almost forgotten him and his Herculean labors. He wants one dollar from each Liberal to help defray Convention expenses.

I desire now to call your attention to the fact that whenever money is wanted for any necessary object in our cause let me know and I will do my level best. Yours truly, HORACE L. FAIRCHILD, M.D.

BALD MOUNTAIN, COL., July 10, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I find my subscription has expired, and as I am interested in THE TRUTH SEEKER I am anxious to try it another four months, so I send you inclosed one dollar to keep it going. I am very much interested in the way the paper keeps up its battle against old fogy notions. I was very sorry we did not know that Bennett was in Central City until he had left. We would like to hav taken him by the hand at any rate. This is a region of Methodists, and it is mighty easy for them to believe that Jonah swallowed the whale, etc. I think by the time my subscription runs out this time I can get several subscribers for the paper, some friends having promised to take it.

We hav a good chance to giv old orthodoxy a whack among the ignorant Methodists here, for they all say that Infidelity is good to liv by, but bad to die by. What consistency! Hoping that Mr. Bennett will come home safe and sound, I remain, Yours truly, W. V. ROWLEY.

CANON CITY, COL., July 7, 282, E. S.

MR. EDITOR: I see that Mrs. Hutchison, of Bishop Creek, C l., proposes to date 282, E. M. (era of man). I propose E. S. (era of science) Man had long been on the earth. Science, in an important sense, was born 282 years ago. This shows that the church, and all its days of power, did not foster or promote science, notwithstanding its claims of being the mother of civilization. A. B. PIKARD.

WAVERLY, IOWA, July 10, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: The hero, D. M. Bennett, spoke before the Northern Liberal League of Iowa. yesterday, Sunday, the 9th. Speaks to-night in the Opera House. We expect a good time. He leaves here to-morrow. I hope the hero of Freethought may liv many more years to do battle for liberty. Yours truly,

W. P. MCCORMACK, Vice-Pres. L. L.

CLEAR LAKE, DAKOTA, July 28, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Please send me the "Truth Seeker Collection of Forms, Hymns, and Recitations," as one of our friends is about to die and he does not want to be buried by the clergy; he may be dead at this writing. I visited him a week ago last Sunday. I never saw a man so calm and resigned, he knows he must die soon; he told me it would be the happiest moment of his life, and I know he told me the truth. He dies as he has lived, true to the principles of Freethought. He is a poor man and leaves a family of children who are all small. It does me good to see a man hold out to the last; bold and fearless he meets the endlesss sleep of rest. He has no fear of hell, nor expectation of heaven. I will send you notice when he dies. His name is Kearney. I did not learn his initials. Yours, P. J. UMBRITE.

FARLEY, IOWA, Aug. 6, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I saw by one of the Dubuque papers that you would be in that city on a certain day, so I got on a train and went in to see you, but I missed you, although I boarded and walked through the train upon which you left. I was talking with D. R. Burt in two minutes after you had gone. I felt very sorry, as I wanted to get one grasp at your hand. I hav just received the second volume of your travels, and am more than pleased with the work. Your plain, simple, and easy manner of describing the various countries, peoples, their industries, habits, dress, social, political, religious, and other relations discounts anything that I hav ever before read. Every one who wishes to get the truth concerning these old countries, and get it set forth in a plain, comprehensiv manner, should at once send $5 for the three volumes. Let me congratulate you on your safe arrival in your nativ land, at your home, and among your countless thousands of admiring friends, and again upon the masterly manner in which you hav written the description of your travels.

Ever yours truly, H. GILMORE.

CHARLEVOIX, MICH., July 29, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: The Christians, one and all, owe you a spite, and I owe you $3. For the first you will hav to depend on answer to prayer, but for the latter I inclose a post-office order, for which giv credit and send along THE TRUTH SEEKER, and oblige,

Yours, ROBERT MILLER.

EATON RAPIDS, MICH., Aug. 7, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3 for THE TRUTH SEEKER one year. I think I can hardly keep house without it. Liberalism is on the increase in this vicinity. You will probably get new subscribers from this place soon. Please send me Paine's "Common Sense." Yours truly, E. COWLES.

GENEVA, N. Y., Aug. 6, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I am glad to hear you hav returned well. I think everybody is well pleased with what you hav told us. I do not see how you hav got so much through your brain. Please send me about forty copies of this week's issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

WM. SMITH.

The Lange Outrage.

From the Iconoclast.

The case of the United States against D. M. Bennett is by no means the only case in which Judge Benedict's extraordinary conduct has brought him into despicable notoriety.

On the 22d of October, 1873, Mr. Edward Lange was convicted of stealing mail bags, after a trial before Judge Benedict, which was attended with circumstances of peculiar atrocity. This trial and its results were very remarkable, and excited at the time a great deal of interest and indignation, not only on account of the trivial character of the pretended offense and the outrageous punishment inflicted therefor, but on account of the entire freedom from moral restraint as well as from judicial responsibility exhibited by Judge Benedict in his conduct throughout.

The story of this trial is narrated in the reports and in the Albany Law Journal, to which paper we are indebted for our knowledge of the facts. Mr. Lange had long been a respected citizen of New York, and was a gentleman of high character and large wealth and credit, and partner in the publishing house of Lange, Little & Co. It appears that several years before the trial, Messrs. Lange, Little & Co. removed from premises in Pearl street to more spacious buildings in Wooster street, leaving behind a mass of rubbish which the owner of the Pearl street building requested Mr. Lange to remove, and which Mr. Lange, in an accommodating spirit, ordered to be taken to the loft of his stable adjoining his residence. Among this rubbish were several old, worthless, jute mail bags, which had been received under the then prevailing provisions of our kaleidoscopic postal regulations by Messrs. Lange, Little & Co. from the post-office to facilitate the mailing of certain publications issued by them, and which bags had been thrown aside as unfit for use. A contumacious coachman whom Mr. Lange had discharged revenged himself by giving information to the United States authorities that Mr. Lange had these mail bags in his possession, and the district attorney's office, then under the management of Mr. George Bliss (better known as Decoy Bliss) seized upon the case with avidity, and the result was an indictment charging Mr. Lange with stealing, purloining, embezzling, and appropriating to his own use certain mail bags belonging to the post-office department.

On the trial the district attorney attempted to show that this offense of Mr. Lange had been going on for years, although the statute under which he was convicted was not passed until about fifteen months before the indictment was found. Concerning this, Mr. (now Judge) Arnoux of counsel for Mr. Lange, in a letter to the Albany Law Journal, published March 14, 1874, says: "The statute under which Mr. Lange was indicted was passed in June, 1872; the acts for which he was indicted were alleged to hav been committed December, 1872, and January, 1873. Crimes outlaw in three years, notwithstanding which the court, under our exception, permitted the prosecution for the purpose of creating an atmosphere of guilt to giv evidence tending to show that the appropriation had been going on for years and had continued to a very recent time, in fact, that he had been in the habit for six years of taking every Saturday from his place of business to his residence from ten to fifteen of these bags, making, at the rate of fifteen a week, upward of four thousand bags! almost exclusivly white duck bags, the jute being exceptional, none of which had Mr. Lange ever disposed of. Out of this enormous quantity the total number of mail bags found was twenty-two, and not one duck bag. The coachman accounted for the balance by saying that he had buried two wheelbarrow loads, and had, four months before his discharge (January, 1873), thrown thirty in the manure heap, with which, two months after, he had fertilized the cabbages! The jury acquitted Mr. Lange on ten counts of the indictment, and found the total value of all the bags taken by Mr. Lange to be less than twenty-five dollars. This was a clear conviction of the coachman of perjury, but, doubtless owing to the extreme pressure of business, the district attorney has not yet found time to hav him indicted."

The defendant showed that he had not been benefited by the possession of the bags. He showed an entire absence of intent to steal them and of motiv for stealing them. He proved that part of the bags were put in public sight, and that there had been no guilty concealment, and that his coachman threatened him three days before his arrest, and that he did not remove one single bag or attempt to blind the officers, and in fact showed an entire course of conduct which any fair and honest man would unhesitatingly say was inconsistent and incompatible with guilt. The trial was attended with the usual incidents which characterize a trial before Benedict, and the victim was, of course, convicted.

The punishment provided by the statute for this offense is imprisonment for not more than one year, or a fine of not less than ten nor more than two hundred dollars. It would seem that this was a case in which a judge having no malicious or vindictiv feelings to gratify, and no ulterior motiv to serve, would inflict upon the unintentional offender the lightest punishment prescribed by law; but, on November 3, 1873, Judge Benedict sentenced Mr. Lange, under that conviction, to one year's imprisonment and a fine of two hundred dollars.

Mr. Lange was committed to jail, and his fine was paid the next day. On the 5th of November Judge Blatchford granted a writ of habeas corpus returnable on the 8th before Judge Benedict, who dismissed the writ without permitting and even refusing counsel for the prisoner to be heard, vacated the sentence, and resentenced the defendant to one year's imprisonment from the 8th of November, without regard to the fine already paid and the five days' imprisonment already suffered.

The proceedings had before Benedict at this time were very remarkable. We quote from the report of them in the Albany Law Journal:

"At the conclusion of the remarks of Mr. Lange's counsel, the district attorney rose to reply, but was interrupted by the court.

"The Court.—I do not care to hear any more extended remarks, because my attention has been called to the matter and I understand it fully.

"The district attorney then suggested to the court that the prisoner being found guilty upon the indictment, and the general verdict having been recorded of guilty, he did not see how the court could go back of the record, to which the court responded that he did not see how he could go back of the record; and then, in effect, declaring that the prisoner had come off as luckily as he deserved or could expect, proceeded to vacate the sentence and resentence the prisoner to one year's imprisonment.

"Mr. Arnoux (counsel for the prisoner).—With respect to that, before your honor passes sentence——

"The Court.—I pass sentence, and if that is not right, you can bring it up hereafter—perhaps in some other motion—but the record will now be that he is sentenced to one year's imprisonment.

"Mr. Arnoux.—I wanted to show that it is not in your honor's power to make that sentence. I will make my remarks as brief as possible.

"The Court.—I do not hesitate at all. I hav examined the question, and I do not hesitate to inflict that sentence, and that is the sentence of the court. If there is any way in which that can be shown to be erroneous, I will hear the argument on some other motion.

"Mr. Arnoux then moved the correction of the record by inserting the special finding of the jury so it might not appear on review that the sentence was on more than one transaction.

"The Court.—No; I shall direct the verdict, guilty of stealing mail bags of the value of twenty-five dollars.

"Mr. Arnoux.—In passing sentence originally, that your honor intended to pass sentence for one transaction.

"The Court.—No.

"Some further debate ensued, when Mr. Andrews, associate counsel for the prisoner, reminded his honor that when the sealed verdict was handed to his honor, he handed it to Mr. Andrews, saying, 'I will put this under any count you please,' and that Mr. Andrews then asking if it would make any difference in the punishment, his honor replied, 'No.'

"The Court.—I recollect it exactly as the counsel says. I do not care to listen any further. The verdict is guilty, and the sentence of the court is that he be imprisoned for one year.

"The court then immediately called up other business."

Thus the refusal to hear counsel on the return of habeas corpus was made to hav the same effect that a denial of the writ in the first instance would hav had. The readers of the Iconoclast will now not be at a loss to understand how it was that the exertions of able counsel went for nothing in Mr. Bennett's case.

Another writ of habeas corpus, returnable before the circuit court, was subsequently obtained and heard by the three judges in New York, but this writ was vacated and the defendant remanded to prison.

The Supreme Court of the United States was then petitioned for writs of habeas corpus and certiorari, and upon the return of those writs that tribunal reversed the action of the inferior courts and discharged the defendant, rebuking the conduct of Benedict in this language, "There is no more sacred duty of a court than in a case properly before it to maintain unimpaired those securities for the personal rights of the individual which hav received for ages the sanction of the jurist and statesman." Mr. Justice Miller, who writes the opinion of the United States Supreme Court, also says: "The law imposes imprisonment not exceeding one year, or a fine not exceeding two hundred dollars. The court, through inadvertancy, imposed both punishments, when it could rightfully impose but one. After the fine was paid and passed into the treasury, and the petitioner had suffered five days of his one year's imprisonment, the court changed its judgment by sentencing him to one year's imprisonment from that time. If this latter sentence is enforced it follows that the prisoner, in the end, pays his two hundred dollars fine and is imprisoned one year and five days, being all that the first judgment imposed upon him and five days in addition. And this is done because the first judgment is confessedly in excess of the authority of the court." He also says, "If there is anything settled in the jurisprudence of England and America it is that no man can be twice lawfully punished for the same offense, and there has never been any doubt that this rule affords entire and complete protection of the party when a second punishment is proposed to be inflicted in the same court, on the same facts, for the same statutory offense."

It would be charitable to suppose that Benedict was ignorant of this fundamental principle of law, but we cannot suppose so. The principle is known to every tyro, and Benedict is no tyro, and the question comes home irrepressibly, What was Benedict's motiv in thus violating the law which it was his duy to uphold? Men's motivs must be judged by their actions. Even if there had been a principle to be upheld by the sentence of Mr. Lange, we ask, Is it usual or right for judges to perpetrate gross outrages for the sake of maintaining abstract principles? Do men do such things for nothing? Was this sentence gratuitous? If the judge's conduct was without motiv it shows a degree of rashness and negligence sufficient to justify his removal from the bench. If it was from motivs they were certainly such as to convict him at once.

Mr. Lange, with laudable public spirit, endeavored to bring Benedict to justice, and proceeded against him in an action of damages for the false imprisonment, less evidently from a desire to obtain compensation for the injury inflicted upon him than for the purpose of fulfilling his duty as a citizen by holding up to public detestation the acts of the judge who had so shamefully prostituted the sacred powers of his office. A demurrer was interposed on behalf of Benedict, which was, on trial, overruled by Judge Van Brunt, who took the view that Mr. Lange's cause of action was a good one. From Judge Van Brunt's decision an appeal was taken to the general term of the New York Supreme Court, before which tribunal, as well as before the Court of Appeals, Benedict managed to squeeze out on a technicality and to hav Judge Van Brunt's decision reversed.

Judge Folger, writing the opinion of the Court of Appeals, says: "The case turns upon a question more easily stated than it is determined. Was the act of the defendant done as a judge? Our best reflection upon it, aided by the reasonings and conclusions of many more cases than we hav cited, has brought us to the conclusion that as he had jurisdiction of the person and of the subject matter, and as his act was not without the inception of jurisdiction, the act was judicial."

We look upon this as a very frivolous way of avoiding the real questions in the case. The Supreme Court of the United States was then appealed to, but declined to disturb the judgments of the inferior courts.

Mr. Lange having thus done his whole duty in pursuing the matter to the court of last resort, one of the most extraordinary cases ever presented to legal consideration in this country comes to an unsatisfactory end, and both Benedict and the coachman remain unpunished. The innocent alone has suffered.

This is only one of the "mistakes" of the judge whose dignity had to be bolstered up by keeping Mr. Bennett in prison. With this single "mistake" in view, we believe it is fair to say that there is no greater outrage, no more degrading spectacle, at this day presented to the contemplation of the American people than that of the continued presence upon the judicial bench of the judge who managed the conviction of Mr. D. M. Bennett.

By ALLEN PRINGLE.

This pamphlet was considered necessary because the paper attacking Mr. Pringle refused to publish his reply to it. Its criticism was upon Mr. Pringle's argument against design in nature, and this work contains both the attack and reply. It is valuable, as it presents the strongest Christian evidence for the existence of God with the complete and overwhelming refutation.

A TRUTH SEEKER

Around the World.

Illustrated with fifty cuts, and with a steel plate engraving of the author in Vol. I.

BY D. M. BENNETT,

Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, author of "A Truth Seeker in Europe," "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," "Champions of the Church," etc., etc.

FOUR VOLUMES FOR $6.50.

The Most Instruction for the Least Money of any Book of Travels yet Written.

In 1880 the Freethinkers of the world held an International Congress at Brussels, to which Mr. Bennett was sent as a delegate. He took the occasion to make the tour of Europe, and his observations were embodied in "A Truth Seeker in Europe" (price, $1.50). The letters were also published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and the readers were so well pleased with them that the proposition was made that he make the journey around the world, and giv the world the benefit of a Freethinker's observations. The proposition was accepted if the ones desiring such a work would advance five dollars each, the volumes to be dedicated to them. On July 30, 1881, Mr. Bennett began the journey, sending letters back to be published. The work will make

FOUR VOLUMES OF NEARLY 900 PAGES EACH.

The first volume describes Scotland, Ireland, England, including also an account of the Freethinkers' International Congress at London, in 1881, Holland, the Netherlands, Germany, Austria, Greece, Turkey. Smyrna, Ephesus, Rhodes, Cyprus, Beyrout, Baalbec to Damascus.

Volume II. embraces visits to Damascus, the Sea of Galilee, Bethsaida, Nazareth, the Dead Sea, the Jordan, Jerusalem, and other places of interest in Palestine; Egypt and Egyptian history, and Egyptian towns, manners, and customs the pyramids, etc., to Bombay, India.

Volume III. describes India, Ceylon. Penang, Singapore, Java, an China.

Volume IV. Japan, the passage across the Pacific, and the tour over the American Continent.

There hav been many books of travel printed but none like this. IT IS THE ONLY ONE OF ITS KIND.

Mr. Bennett has a shrewd habit of seeing everything going on, and in his book he has faithfully chronicled the habits and customs of the different people of the many places he visited. The every-day life of all nations is laid before the reader by one who has visited them and beheld them with his own eyes. We feel sure this work is greatly superior to any account of a journey around the world we now hav.

ALL THE VOLUMES WILL BE ILLUSTRATED

Which adds greatly to the interest of the work, and with the close description will present Old-World places in very familiar light.

The volnmes separately will be $2. Those sending $6.50 now will get Vols. I. and II. by return mail and the others as soon as issued, which will be in a few months, or just as soon as they can be got ready.

Gems of Thought.

A MAN were better relate himself to a statue or picture, than to suffer his thoughts to pass in smother.—Bacon's Essays.

I HAV no more doubt of the untruth of Christian dogmas than I hav of the untruth of Brahmanical dogmas; nor is there any more of terror or authority for me in the former than in the latter. I utterly reject theology, especially the patristic and Calvinistic theology which claims the name of orthodox among Christians, which, in its distinctiv tenets, is to me not merely false, but loathsome, so that I cannot be content to liv or die with any taint of it upon me.—N. R. Waters.

WE may say that, since mental phenomena appear with and run their course along with certain specialized groups of material phenomena, so, too, must they disappear when these specialized groups are broken up. In other words, we may say that every living person is an organized whole; consciousness is something which pertains to this organized whole, as music belongs to the harp that is entire; but the harp is broken and it is silent, and when the organized whole of personality falls to pieces, consciousness ceases forever.—Fiske's Unseen World.

BUT old men take pains also in these matters which they know do not at all concern themselvs. "He plants trees to benefit another generation," as our friend Statius says in the Synepheli. Nor, in truth, let the husbandman, however old, hesitate to reply to any one who asks him "for whom he is serving:" "For the immortal gods, who intend that I should not only receive these possessions from my ancestors, but also transmit them to my descendants."—Cicero's Old Age.

YOU are old, Father William, the young man cried,
The few locks that are left you are gray;
You are hale, Father William, a hearty old man,
Now tell me the reason, I pray.

In the days of my youth, Father William replied,
I remembered that youth would fly fast,
And abused not my health and my vigor at first,
That I never might need them at last.

—Southey.

WHEN you hav nothing to say, say nothing; a weak defense strengthens your opponent, and silence is less injurious than a bad reply.—Colton's Lacon.

BY giving up an argument which will not bear examination, we strengthen a good cause, no less than by producing additional evidence in its support.—Stewart's Active and Moral Powers.

IN the pursuit of truth, there is no respect of persons.—Dr. G. Campbell.

THE dogma of eternal punishment rests upon passages in the New Testament. This infamous belief subverts every idea of justice. Around the angel of immortality the church has coiled this serpent. A finite being can neither commit an infinit sin nor a sin against the infinit. A being of infinit goodness and wisdom has no right according to the human standard of justice to create any being destined to suffer eternal pain. A being of infinit wisdom would not create a failure, and surely a man destined to everlasting agony is not a success.—Ingersoll.

LET not the authority of the writer, whether he be of high or low literary repute, influence you; but let the love of pure truth draw you to read. You should not inquire who wrote it, but consider attentivly what is written.—Thomas a Kempis.

I WOULD let men enter their own churches with the same freedom as their own houses; and I would do it without a homily on graciousness a favor. For tyranny itself is to me a word less odious than toleration.—W. S. Landor.

I WILL take no man's liberty of judgment from him, neither shall any man take mine from me. I will love no man the less for differing in opinion from me.—Chillingworth.

THE fear o' hell's a hangman's whip,
To haud the wretch in order;
But when ye feel your honor grip,
Let that, aye, be your border;
Its slightest touch is instant pause—
Debar a' side pretenses;
And resolutely keep its laws,
Uncaring consequences.

—Burns.

FAITH may even sometimes appear under what seems to be unbelief. A soldier, dying on a field of battle in our war for freedom and union, was asked by a chaplain, who tells the story, to trust in the atoning blood of Christ and ask God for pardon. "No, not now," said the soldier, "I did not do it when I was strong and well, I will not do it now merely to please God and to prevent him from sending me to hell. That would be the act of a coward."—Dr. J. F. Clarke.

A WORKHOUSE ought to contain a school, not of writing or reading, but of industry. If you wish to make the bulk of men wiser, do not put books into their hands, which they will either throw away from indifference or must drop from necessity, but give them employment suitable to their abilities, and let them be occupied in which will repay them the most certainly and the best. Their thoughts will thus be directed to one main point and you will produce good artisans and good citizens. This is the wisdom for every day in the week; and what is higher than this will never be impeded by it and will often rise out of it.—Lander's Imaginary Conversations.

IF we are weak in proportion to our failures, the best intellects, as we would call them, are the feeblest of all; for the most rational advice has the fewest followers, the plainest reasoning the most obstinate opposers. We have no right to be angry or vexed at any such disappointment. When a wise man cannot make an unwise one better, shall he therefore let the unwise one make him worse? Shall the weak, while he holdeth pertinaciously to his ignorance, snatch away temper and discretion from the strong?—Lander's Imaginary Conversations

Odds and Ends.

"I SHOULD so like to hav a coin dated the year of my birth," said a maiden lady of uncertain age to a male acquaintance. "Do you think you could get one for me?" "I am afraid not," he replied "These very old coins are only to be found in valuable collections." And yet he cannot see why, when he met the lady the next day, she didn't speak to him.

"YOUR honor, you've thirteen men on the jury," suggested a bystander to a justice of the peace in a neighboring town a day or two ago, where an unfortunate individual was on trial for vagrancy. "Bless my soul, that's true," said the venerable squire, adjusting his specs and casting a benignant look upon the thirteen good men and true; "Mr. Foreman, please excuse one of the jurymen." "All right, your honor," responded the foreman promptly, as he reached for his hat and started out, amidst an audible smile from the lobby, "I excuse myself."

A NUMBER of Chinese hav been at the Grand Hotel, New York. Young Mr. Smith, who wanted to hav some fun, said to one of them who was making a puzzle out of the wooden toothpicks on the counter: "Intendee stoppee here longee?" "Sir?", said the Celestial. 'Stoppee longee in New Yorkee?" repeated Mr. Smith, with a smile. "We shall remain in the city but a brief period," replied the Peking man, "prior to resuming our journey to Washington." Then he walked away, and the junior proprietor of the Grand ascertained that he had been talking to a Harvard graduate who spoke six different languages besides Chinese.

A BLACK SQUATTER'S DIGNITY.

Fifteen miles out of Chattanooga, on the Bridgeport road, I came upon a negro squatter. The cabin was a structure of poles which a man could hav pushed over, and the roof was simply a lot of straw and weeds and bushes thrown upon rafters and held down by large limbs. The one room was not over twelve feet square, and in this, with no floor but the earth, lived a family of nine. There were two straw beds, one chair, one old table, three plates, one knife, one fork, two spoons, and a bowl. It had been raining, and part of the earthy floor was a mud puddle. The family had about five pounds of meal and three or four of bacon, and of all the patches one ever saw the greatest show was right there. The old man had thirteen patches on one leg of his trousers, eleven on the other, seven on his vest, and his cotton shirt was patched in a dozen different places with red, yellow, and white and blue woolen. The old woman's dress looked like a crazy quilt, and two of the boys had only one trousers leg apiece.

"Great Scott! but how do you liv?" I asked while one of the boys was watering the horse.

"Lib, sah—how does we lib?" repeated the old man, "Well, sah, we is gainin' on it right smart. I reckon it's gwine to be a good y'ar for poo' folks."

"What do you raise?"

"Chil'en an' dogs, sah!" he soberly replied.

"Do you work any?"

"Only when I feels like it"

"And this is all your furniture?"

"Well, p'raps dar may be a cha'r out behind de cabin."

"And these are all the clothes you hav?"

"Yes, sah, 'cept one o' my old hats on de roof"

"And you call this living, do you?"

"See heah, sir," he began, as he rose up from his seat on a log near the doorstep, "'pears to me like you was inquirin' a leetle too much! We doan, advertise to keep no fust-class hotel heah, an' if you doan' like de way we fling ourselvs aroun' you'd better be sailin' along down de road! Some white folks is so mighty nice an' pert an' pertickler dat nuffin' on airth am quite up to deir style Boy! bring up dat hoss an' let dis pertickler White man git dun gone afore dem two naked chil'en cum home wid de sassafras and skurry his feelin's!"—Detroit Free Press

WHEN THE FROST IS ON THE PUNKIN.

When the frost is on the punkin and the fodder's in the shock,
And you hear the kyouck and gobble of the strut-tin' turkey cock,
And the clackin' of the guineys and the cluckin' of the hens,
And the rooster's hallylooyer as he tiptoes on the fence,
O it's then's the times a feller is a feelin' at his best,
With the risin' sun to greet him from a night of gracicus rest,
As he leaves the house bareheaded, and goes out to feed the stock,
When the frost is on the punkin and the fodder's in the shock.

They's somethin kindo' hearty like about the atmosphere,
When the heat of summer's over and the coolin fall is here—
Of course we miss the flowers and the blossoms on the trees,
And the mumble of the hummin' birds and buzzin' of the bees;
But the air's so appetizin', and the landscape through the haze
Of a crisp and sunny morning of the early autumn days
Is a picture that no painter has the colorin' to mock:
When the frost is on the punkin and the fodder's in the shock.

The husky, rusty rustle of the tossels of the corn,
And the raspin' of the tangled leaves, as golden as the morn;
The stubble in the furries, kindo' lonesome like, but still
A-preachin' sermons to us of the barns they growed to fill;
The strawstack in the medder and the reaper in the shed;
The hosses in their stalls below, the clover overhead;
O it sets my heart a-clickin' like the tickin' of a clock,
When the frost is on the punkin and the fodder's in the shock!

Wilsonia

Magnetic Clothing.

Read the following remarkable case:

343 COURT STREET, BROOKLYN.

GENTLEMEN: I cheerfully bear witness to the efficacy of the "WILSONIA" Magnetic Garments. I am a sea-faring man. For two years I suffered from chronic diarrhœa, and was under treatment of physicians, in turn, in San Domingo, Mexico, Nova Scotia, New York, and Brooklyn. About three months ago I purchased a suit of WILSONIA without having a particle of faith in it. To-day I am a well man, cured of dyspepsia, catarrh, and diarrhœa. I would as soon giv up my ship as my WILSONIA.

May 15, 1882. Yours truly, T. L. RUDOLPH.

"WILSONIA" will cure paralysis, catarrh, rheumatism, inflammatory rheumatism, varicose veins, nervous debility, pain in the back, bronchitis, asthma, dyspepsia, etc.

EXPLANATION.

The advertisment which appeared last week signed by Wm. Wilson calls for an explanation.

In October, 1881, Wilson sold his stock, patent, and good will to the Wilsonia Magnetic Clothing Company, which was organized to continue the business carried on by Wilson. His eccentric methods in business soon caused difficulties which could not be adjusted. It was therefore agreed that Wilson should retire. In June last he ceased to be a member of the company, retaining as his share the Wilsonia Corset, which is not included under the term "Magnetic Garments" as we use it.

The "caution" in the advertisment referred to will apply to certain individuals who are imitating "Wilsonia" and trading upon the reputation of "Wilsonia."

But the absurdity of the concluding paragraph will be seen when we state that Wilson has bound himself under penalty for violation of agreement, not to manufacture "Magnetic Garments," and that, as our agent for Boston, he obtains from us all the "Wilsonia" garments which he advertises for sale. It will be asked, "Why should Wilson thus try to mislead the readers of this paper?" We reply, "It is one of his eccentric methods in business."

Our Magnetic Garments are increasing in reputation day by day. Send all orders directed as below. Pamphlet containing testimonials, price list, etc., mailed free.

THE

BIBLE—WHENCE AND WHAT?

BY

Richard B. Westbrook, D.D., LL.B.,

A theologian of high degree, and a counsellor learned in the law, on the origin and character of the Bible.

The author, though possessing all the prerogativs of a clergyman, repudiates the title "Rev." as a relic of Brahmanical caste and Roman sacerdotalism. He is entirely independent of ecclesiastical supervision and censure.

The questions, Where did the books of the Bible come from? What is their authority? and, What is the real source of dogmatic theology? are treated fearlessly in the light of history, philosophy, and comparativ religions. It is impossible to giv even a condensed statement of what is itself a marvelous condensation.

WHOLE LIBRARIES ARE HERE CONCENTRATED INTO ONE LITTLE BOOK.

The author's conclusions are, of course, against the supernatural origin and infallibility of the Bible, while the dogmas of the dominant theology are shown to be priestly perversions of the ancient mythologies.

The principles of natural religion are ably stated, and the claims of true morality are warmly adqocated.

The strong commendations of the secular press show that is just the book for these times of agitation and "revision."

Notes and Clippings.

CANON FARRAR says the Salvation Army is composed of rowdy Christians.

IF it wasn't for the belles a good many people would miss being church-members.

WHEN an equestrian is hurled over the head of his horse the animal is the power behind the thrown.

HYPOCRISY is shaking hands with your neighbor, and then, when his back is turned, kicking his dog in the ribs.

SOME one claims to hav found this legend in a Leadville church: "Please do not shoot at the organist; he is doing his best."

CARLYLE said that trifles were the hinges of destiny. But Carlyle never tried swinging on a front gate that was hung with such light running-gear.

THE wheat crop in Kansas is turning out bountifully, running from sixteen to forty-six bushels per acre, with an average of twenty-eight bushels.

THERE is a farmer in Ohio who has not sheared his sheep in five years, because, as he claims, providence intended the sheep to wear their wool.

INDIANAPOLIS pastors are charging each other with stealing old sermons from books. Suppose they do? A good old sermon is far better than a flat new one.

A NEGRO congregation at Austin, Texas, thought their pastor had their color in mind when he frequently spoke of "the powers of darkness," and requested him to stop such talk or resign.

A PROVIDENCE Methodist pastor has asked his presiding elder if there would be any harm in a clergyman taking lessons in boxing, for exercise only. The answer has not yet been given.

A BOY of six and a girl of two, at Ballardville, Neb., imitating the Hindoos, are mated for marriage by their parents, who hav signed an agreement that the wedding shall occur in 1897.

THE first Catholic camp-meeting ever heard of is being held in New Jersey, and many sinners are being brought to repentance and home in hacks, the same as from any other camp-meeting.

TEXAS has 50,000 acres of school land rapidly appreciating in value, and worth probably $100,000,000, and is expected to hav in the not distant future a school fund of a quarter of a billion dollars.

THEY mobbed the widower who, at Waterloo, Iowa, while erecting only a pine slab over his wife's grave, presented a handsome piano to the girl who had been very kind to him during his sad affliction.

GLADSTONE won't go to church unless accompanied by two policemen. It is supposed that some time in recent years he must hav got caught in one of those "debt-raising" meetings where the preacher locks the door.

A SOUTH CAROLINA girl, twelve years old, is the bride of a clergyman. So one clergyman can't tell the difference between a baby and a woman when it comes to either marrying them themselvs or marrying them to some one else.

A CALIFORNIA evangelist advertises that he is "the equal of Moody in exhorting, and better than Sankey in singing." Notwithstanding the richness of his gifts, he is willing to "leave the matter of pay to the generosity of the brethren."

ANOTHER crazy man, this time in Pittsburg, has tried to kill a preacher. Strange how often the vengeance of maniacs takes that direction. All of them, too, had good bringing up, and as boys were taken to church to listen to long sermons twice every Sunday. Queer how things turn out.

DEACON SMITH, of the Mount Calvary Baptist church, was fined $2 and costs at Hartford for whipping a brother Baptist, who had charged him with a fondness for policy-shops. "I'se a bang-up Christian and Brudder Lane's a liar," was the deacon's defense.

THE Rev. John N. Brisbee did not exactly enter and run his horse in a race at Madison, Tenn., but did the next thing to it by lending his horse to a friend to do that same for him. Howbeit the horse won the race, but the racy clergyman has been arranged before a Presbyterian tribunal for horse-racing.

"MAMMA, I'll be a preacher when I grow up," said Freddy. "Ain't got brains enough," grunted a cynical old uncle who had been to Congress. "Then we'll make a Congressman of him, my dear brother," smiled the mother. "Ah, my daughter," replied the old man, "it requires more brains to make one Congressman than three parsons."

NATURALISTS in Pittsburgh are discussing the reasoning powers of animals, the subject being suggested by the suicide of a dog. Its leg was broken, and it whined piteously for several days. Finally, in an apparent fit of desperation, it limped out to the bridge and jumped into the river. Those who witnessed the act believe that it was premeditated suicide.

DR. DIXWELL, of Boston, is endeavoring to discredit the miracles at the Old Orchard faith meetings. "All well-attested faith cures," he says, "are either of purely nervous diseases or of organs closely dependent upon the nervous system. Of the four authentic cases at Old Orchard two were spinal affections, one sciatica, and one a mere derangement of the heart."

"YOU seemed to sleep very soundly last night, Matilda," said the Rev. Mr. Orthodox to his wife the other morning. "Well, yes, I did; I had an unusually good night's sleep," replied Mrs. O. "You must hav been dreaming of something very pleasant." "I was, John. I dreamed that I was in church, and you were preaching your sermon on predestination;" and the little woman rubbed her half-closed eyes at the very thought of it. Orthodox thinks it unfortunate that the marriage vow should be so binding.

MR. G. W. CHILDS, it is said, is very anxious to get his friend, Gen. Grant, in the Episcopal church. But he does not seem to be progressing much, for the general says that while the Methodist church service is short and the sermon long, the Episcopal church service is long and the sermon short, which, as he expresses it, makes six of one and half a dozen of the other. So he cannot see what he is to gain by a change. The general does not go to church now as much as he did when he was in Washington.—Baltimore Sun.

THERE was a man from Pike county who happened to be in Philadelphia over Sunday. Not knowing what to do with himself he visited one of the churches and listened to a sermon on the fateful words, "Mene, mene, tekel upharsin." When he returned home he gave his wife a full account of his adventures. "I think," said he, "that Philadelfy hain't got no rale, true religion, Jane. But what kin we expect where a preacher, without enny one sayin' a word agin him, stan's up an' starin' at a gal in one of the nigh pews, hollers out every now an' then, "Minnie, Minnie, tickle your parson?"

SOMEBODY hit Elder Toots in the neck with a peach-stone, and he awoke and offered a resolution to the effect that America entered a solemn protest against the action of the British in Egypt. "De resolushun am entirely out of order," replied the president, as he tossed it into the wood-box. "What goes on ober de sea am none o' our bizness 'tall. If de British want to lick de Turks, or de Turks want to lick de British, dat's nuffin to us, Elder Toots!" "Yes, sah." "Has you got a cabbage patch dis y'ar?" "Yes, sah." "Den you 'tend right to your cabbage an' let the British government end to Egypt. When you cum to our meetin's remember dat you hav de asthma, an' doan try to talk too loud nor too much." The elder sat down in one time and three motions, and in forty seconds had resumed his nap.

RECENTLY Elder H., a minister in Maine, who has twice been a member of the state legislature, preached from the somewhat unusual text, "And Jeshman waxed fat and kicked," the whole drift of the sermon being in support of a contribution which was to be taken up at the end of the sermon for the preacher's benefit. The elder descanted strongly upon the fact that Jeshman would not hav kicked if he had not already waxed fat upon the possession of this world's goods. The collection, however, resulted only in the small sum of $3.71. Surprised at its meagerness after all his eloquence, the elder approached a brother and inquired: "Why did not the people giv more freely?" "Because they did not like for you to wax fat for fear that you would kick," was Brother Furness's consoling explanation.

A CURIOUS sort of church was some time ago formed at Bridgeport, Conn., under the name of the Methodist-Congregational. It had some of the features common to both denominations, but it was independent of all other churches. Selecting the Rev. Mr. Dumble for its pastor, this church for a while worried uneasily along its profitless way, not gaining from the outside world any converts to speak of, and not having in its treasury at any time a sum large enough to be worth stealing. It has now come to grief. It owes pastor Dumble $275 on salary acccount, and is unable to pay. Brother Dumble has attached the house of worship in order to make himself secure. He offers it for sale, thus presenting a choice opportunity to any new denomination wishing to supply itself with a church building. Bridgeport is so well supplied with prosperous churches of the leading persuasions that inventors of new sects hav but slender chance of success there.

THE congregation of St. Michael's German Lutheran church, Philadelphia, hav long had annual excursions and picnics in which beer is the chief beverage and dancing the diversion. This year the picnic was held in a park of rather bad reputation, and there is some condemnation of the committee who selected it; but as to the beer and dancing, Pastor Bender says: "The teetotaler who is afraid of himself is not worth half so much as the moderate man who knows where to draw the line. At one of our picnics there was an amount of beer consumed which surprised a gentleman, and he remarked that the same quantity distributed among an equal number of Americans would hav intoxicated the lot. Not one of our congregation, however, was unsteady. Our pastors never protest against beer, for the reason that it don't hurt Germans, who hav been accustomed to it since infancy. Dancing in the same way doesn't corrupt their morals. I think it only affects people who would do wrong anyhow."

MICHIGAN has produced a great variety of new sects, most of which are distinguished by by their oddity and the pomposity with which they advance their claims to be considered the only people whose views of truth and righteousness are correct. The latest reported novelty in sectarianism bears the very select name of "The Chosen." The members of this sect believe themselvs to be the very elect of God. They believe to a certain extent in the community of goods, but fix the limit of ownership at $3,000. A member owning that much may keep it, but if he has more he must divide the surplus with his poor brethren. The sect was not started by rich men, but poor ones, having each far less than $3,000. Hence their belief in the right of the richer brethren to divide. The sect is not just now gaining many new members from the outside world. People having over $3,000 seem to be strangely shy of it. The outsiders show it little or no sympathy, and are disposed rather to make sport of its peculiarities than to bestow upon it substantial pecuniary aid.

ONE hundred Arabs were killed and forty taken prisoners in an encounter with the British troops on Monday. The English hav taken the Suez Canal, and traffic has been suspended to allow their war ships to pass.

BURGLARS entered the bank at Kewanee, Ill., recently, bound the clerk and female assistant and locked them in a vault, and escaped with about $15,000 booty. At last accounts no clue to the robbers had been discovered.

SOMEBODY put an emetic in the ice-cream at a church fair in Union Springs, N.Y., lately, and the stomachs of many devont persons were badly effected thereby. A man has been arrested charged with the diabolical act.

AN Irish priest at Pikesville, Md., fell through a trestle-bridge recently and injured himself so severely about his back and shoulders that his recovery is doubtful. It is a case where the Lord was too busy "counting hairs and watching sparrows" to guide his servant's footsteps.

A Truth Seeker Around the World

Twenty Days in Japan.

YOKOHAMA, April 15, 1882.

DEAR READERS: As we rode eastward from the harbor of Hong Kong toward the Pacific Ocean we gradually left behind us the rugged island on which the city is situated, passed several other cheerless islands, and before dark the island of Hong Kong had faded from our sight. When we got out where the sea was broad we found the head wind very strong and the ocean rough. My rather critical stomach again became affected and would not retain the food I had taken. I found it convenient to seek my berth to let my stomach resume the even tenor of its way. I was, however, attracted by the phosphorescence of the water of the ocean as I had been in the China Sea. After dark the water, disturbed by the motion of the steamer, glowed with light as though a quantity of live coals had been thrown upon its bosom. It is interesting to watch the appearance of this phosphorescent light, which appears more noticeable in the vicinity of land than far out in the ocean. Sometimes this singular illumination on the disturbed surface is so great as to reflect up in the cabin window and cast quite a shadow.

On the following day the sea was very rough, and not a little sea-sickness was the natural consequence. It does not seem that I make much headway in becoming a sailor, and really appear to grow worse in this respect instead of better. Land on the southern China coast remained in sight in the distance all day.

For two days more the strong winds, heavy sea, and consequent sickness continued, making this the most unpleasant part of my tour so far. On the third day the wind changed to the north and there was some improvement. I was not alone in my uncomfortable feeling, for many others on the steamer made similar complaints. A heavy rain came on, increasing the gloominess of the situation. The fourth day acquitted itself better, and the weather behaved more satisfactorily.

On the morning of the fifth day we reached the harbor of Nagasaki, the most western town in Japan. By this time the weather had become very pleasant, and the several elevated islands which guard the entrance to the harbor presented a lovely appearance, with their terraced hills clad in the bright-green garb of growing grain. Every available foot of the land which we passed by seemed to be utilized and made into beds up the hillsides, scarcely a rod in width, with the luxuriant wheat and barley presenting a promising and cheering aspect.

At the entrance of the harbor is Pappenberg Island, a steep mass of rock, covering an acre or more. From the summit of this pile, two hundred and fifty years ago, four hundred Dutch Christians were forced upon the rocks below and into the sea, and their lives destroyed. Francis Xavier commenced the missionary work in Japan, and succeeded in gaining many converts. The Dutch also sent out missionaries to the country, and obtained quite a foothold in the vicinity of Nagasaki; but, unwisely, they became too officious and meddled unduly with the political affairs of the country, and made themselves obnoxious to the Japanese government. They were duly warned of this, and were notified to leave the country by a certain date. This notice was disregarded, and when the time arrived the Japanese pressed down upon them and the Europeans fled to this island for safety. But the pursuers followed them up as promptly. The pursued reached the summit of the rock by means of the gradual inclination on the north side, and from that point the pursuers forced them to their death. It was, indeed, a very severe measure, but it seems to have been quite as much political as religious. Even if it was a religious movement, and meant for persecution, it was a small affair compared with what the Christians had often done in Europe, where, on some occasions, ten times the number were put to death. The Japanese did not seem to move precipitately upon their victims without giving them ample time to get away. That was not so bad as it would have been had they swooped down upon them without giving them a moment's notice, as Christians have often done by those whom they have persecuted and put to death.

NAGASAKI

Lies snugly by the water's edge, on the eastern part of the harbor, which is perhaps a mile across, and more than that in length; the hills rise gradually all around to a hight of several hundred feet, and are under good cultivation, giving the harbor and town somewhat the appearance of a vast amphitheater. The harbor, as well as the sea before entering, abounded in Japanese craft, large and small, which differ from the Chinese in having neat, square sails of canvas in place of the bamboo. There was in the harbor also a few foreign ships. Nagasaki was formerly an important port, but since Kobe, two hundred miles or so further east, has been opened for trade the business of Nagasaki has considerably fallen off. The Japanese are a short, sturdy race, and seem very cheerful as they scull their boats around in all directions. Sculling is the mode of propelling their small boats, as they never resort to rowing. The oar has a rocker at the proper place, which works on a pin, and the watermen in all cases stand to do the sculling. Many of the small boats have two scullers, and the larger boats, for conveying freight, etc., have half a dozen.

Soon after our steamer cast anchor I was sculled ashore in one of the smaller boats, and, as we had a few hours to spend in the town, I leisurely looked over it. It had many things different from what I had seen before, with a new class of manufactures, merchandise, and people. The town is principally occupied by natives, the foreigners amounting to but a few hundred, whose residences are principally on rising ground near the harbor. The buildings of the natives are principally of frame, one and two stories in hight, unpainted, and the roofs generally of brown or lead-colored tile. The streets are clean, of beaten gravel, and with no sidewalks, and of fair width. The stores are numerous, not deep, but well supplied with the various commodities of the country. They are open in front, a platform, about eighteen inches high, covering most of the interior space, which is covered with Japanese matting, made of a kind of grass, and looking very neat. On this platform the shop-keepers, whether men or women, sit, with their feet under them, waiting for customers, who are rarely expected to step upon the platform. No counters are used, and the goods are placed upon shelves, one above another, a few feet above the platform. In each store, on the platform, is a square open box, with ashes inside, in which is a very small charcoal fire, with sometimes a small brazier or neat brass furnace with a fire in it. This is all the fire a store has, and is utilized for heating water in a small tea-kettle for making tea, lighting pipes, etc.

The people are very pleasant, genial, good-natured, and polite. I have seen no people who smile so much and who seem more amiable and friendly. This is true in their intercourse with each other as well as with the foreigner. They bow a great deal to each other, and often almost to the ground. The married women have the foolish fashion of blacking their teeth with some kind of dye, which gives them a horrid appearance, and their habitual smile only shows this miserable custom in its fullest extent. This blacking is done after marriage, or not later than the time when the first child is born. Black teeth undoubtedly look well to them, but not to a foreigner. Their shoes are of a peculiar character, and are of three general kinds. First, a wooden sandal or sole, two inches thick, with a space cut out between the heel and ball, and the toe beveled off like a wedge; a cord, sometimes of straw and sometimes of cloth, comes up in the front part, and passes between the big toe and the others, and then branches to each side of the shoe or sole half way back, making a loop, which is all that holds them to the feet. These wood soles are worn both plain and with a straw or grass matting sole fastened on the top. Second, a wooden sole, about half or three-fourths of an inch thick, in which two cross pieces, four inches high and half an inch or less in thickness, are mortised in under the ball of the foot and the fore part of the heel, so that the walking is done on the edges of these upright cross-pieces. They are held on the feet by the same kind of cord coming up between the first two toes, the same as the others. They are higher and lighter than the blocks first named, but both are ungainly clogs, which deform the step, and cause an awkward gait, much as a person would have whose toes were cut off. There is no spring to the toes or ball of the foot with either, and the wearers go clattering along like a lot of cripples. They, doubtless, are convenient in mud and water, and are very easily dropped from the feet when a house is entered, which is always done. The Japanese never step upon the platforms and their clean mats with their shoes on; these are invariably left on the ground, inside the entrance. Third, a sole made of straw, or neatly constructed of a species of durable grass, somewhat like their mats, and worn without any wooden soles of any kind. These are held on by the toe-cords like the others named, and are usually supplied with cords at the sides of the heels, which are tied on the instep, holding them firmly to the feet. These are the lightest and best to walk in of the three; they do not give the awkward gait as do the others named, and they cause no more clattering than going about in stocking feet or a pair of light slippers. I liked these the best of the three, and bought a pair of the better kind. Those made of rice straw sell at two or three cents per pair, and those of grass at twenty cents. The straw ones last only a day or two while traveling on the road, and are then thrown aside. Lots of them are for sale everywhere, so they can always be had, and the wooden shoes are piled up in the stores where sold like cord-wood. Those made of blocks are of light wood, something like our linn or basswood. In many shops I saw men and boys making them, hewing them into shape, taking out the section in the center, putting in the cords, etc.

These shoes are worn with stockings and without, or rather what might be called mittens for the feet; these are made of cloth, and have a separate place for the big toe, the same as for the thumb in a mitten. This arrangement is necessary, in order to let the cord pass up between the first and second toes. I think stockings are never knit, as with us.

Shoes of straw are also made for the horses, and these are tied on to the horses' feet with cords of the same straw. This was the first time I had seen straw horse-shoes. They seem a poor expedient, for on stony ground they soon wear out, and are often untying and coming off; but these are the only kinds of horse-shoes used here, except on the few horses which foreigners have, and which are shod in the way common with us. Horses are scarce in Japan, and of poor quality, and are principally used for packing produce, freight, etc., on their backs, to and from the ports. I have seen a few oxen used in the same way, and with the same kind of straw shoes tied upon their feet.

Very little shoe-leather is worn in Japan, and that by foreigners and such natives as are in government employ, the police, and the military, who dress in European style.

But few of the Japanese men wear pants, and those who do so, save the officials and military, wear them tight, the legs fitting like a long pair of stockings. The lower classes wear little clothing of any kind save the cord about the waist, and the small cloth in front. The classes next above wear a cloth a yard and a half in length around the waist and legs, lapping in front, with a loose garment like a sack-coat for the body, with very large flowing sleeves. The women are similarly attired, having no dress as our women wear, but the cloth about the lower part of the body, and the garment with large, short sleeves, made loose, thick and warm, with a wide belt or band about the waist tucked in at the back or confined with a large bulky knot. These belts are often ten or twelve inches in width, and with the better classes are often composed of silk or satin. The garments are usually made of cotton, padded for cold weather, and colored a dark blue with a native indigo grown in their own country. The women in better circumstances have silken garments and other fine goods, but the men wear silk far less than the Chinese. The Japanese are not a dressy people, and there is little fit or trimness in their garments.

They have no new fashions to follow, have little rivalry in dress, or style of dwellings, thereby being free from the tyranny of fashion which rules so rigidly in Europe and America. A fashionable woman of France, England, or the United States, in order to meet the demands and usages of society, as we have it, requires ten times as many and as costly dresses as a Japanese lady.

Neither men nor women in Japan wear linen or cotton undergarments. Such articles as shirts and collars are practically unknown. The loose upper garment of the women laps over in front and is held by the belt at the waist. The neck and bosom are uncovered, and the plump breasts often disclosed. The hair of the women, like the men's, is intensely black and is neatly combed and done up in a wide chignon at the back of the head. It is heavily oiled or treated with bandoline so as to retain for a long time the position in which it is placed, the chignon being formed over a wide pad four or five inches square, and giving the hair a glossy appearance. They themselves cannot make up the chignon, and the aid of a hair-dresser is required. I am told the women, as a rule, have their hair dressed once in six or seven days, and it seems a marvel how they can keep it smooth so long. Their pillows are very different from ours, being a wooden rest some five inches in height with a cushion on the top. A flatiron, with a roll of cloth or a newspaper tied upon the handle, would give a very fair idea of a Japanese pillow. This is so placed under the head as not to disturb the hair. The beds are thick padded quilts or comforts spread upon the floor mats. They use no bedsteads. Though descended from Chinese stock the men do not wear their hair in Chinese fashion, with the queue or pig-tail, but have it cropped short and rather roughly, somewhat after our fashion. Some have the center and top of the head shaved, and the rest of the hair left long and tied at the back of the head. The hair of both men and women is straight, coarse, and plentiful, like that of American Indians. The complexion of the face and skin is of a yellowish cast much like that of the Chinese. The women are much fairer than the men, and many of them are almost as white as Europeans. The Japanese women wear no ornaments in the hair save one or two long hair-pins, usually of fine metal. It is a custom with them to paint their faces on extra occasions, and to color the lips red. They seem not to hold their age well; women thirty-five and forty years of age often look as old as an Englishwoman of fifty. Some of the old women are mere crones. I said the Japanese are short; the men average about five feet two in hight, and the women four feet six. I think I have seen no Japanese that measures over five feet eight. The upper classes are often spare and flat-chested, but the working classes are muscular and well-made.

From their characteristic politeness they have been called the French of the Far East.

JAPANESE HOUSES

Are an institution of themselves, neatness being one of their great characteristics. They lack several things common to our dwellings—they have no chimnies, no fireplaces, no doors that swing upon hinges, no window glass, no plastered walls, and no permanent partitions. The fronts are usually open, and the fire for cooking, made of charcoal or wood in a furnace of large or small size, is often in the front part of the building. The smoke, when wood is burnt, is allowed to rise to the roof of the building, and to find its way out the best way it can. In winter they have no way of warming themselves save by gathering around these small fires, where they can warm their fingers and toes while the rest of the body is nearly freezing. They know nothing about warm rooms heated by stoves or fireplaces. The sides of the house are either boarded up or plastered on bamboo lathing midway between the upright posts and studs, usually four inches thick, but there is no finished plastering inside. The rooms are inclosed in front by light, neatly-made sliding frames with very small cross-bars, something like a light sash, only lighter, the bars closer together, and covered with translucent paper, through which the light passes in sufficient quantity to admit of reading.

The partitions are frames of similar size covered with figured opaque paper, and may be shoved back, making a good-sized hall or room, or drawn forward, dividing the same into two, three, or more rooms, as desired. The sash-frames are shoved back through the day, when the weather is warm, and closed at night, or when the air is cool. Outside of the front frames are wooden blinds or shutters drawn closely at night, and shoved back through the day, and kept in a shallow recess for the purpose. These are never omitted to be drawn at night, for the Japanese are timid in the dark, and wish to shut it out. The stories are not high, and are ceiled overhead with smoothly-planed boards of dark wood, with slight cross pieces, an inch square, running transversely over the second story, and apparently more for ornament than real utility. The rooms are about fourteen or fifteen feet square, and not more than eight feet high. The paper on the sliding partitions is often ornamented with painting, more or less crude, of trees, flowers, birds, animals, and persons. The translucent paper is not painted in that way. The frames of the houses being so light they cannot be very solid, and while walking across the floors they shake very sensibly, which, with the light, flimsy partitions, gives the whole a similarity to toy houses for children. There are no chairs in the rooms, no table, no washstand, no looking-glass, no furniture of any kind. Sometimes a folding paper screen, more or less ornamented, on a very light frame, stands on one side of the room, and that is all the place contains save the white, clean, soft, and springy mats on the floor, and which are fastened to it. No person is ever supposed to walk on these mats with their shoes. No greater insult can be offered a Japanese family by a European than to enter into their houses and step upon their white mats with boots or shoes on. They not only object to the dirt which would thus be taken in, but they are very particular that the straw or grasses of the mats be not crushed by the hard soles and heels of boots and shoes. With the nakedness and plainness of these Japanese houses, nothing can excel their neatness and cleanliness. If cleanliness is godliness, they must be a very godly people. I was in some of the houses in Nagasaki, and was much struck with their neatness. In one curio establishment I was taken into the second story and had a good opportunity to examine the manner in which it was made, and since that time I have had other opportunities.

I will not undertake to describe the porcelain, the earthenware, the lacquer-work, the metal-work, the furniture, and bamboo ware which I saw in the several manufacturing places I visited, but they are quite interesting, and exhibit a high degree of mechanical skill and good workmanship. I bought a few photographs of views in the vicinity taken by native artists, but did not make extensive purchases. Many of the articles made here have the appearance of toys, and seem more showy than solid. Confectioners are tolerably plentiful, and the markets are well supplied with a good varieiy of vegetables. Fruits, except oranges, are not very abundant, it not being the season of the year for them. The population of the town is not less than twenty-five thousand.

CONTINUATION OF OUR JOURNEY.

After looking around Nagasaki as much as I wished, I took a jin-rick-sha (of which there are several hundred in the city) and returned to the landing, and thence by sampan to the steamer. In an hour or two we weighed anchor and were on our way out into the Inland Sea. We passed many romantic and picturesque islands, some of them high, rocky, and abrupt; and some, with more gentle slopes and cultivated sides, presenting the appearance of home and comfort. One, called Cathedral Island, is a remarkable one, being simply a mass of rock rising high out of the water much in shape of a church, with an opening like a large aisle running through the center.

When it is remembered that Japan is the largest archipelago in the world, composed of 3,800 islands, a large portion of which lie in the western portion of the empire, in and around the Inland Sea, it will be easily understood that we must necessarily pass a large number of them in our course by the inland passage from Nagasaki to Yokohama. The passage through the Inland Sea is one of special beauty and loveliness. There is a great variety in the islands passed, some being barren rocks, without sign of verdure, and some, especially the narrow valleys which run down to the sea, being green with the young grain now about six inches high, with the humble homes of the tillers of the soil, and on the larger islands villages dotting the landscape at intervals of a mile or two. Ever and anon a Shinto temple is seen on an eminence in a grove with an avenue and a row of trees on either side leading to the entrance. Sometimes we passed through narrow straits, and then again we emerged out into a comparatively wide sea, well filled with fishing craft and many large and small boats engaged in local trade. On Sunday night, just at sunset, we passed through the Straits of Kasha. The day had been a lovely one; the sun set clear, with brilliant hues, which made the western horizon peculiarly radiant. I thought I never witnessed a more lovely sunset, or one when the surroundings were more picturesque and enchanting. We seemed to be hemmed in by land all around us, and in every direction high walls of rock forbade our passage. But the pilot knew the way, and by twisting and turning in the right avenue a narrow passage opened before us; but the rushing through of the flowing tide over the rough surfaces of the rocks below produced scores of eddies and whirlpools all around us, conveying the impression that the passage was attended with danger. But the pilot took us safely through just as the sun had hid himself behind the western hills and while the occident was illuminated in the most lovely manner, after which we had a plenty of room and fair sailing. We passed three villages hard by, one of which is Kasha, after which the narrow strait is named. On the following morning about sunrise we passed through another strait, when we emerged out into a wide sea where the islands were fewer in number and farther away. Here our pilot, who had accompanied us from Nagasaki, left us, having been with us for two nights and a day, for which services he is paid the sum of seventy-five dollars.

We did not call at the city of Kobe (two syllables), though it, with the older town of Hiogo, of which it is a continuation, forms a city of some 50,000 people; it has been open to foreign trade since 1868, and does not a little exporting in tea, silk, copper, camphor, vegetable wax, tobacco, fans, etc. It is pleasantly situated on the Inland Sea, the ground rising gently in the rear. Quite a number of foreigners have homes on the rising ground just without the limits of the city, not a few of whom are Americans. This is one of the principal points for mission work, and is headquarters for the American branch of Japanese missions, there being here some fifteen American missionaries, male and female. A school has been established; a Bible class, etc. A weekly journal is published in the native language in the interest of Christianity and under the direction of the missionaries, at the head of whom is the Rev. Mr. Guilick. The paper, however, has but a limited circulation. They doubtless feel that they are doing the Japanese much good, and it is to be hoped that they are; but from some remarks I have read upon the subject, there is at least room for question upon the subject. A complaint has been made that the Japanese girls educated by the missionaries are not well adapted to make good wives for native husbands, and that by such education they lose much of the politeness so characteristic of the people. It is said of the American missionaries that they discourage Japanese politeness, and that in return for the low and profound Japanese bows they simply give a short, small, and hasty nod, which, to the Japanese, has little signification. It seems the missionaries are deficient in Japanese politeness, being more anxious to urge their religious dogmas upon the people than to adopt their polite manners. There are large temples here at Kobe, both of the Buddhistic and Shinto sects.

A railroad, some fifty-five miles in length, running as far as the city of Kioto, has been in operation five years. Twenty miles out, at the mouth of the Yodogawa River, is the commertial city of Osaka, with 270,000 inhabitants. It is noted for its various manufactures, and is represented as having a thrifty trade. Here is located the government mint for the making of the silver coin of the realm. Some thirty miles further on is the ancient city of Kioto, which was formerly the home of the mikado and the capital of the empire. It has 225 000 inhabitants, which is but half what it had fifty years ago. Since the capital was moved to Tokio Kiota has very much fallen off in population and importance. It is, however, represented as the prettiest city in the empire, and is noted for its rich Shinto and Buddhistic temples. It may be regarded as one of the holy cities of Japan, for when it was the home of the mikadoes, and as the mikado is the head of the religious institution of the nation, it very naturally became the center of the religion of the country. In the city and vicinity are many very rich temples and shrines, and thousands of pilgrims visit them every year to pay their religious devotions before the altars so abundant in the vicinity. Japan abounds in temples and shrines; and though it is said by some that the Japanese are not a religious people, a different conclusion must be arrived at if the number and cost of the temples and shrines, the number of priests and monks, and the number of pilgrims who here make annual religious pilgrimages are taken into consideration. It is probable, however, that there is less sanctimoniousness and solemnity among the Japanese in their religious observances than almost any other nationality. They make their pilgrimages pleasure expeditions and gala times more than occasions of long-faced solemnity. They are a very cheerful people in their religious observances as well as all other matters.

Kioto is called the "Home of Art," and is noted for its exquisite manufactures in porcelain ware, fine pottery, bronzes, silks, damasks, embroidery, lacquer-work, etc. The wares there manufactured find their way into all the principal cities of the country, and command a higher price than the same kind of goods manufactured elsewhere. The missionaries have established a college here, and claim to have made considerable progress in introducing their creed. Whether the people are really greatly improved thereby is another question.

The rich goods manufactured in Kioto for the robes of the priesthood are said to be extremely rich, abounding in gold and silver thread. Silk crepes are made there so fine and delicate that four widths can be drawn through a small finger-ring at one time, and having in their texture small sprays of flowers and bamboo upon tinted ground, producing upon an esthetic female beholder the most ravishing effects.

With its schools, hospitals, lunatic asylum, almshouses, fountains, public parks and gardens, beautiful cemeteries and streets, almost painfully clean, Kioto is pronounced the most lovely, the best arranged, and best-managed city in Japan.

A GLANCE AT JAPANESE HISTORY.

While smoothly moving on our way on the south side of the main Island of the Japanese group, sometimes with the main-land near upon our left, and sometimes entirely out of sight, let us spend a little time in briefly reviewing the history of this interesting country.

The empire of Japan, comprising 3,800 islands, the principal being the four main ones, extends from latitude 24° to 64° 40′, and from longitude 134° to 156° 38′, east, making a total of 148,000 square miles, thus covering over twenty-six degrees of latitude and twenty-two and a half degrees of longitude. Its northern extremity corresponds with the latitude of Quebec and its southern with that of the southern part of Florida, thus making its climate compare with that of the United States, embracing a large range of temperature. In its southern limits, which lies within thirty miles of the tropic of Cancer, is almost perpetual summer; while in the northern part of Yezo, the most northern of the larger islands, the winters are almost Siberian in intensity.

The population is 35,000,000, twenty-five thousand of which are the Ainos, the aborigines of the country, living on the northern island Yezo, who are savages, and bear much the same relation to the Japanese as our American Indians do to us. They are a tall, muscular, fine-looking race, and have many noble traits of character, but lack enterprise, and a love for civilized life; they till the land very poorly, living mainly by hunting and fishing, and are very fond of intoxicating drinks, particularly the saké, the national drink of the Japanese, manufactured from rice. They drink to excess of this when they can get it, and believe that their gods are pleased by their so doing. Their worship largely consists in libations of saké, and they are unquestionably devoutly fond of this kind of worship.

It is usually held that the Japanese are the descendants of Chinese emigrants who settled in Japan several centuries before the Christian era, but this theory is strongly disputed by some. Morton, long ago, after examining the Japanese cranium, decided that they are not of Chinese origin. Language, which is justly claimed to be one of the strongest indications of race, rather argues against their being of Chinese stock. Though the written and printed characters are somewhat similar, the languages are wholly unlike and cannot be understood by each other. It has been decided that their language is neither of Chinese nor Polynesian origin, nor of any aboriginal northeastern Asiatic race. Whitney and Max Muller are inclined to place them in the Indo-European family of nations If so, it is held that the conquerors of these islands must have started from the central portions of Asia, and instead of traveling west, as did the other emigrant hordes from the same locality, crossed to Japan and wrested the country from the indolent Ainos—who declare that they descended from a dog—then the possessors of the soil. This was probably not less than twenty-five hundred or three thousand years ago.

For many centuries the chief executive of the country, the mikado, was believed to have directly descended from the gods who created the country. These rulers by "divine right" exercised their power through the Kugé, or court nobles, mostly connections of the mikado, and who monopolized all the highest offices, and of whom were composed the two great councils which regulated both religious and national affairs and filling the various important posts of the country. They were a hereditary nobility, which absolutely governed the country.

After the twelfth century, the period when the feudal system of the country arose, the ruling power gradually passed out of the hands of the mikado and the nobility, which had previously exercised it, into the hands of the great feudal families, and in 1603 became concentrated in Iyeyasu, the head of a new dynasty called the Tokugawa, successive members of which exercised power for two centuries and a half. During this period the nominal mikadoes held the semblance of power in the city of Kioto, but the absolute power and splendor of the government passed to his chief vassal under the title of shogun, who ruled from the castle of Yeddo, now called Tokio. He almost invariably had the power to impose his will upon the mikado. This was the dual government which gave rise to the mistaken notion that there were two emperors in the country, the mikado and the tycoon, one the spiritual ruler, the other the temporal.

The feudal princes of the country who had conquered their territories by the sword were called daimiyo, and these exercised over their dominions a rather independent authority, somewhat as did the lords and barons of olden times in England, though they were, of course, subservient to the Shogun, and were compelled to acknowledge his authority, and his government was composed of the most loyal and faithful whom he could select from their numbers. The samurai were their two-sword retainers, who had won their provinces for them, and in turn had been awarded grants of land. These were not only the principal fighting men of the country, but the most public-spirited and best-educated class.

Of these privileged classes the Kugé were poor, but retained their former prestige, numbering some one hundred and fifty families; the daimiyo, with their semi-independent position, two hundred and sixty-eight families; and the samurai, the real backbone of the nation, four hundred thousand households. Below all these were the mudsills of the country, a vast, unrecognized class of men without position, called the heimin, including farmers, artisans, and peasants. These men were carefully separated from the upper classes and were prohibited by law from intermarrying with them, as well as from the still lower, or pariah class, the eta, who handled raw hides and contaminating things of that kind, and the pinin, paupers, allowed to squat on waste lands, and who lived by begging, carrying bodies from the execution grounds, and performing various other degraded offices. This class were entirely without political privileges, and numbered thirty-two millions. Thus the shogun possessed the real power of the country, though the mikado was nominally above him, was at the head of the church, and his name was used to conjure with.

The revolution which occurred nearly fifteen years ago subverted this tenure of power, did away with the shogun, the diamiyo, the samurai, and established the full power of the mikado. This revolution undoubtedly largely grew out of the new ideas gathered from the intercourse of the people with western nations whose civilization and customs they wished to take as models for the government of their own country. A portion of the daimiyo saw in the new movement a promise for the good of the country and patriotically joined in it, as they particularly wished to see an end of the power of the shogun and the full restitution of the mikado.

In 1868, Keiki, the last of the shoguns, retired into private life, and in 1869 nearly the whole of the daimiyo petitioned to be allowed to yield up their fiefs and quasi-sovereign rights to the mikado, praying him to assume absolute power and to establish the internal relations of the country upon such a footing that the empire will be able to take its place side by side with the other nations of the earth. This prayer was answered, and a tenth of their former revenues was allotted to them; a provision was made for their retainers, and by 1871, when the clans were finally abolished, the feudal system of Japan, with all the splendor it possessed, and all its oppressiveness, ceased to exist. The mikado removed his seat of government from Kioto to Tokio, which has since been the capital of the country. There has since been one rebellion against the new order of things, in 1877, which cost the country thirteen thousand killed, twenty-one thousand wounded, and over forty million dollars in treasure, to say nothing of an enormous loss in property and in the business of the country.

Since the new order of things has been adopted Japan has gone forward rapidly and has done a great deal to place the nation in the front rank with the progressive nations of the world. Serious mistakes have, of course, been made, and many enterprises have been undertaken which have proved failures, and much remains still to be done. The mikado has promised that a representative assembly elected by the people for the enactment of laws shall exist in 1890, that being as early as the common people will be ready for full suffrage in the election of a legislative assembly.

The mikado is an absolute sovereign. He is aided by a supreme council which consists of a prime minister, a vice-prime minister, and the heads of the departments of state, and meets in the mikado's presence, who presides. Below this is a legislative council of eminent men presided over by an imperial prince. This body enacts new laws and changes old ones as it sees fit, or, rather, as are determined by the supreme council. The chief departments of state are foreign affairs, finance, war, marine, education, public works, justice, colonization, the imperial household, and the interior, the latter embracing the department of religion.

For administrative purposes the country is divided into three Fu (Tokio, Kioto, and Osaka), and thirty-five Ken, each having a governor or prefect, and a staff of officials responsible to the minister of the interior. The salaries are by no means excessive. The premier receives less than $10,000; the chief and vice-ministers of the different departments, $7,200 and $4,800, respectively.

The soldiery of the country consists of 35,500 men in time of peace, and 50,230 in time of war, with a reserve force of 20,000 composed of the former samurai class. The navy consists of thirteen ships in actual service, ironclads, iron-belted, composite, and wooden—all steamers, carrying 2,270 men and 87 guns, besides ten training ships, four yachts, etc. The police force is a very important body, and numerous, with responsible duties. This force is also composed of the samurai class, and is well educated and efficient.

A pretty thorough postal system is established, and letters are carried to all parts of the country at two cents each. Thirty-five thousand miles of post routes have been established, and this amount is being yearly increased. The postal department appears to be managed with ability and fidelity. In the year ending June, 1878, the number of letters, papers, etc, transported by the mails was nearly 50,000,000, and of this number but sixty-two were stolen, and but ninety-one missing. Of this aggregate 25,000,000 were letters, 763,000 registered letters, 10,000,000 postal cards, and 950,000 newspapers. The number of money orders it is said was 204,367, aggregating $2 800,000. The post-office savings banks amount to 292, with 5,000 depositors, averaging $22.50 each. The post office department employs 7,000 persons, twelve of whom are foreigners. It is believed there is not another nation of the same size in the world which can show a higher degree of integrity in the management of its postal affairs.

The telegraph system of the country is very efficient, and is spoken of in the highest terms. The first short line was erected in 1869, and the lines have been increasing since that time at the rate of 600 miles per year; 8,000 miles were in operation two years ago. Bell's telephones have been imported, and are successfully employed in connection with the public works. The number of persons employed in the telegraph department amounts to 1,410. During the year 1878, 1,045,442 messages were transmitted, of which number 28,000 were foreign. The prices for foreign dispatches are higher than for native. The native newspapers have adopted the plan of giving telegraphic news to their readers.

Railroads have been slower in their construction, there being but seventy-six miles in operation in the entire country, though five hundred miles more are projected; their construction, however, is progressing slowly. Had half or two-thirds the money that has been expended upon the army and navy been expended in making railroads and good common roads the country would be decidedly the better for it. One of the great lacks is want of means of internal communication.

The mercantile marine of Japan is well worthy of notice. The Mitsu Bishi line of steamers is doing nearly all the coasting trade of the country, and makes weekly trips between Hong Kong and Shanghai and Yokohama. I have seen two of them while on this passage. Several of these steamers are, as I learn, of American construction. They are well conducted, under Japanese management, and all are making money. The total Japanese tonnage is 36,543 tons, besides a number of lake and river steamers of smaller dimensions. The total number of steamers of more than one hundred tons capacity is sixty. The clumsy and unseaworthy junks are rapidly being replaced. In 1872 the number of junks of more than six tons was 17,258, but the number is gradually growing less. The mercantile marine regulations are somewhat stringent. Marine schools have been established for giving practical instruction in navigation and engineering, and all masters, officers, and engineers on native owned vessels are required to pass a rigid examination. If they acquit themselves properly in the examination certificates are awarded, which are necessary for those who wish to engage in the service. To show that these examinations are not merely a matter of form it may be stated that out of the last examination of 219 candidates 69 failed to pass. The coasts are pretty well lighted, and most of the shoals and sunken rocks have been surveyed and marked by buoys.

Japan has two mints, one for paper money at Tokio, and another for coin at Osaka. The latter is said to be about the largest and most complete in the world. The coins of Japan are very pretty, and are not exceeded in beauty by any I have seen. The denominations are 5, 10, 20, 50, and 100 cents each, the larger called yens, while the cents are sen. Their currency corresponds with our dollars and cents. The gold coinage is confined to 5-yen pieces. In the year ending June, 1879, 92,073 gold coins were struck. The silver coins, about $75,000,000. The copper coins are 2 sen, 1 sen, ½ sen, and 1 rin, and of these 83,000,000 were struck.

Their paper currency is the principal money in use among the natives. The bills are somewhat smaller than ours, and are for 10 sen, 20 sen, 50 sen, 1 yen, 5 yens, and 10 yens each. This currency is, however, usually at a discount, owing to the magnitude of the public debt, for in the aptitude of the Japanese in following western fashions they have incurred a large national debt, amounting to $360,000,000. But it should be stated that a large proportion of this debt was handed down from the old régime, the aggregate amount of which was $272,635,000, including the absolute debt owed and the hereditary pensions awarded to the nobles, the military caste, and the Shinto priests. The Satsuma rebellion of 1877 added over $40,000,000 to the national debt, and the Formosa expedition $10,000,000 more. But one-thirteenth of the national debt is due to foreigners. The interest on the public debt is 4½ per cent. The paper money issued by the government amounts to $120,000,000, which sum has been diminished by the withdrawal of $7,385,000.

The assumption of the daimiyo debt was necessary, in order to make the unification of the empire possible. It does not appear that the issue of paper money has largely increased the circulating medium, because it has been required to replace the former paper issued by the daimiyo. Two years ago the national debt stood in this way:

Domestic debt, bearing interest	$238,631,230
Domestic debt, bearing no interest, including paper money	122,307,720
Total domestic debt	$350 938,950
Foreign debt	11.329,120
Total of both domestic and foreign	$362,268,070

The chief source of revenue is the imperial land-tax, which is now 2½ per cent on the selling value of the land, which is less than formerly, and from this source $40,000,000 is supposed to be annually raised. The land was in former times owned by the mikado, and the farmers were required to pay an annual rent, but under the new order of things the land has been sold to the tillers, subject to the above tax. The tax on alcoholic liquors is estimated at $5,000,000; export and import duties, $2,140,000; the profit on government industrial undertakings, $1,190,000; postage stamps, $1,050,000; tax on legal documents, $535,000; tax on companies, $500,000; tax on tobacco, $345,000; tax on produce in Yezo, $360,000; tax on vehicles, $270,000.

The expenditures of the government are stated as follows: Interest on the public debt, $15,650,000; the army, $7,190,000; the navy, $2,635,000; the police, $2,485,000; the administration of fu and ken, $3,785,000; colonization, $1,510,000; embankments, $1,445,000; education, $1,135,000; industrial undertakings, $1,005,000; civil list and imperial princes, $875,000. In 1880 there was an appropriation for "temples of the gods," $220,000, but now that has been reduced about one-half, by which perhaps it may be inferred that the people are becoming less religious, or that the gods are becoming more reasonable in their demands.

In the last eleven years some 225 newspapers have been started in Japan, and their number is on the increase. They have an aggregate circulation of over 30,000,000 copies. Many of them discuss finance, commerce, morals, etc., while, as with us, many are devoted to light reading, gossip, and romance. Politics are touched very lightly, as a dangerous subject, for the government authorities are constantly on the alert, and if anything of an objectionable character appears, notices are not unfrequently served on the offenders to discontinue their publications. The press is hardly "free."

It is in the educational department that Japan has most greatly honored itself. The new educational system was planted on a commendable plan in 1873. The empire was divided into seven school districts, and a school allotted to every 600 inhabitants. The system is based upon elementary schools, and ascends through middle and normal schools to foreign-language schools and colleges for special sciences. In 1879 the total number of elementary schools was 25,459, with 59,825 teachers, being 58,268 males and 1,558 females. The total number of pupils was 2,103,012, or 1,594,792 boys and 508,220 girls. The school age is from six to fourteen. The same branches are taught as in our schools. It is said the standard of education has been raised too high for a peasant population, and has made it difficult to obtain competent teachers.

It was intended that the elementary school system should be conducted by the people, but it has fallen largely into the hands of local government officials, and this probably arises from a want of proper interest in the matter by the common people. The complexity of the Japanese language, with the great number of characters which have to be learned—not less than 3,000, even in the primary schools—is no small difficulty to be overcome in comparison with our system.

The middle schools have rapidly increased during the past six years, growing mainly out of the increased desire for the acquisition of the higher branches of learning. The course of study continues from two and a half to five years and includes writing, grammar, composition, drawing, languages, geography, history, arithmetic, algebra, geometry, physics, chemistry, astronomy, geology, natural history, physiology, agriculture, mechanics, commerce, bookkeeping, statistics, mental and moral philosophy, political economy, law, and gymnastics. There were 389 of these schools, with 910 teachers, of whom the small number of 23 were females. The number of students three years ago was 20,522, an increase of 9,000 over the preceding year. The female students of these schools numbered 1,112. Their educational system embraces schools for special sciences, of which there are fifty-two in different localities, with 161 teachers and 3,361 students. These colleges teach law, medicine, agriculture, commerce, navigation, chemistry, mathematics, etc., the latter branches being the most conspicuous, and medical and commercial schools next. This system is crowned by the University of Tokio, which includes departments of law, literature, and science. The number of students in the three first departments amounted to 710, and the instructors numbered 56, 32 being Japanese and 24 foreign. The preparatory course includes English, mathematics, geography, physics, chemistry, history, political economy, philosophy, natural history, drawing, etc. The special course of law embraces international and English law in its various branches. Science includes chemistry, physics, and engineering. Literature is a new department, but includes the branches usually taught under that head. The whole course requires a term of five years. In the year 1875 nineteen students were sent to foreign countries to perfect their education and have now completed their studies, graduating with honors. Some of them were sent to Europe and some to the United States. The government made them loans of one thousand dollars per year, which was a pretty heavy debt to incur by those who at best could expect but very moderate salaries upon their return to their own country. In this way the most promising young Japanese graduated with honors at foreign colleges, and brought the results of their studies back to their own country, and are now building up a first-class educational system at home.

The medical department of the university is mainly under the charge of German teachers and influence, and two classes of instruction, medical and pharmaceutical, were organized; and, as instructors were scarce, classes were organized in such a way as to utilize the instruction to the best advantage. The university is furnished with a library, a hospital, anatomical rooms, botanical and zoological collections, surgical and medical apparatus, and all the appliances of a medical college. In 1877 the hospital treated 836 in-patients and 4,390 out-patients; 117 corpses were furnished for dissection. A large proportion of the physicians of the empire still follow the crude and unscientific practice of the Chinese school, but considerable numbers of young physicians have been turned out qualified to practice medicine according to the most advanced European standard, and the number is annually increasing.

The foreign language school was at one time regarded as of great importance; and intelligent and progressive persons like Mr. Mori, who was some time in the United States, and was afterward sent as minister to England, was greatly in favor of introducing English as the written language of Japan, with the anticipation that it would in due time become also the spoken language of the country. He proposed to prominent persons in England and America that if they would consent to the phonetic mode of spelling and adopt it, he would use all his influence to introduce English as the language of Japan; but, unfortunately, he met with no encouragement in this direction; and this is the worse for England and America, for few things are more needed than a spelling reform in our language. The awkwardness and monstrosity of our orthography are simply ridiculous.

To effect these great changes in the course of the education of this country, to inaugurate new systems upon western models in the governmental departments, many teachers and aids from Europe and America have been required; but now the number of these foreign teachers and assistants is greatly reduced. As fast as the Japanese have found their own officials competent to perform the various duties, the services of foreigners have been dispensed with, until now but a few remain; and Japan is practically running on modern principles her departments of government and her institutions of learning; and, perhaps, she is doing so with as much ability and with as much success as a majority of the European nations.

In effecting these great changes, the government has steadily endeavored to follow European and American models, not only in the style of teaching, but in the dress and personal habits of the students and learners. Instruction everywhere has been conducted upon western principles. The pupils in the upper schools have been required to sit on benches and at desks the same as pupils in our own schools. In government colleges the reform has been carried so far that students eat food prepared in European style, and use knives and forks. Increased attention has been given to female education, and the Empress Haruka has promptly come forward as a patroness of the higher education of women. The number of female teachers and scholars has greatly increased in both the elementary and normal schools. The government has evinced a decided wish to increase the number of competent native female teachers and a higher standard of education among the pupils. Mr. Tanaka, connected with the educational department of government, says: "The education of children should be so conducted as to develop grace and gentleness of manners and deportment. If they are brought up under the influence of the gentler qualities of female teachers, a much better result may be attained than when they are trained entirely by men."

It is admitted by Europeans and Americans that the youth and young people of Japan of both sexes show a decided aptitude for learning, that they acquire knowledge readily, and that in good behavior, earnest self-control, docility, and a disposition for hard and continuous work, they are not behind the children of Europe and America. The result of all this is that a large number of the young of Japan have been turned out capable of intellectual acquirements and in natural ability for doing the most practical and efficient work in government employ and in educational departments.

But it must be stated that with all these encourag ing features only about 40 per cent of the children are going to school—that is, between three and four million are not attending school. There is no compulsory law compelling their attendance; the minds of a great majority of the peasant population do not realize the importance of sending their children to school, not having themselves been educated in that way, and in the rural districts needful schools have not yet been fully established nor teachers provided where all can be accommodated. It is no small undertaking to thus change the whole policy of a country and lift it from a state of general ignorance to one of enlightenment. It cannot be done in a day, nor year, nor in a generation.

It has been thought by some that the Japanese have undertaken to advance too rapidly, that they have attempted in too short a period of time to throw off the slow, staid, and old civilization of the East, and to adopt in place the manners and customs, education and civilization, of the West. It is so short a period of time since the great mass of the people here were occupying the low plane of ignorance that it should not be expected that all can be changed in the life of one generation.

There is no doubt but what on the part of millions of the common people there is a sullen opposition to this new order of things. They are prejudiced against Western innovations and fashions. They prefer to pursue the good old way with which they are familiar, and in which their fathers and grandfathers were brought up and in which they died. They see, too, that these new fashions, these Western styles, are expensive. Their taxes are heavy and oppressive. They cannot see that the gains have equaled the cost, and they almost revolt against the great expenses that have been incurred and the new fashions that have made them necessary.

As has been truly said, "the problem of 'how to make ends meet' has vexed the brains and tested the resources of Japanese statesmen since 1871, when the mikado assumed the responsibility of the debts which the daimiyo had contracted to Japanese subjects before the restoration, and of the paper money of all sorts and values which they had issued, substituting it for uniform paper currency." It must be left for time to determine whether all the innovations which have been undertaken will prove successful, and whether the Japanese people will continue to sustain and keep up these expensive changes. It is thought by some that a thorough reaction on the part of the people is not unlikely, and that a general rising against foreign influence may take place, when an effort will be made to drive foreigners from the country and reinstate the former order of things. But it is to be hoped that these fears may not be realized; that the government will succeed in carrying out to full completion the reforms it has undertaken; and that the revenues of the country will be adequate to meet all expenses. That there is a strong feeling on the part of many against the presence of foreigners, and against foreign influence, can hardly be denied; but it is to be hoped that this will gradually give way, and that a better state of feeling and general satisfactory results may take place.

THE RELIGIONS OF JAPAN.

Two systems of religion prevail in this country, Shintoism and Buddhism, the latter of a modified and corrupted character, being full of superstitions and combined with the image-worship originally prevalent in the country. Buddhism was brought from Corea in the sixth Christian century, and it seems to have been engrafted on the worship of pagan gods and demons which it found here. Shintoism is the religion of the imperial families and perhaps a third of the people of the country. In a word, it is the worship of nature, of the country and its heroes and great men of the past, taking little thought of another world, or of the existence of gods and devils, though gods are incidentally believed in.

It has been said that Shintoism is simple pantheism, which denies the personality of God, and recognizes in nature, through its ramifications, all of deity that exists. But, on the other hand, it has been asserted and shown that the belief recognizes a creator, and this quotation has been made from the Kojiki, one of the sacred books of the Shintoo: "In the beginning, before heaven and earth or anything else existed, in infinite space was Ame-no-mi-naka-nushi-no (supposed to mean the Lord God of the middle of heaven). Next were Taka-mi-musubi no Kami and Kamu-mi-musubi-no Kami (high imperial generating gods) But that is about all the religion has to say about gods, and this may be merely a recognition of the deific or pantheistic principle residing in nature. Christians usually denounce Shintoism as naught but cold Materialism, though later on its gods are more abundant.

It has been questioned whether Shinto is a product of Japanese soil. The Japanese call their ancient religion Kami-no-michi (the way of the gods). The meaning of the word Shinto is the primitive religion—that which existed in the country before the introduction of Buddhism. "Pure Shinto" is the term often used, and implies the original religion wholly unmixed with later arrivals. Confucianism has also been introduced into the islands, loaded with many of the superstitions added to it by the Chinese, and this is known as Riyobu Shinto.

Japanese cosmogony and mythology, like those of other countries, regard their own country as the universe. A confused idea is held as to the period and manner in which the gods and the islands were brought into existence The sun-goddess, Amaterasu, representing the life-giving power of the sun, may perhaps be regarded as the principal deity in Shinto. This life-giving, light-bearing goddess, finding Japan disturbed with opposing elements and feuds—the earthly gods, with Okuninushi at their head, were unable to preserve order, and the goddess dispatched Ninigi no-Mikoto, a heavenly god, to this country, and compelled Okuninushi to resign, since which time the latter has ruled only over the invisible, while Ninigi, and the mikadoes who have succeeded him have ruled over the visible. Here may be discerned a crude idea of the apparent contending forces of nature. The gods, however, that were overcome made some attempts to regain their power, and rebelled against the control under which they were held, but this was brought to an end by Jimmu Tenno, the mikado fifth in descent from the sun-goddess, about 660 B C., who fully established the rule of the sun-goddess.

Japanese history seems to date from that period, and it was made the starting-point of Japanese chronology. The 7th of April is held to be the anniversary of Jimmu Tenno's ascension to the throne. He has been deified and worshiped as a god. A thousand shrines are erected to him in all parts of the country. From him the present mikado is claimed to have regularly descended. Many of the intermediate mikadoes have also been deified and worshiped as gods, more or less great, according to the deeds of valor they performed.

Hirata, a Shinto revivalist who wrote some seventy-five years ago, said: "To compel obedience from human beings, and to love them, was all the sovereign had to do, and there was no necessity for teaching them vain doctrines such as are preached in other countries. Hence the art of government is called masturigoto, which literally means 'worshiping.' Accordingly the early sovereigns worshiped the gods in person, and prayed that their people might enjoy a sufficiency of food, clothing, and shelter from the elements, and twice a year, in the sixth and twelfth months, they celebrate the festival of the 'general purification,' by which the whole nation was purged of calamities, offenses, and pollutions." This festival is observed till the present time. In the thirteenth century the mikado interpreted the directions of his divine ancestors by ordering that "even in the slightest matters [certain holy things] are not to be placed after the emperor. As it is the duty of subjects to imitate the incarnate god who is their sovereign, the necessity of worshiping his ancestors and the gods from whom they spring is to be enjoined upon every man. The gods who do harm are to be appeased, so they may not punish those who have offended them; and all the gods are to be worshiped so that they may be induced to increase their favors."

It can be easily seen that Shinto is closely connected with the government, and that the veneration and worship of the ruling sovereign was of quite as much importance as that of any other god. He is the lineal descendant of the gods, is, of course, a god himself. His heavenly origin, like the old incas of Peru, has been the foundation and main-spring of Japanese government. The duty of obeying his commands has been as imperative as the obedience to be rendered to any god.

From the death of Jimmu Tenno to the introduction of Buddhism is computed at 1236 years. Between 99 and 30 B. C. the reigning mikado, Sujin, a demi-god of course, appeared as a reformer. He called upon his people and turned their minds to the true worship of the shrines; he built shrines in several parts of the country; he removed the mirror, sword, and stone from the palace where they had previously been kept to a shrine built expressly for them, and appointed his daughter as priestess to hold them in charge. The mirror rested in the shrines of Ise till 1871. In the middle of the sixth century Buddhistic missionaries arrived from Corea and proselytized so successfully among the upper classes that about the eighth century a decree was issued ordering the erection of two Buddhistic temples and a seven-story pagoda in every province. The continued supremacy of Buddhism is due, however, to a master stroke of religious policy, accomplished by a priest, Kobodaishi, in the ninth century, who, in order to gain and hold precedence for his creed over the people, taught that the Shinto gods were but Japanese manifestations of Buddha. This dogma served to reconcile the foreign with the native element religion, and for several centuries gave Buddhism the ascendency in the country, both Shinto and Confucianism being compelled to occupy subordinate positions. This may be said to have been the state of things till about two centuries ago, when the Chinese philosophy of Choo-He was introduced, which, however, is now being superseded by the teachings of Spencer, Darwin, Mill, and Huxley, called the "English philosophy." At the restoration of the mikado to temporal power, in 1868, Shinto was re-established as the state religion. This grew out of its power as a political engine in matters of government, but it it was hardly possible to infuse new life into it, or to re-introduce usages which had long been obsolete. It cannot be regarded as a strong religion, and the number who strictly adhere to the old faith is said to be small.

"The Buddhaizing the old gods, and the incorporating the ancient traditions of the divine ancestors and early heroes of the Japanese with the ethereal code and doctrines of Buddhism, produced a jumble upon which the reigning mikado, pleased with the fusion, bestowed the name of Riyobu Shinto, or 'twofold religious doctrine.' From that time Shinto and Buddhistic priests celebrated their ceremonies in the same temples, the distinctive features of Shinto, the absence of idols, sacrifices, and visible objects of worship, disappeared, and the temples were crowded with wooden images of Shinto divinities alongside of those of Buddha and his disciples, only a very few temples in a very few districts retaining the simplicity of the ancient faith. Since 1868 the images, and all the gaudy and sensuous paraphernalia of Buddhism, have been swept out of a large number of the temples, but the splendor of the buildings still remains, as at Shiba in Tokio, and the plain wooden structure, with the thatched tent-roof and the perfectly bare interior, is only seen in its primitive simplicity in the Shrine of Ise and a few other places. In the eighteenth century an attempt was made by a certain scholarly and able man to revive pure Shinto and adapt it to those cravings of humanity which Buddhism had partially met; but the attempt failed and has resulted mainly in affording materials for the researches of Mr. Satow and other foreign scholars. The characteristics of 'pure Shinto' are the absence of an ethereal and doctrinal code, of idol-worship, of priestcraft, and of any teachings of a future state, and the deification of heroes and great men, together with the worship of certain forces and objects in nature. It is said the kami, or gods, number fourteen thousand, of whom three thousand seven hundred are known to have shrines; but practically the number is infinite, or 'eight millions.' Each hamlet has its special god, as well as each miya, or shrine, and each child is taken to the shrine of the district in which it is born a month after birth, and the god of that shrine becomes its patron. Each god has its annual festival, while many have particular days in each month on which people visit their shrines.

"The temples are of unpainted wood, and the tent-like roofs are thickly thatched. They are destitute of idols, effigies, images, and ecclesiastical ornaments of any kind. The only objects are a circular steel mirror, the gohei, small offerings of saké (the national drink), rice, and other vegetable food, on unlacquered wooden trays, and some sprigs of the evergreen cleyera-japonica. The mirror is the copy of the one given by the sun-goddess, as the emblem of herself to Ninigi, when she sent him down to govern the world; but even this is only exposed to view in temples in which Shinto has been at some time jumbled up with Buddhism. A plain 'gohei' is a slim wand of unpainted wood, with two long pieces of paper, notched alternately on opposite sides, hanging from it. In some shrines which were long in Buddhistic hands, such as that of Iycysu at Nikko, gilded metal takes the place of paper. The gohei represents offerings of rough and white cloth which were supposed to have the effect of attracting the god to the spot where offered, but gradually came to be considered the gods themselves. In the pure Shinto temples, which do not display the mirror, there is a kind of receptacle concealed behind the closed doors of the actual shrine, which contains a case only exposed to view on the day of the annual festival, and which is said to contain the spirit of the deity to whom the temple is dedicated, 'the august spirit substitute,' or 'God's seed.'" Much the same idea as the Jews entertained when they supposed their god was contained in the box of shittim-wood which they constructed for his residence.

The most prominent emblem in the Shinto temple is unquestionably of Japanese origin. This is the "torii," which stands at the entrance of their temple grounds, or the avenues of evergreen trees leading to the temples, and before their numerous shrines by the roadside, and in many other places. The torii is of different sizes, from eight feet to twenty-five or thirty-five feet in hight, and is composed of two upright posts from ten to twenty-five feet apart, with two cross-bars at the upper ends of the posts, the first two feet from the top, and the other resting on the tops of the posts and extending a foot or two feet beyond them on each side. They are more commonly composed of wood—the body of trees, from six to twelve inches in diameter—and sometimes of stone cut in square form. The upper cross-bar turns up somewhat at the ends, giving the upper side a concave shape; this is particularly the case when made of stone. Sometimes they are painted, and sometimes left entirely plain. The "torii" means bird's nest, for on it the birds offered to the gods, but not sacrificed, were supposed to rest. Another Shinto emblem is a rope of rice straw, which hangs across the torii, or temple entrance. These vary in size from half an inch to three inches thick. These sacred ropes are often thrown over the trees near the temples, and over the doors of dwellings, and are supposed to secure the blessings of the gods of the neighborhood. Strips of light-colored paper are also seen dangling in connection with the ropes.

There are said to be in Japan some one hundred thousand Shinto temples, including the shrines by the wayside and in the groves sacred to worship. Many of the shrines are not more than five feet in hight. There are about twenty thousand officials, which may perhaps be considered as priests, including the "shrine keepers." They also have a semi-connection with the government, though their duties are few. They are competent to marry people, but do not shave their heads like Buddhistic priests. There is an annual appropriation of $220,000 for Shinto shrines, and $70,000 for public worship. The Shinto worship, however, evidently is not so conspicuous in national affairs as formerly. Within a year the department for administering the affairs of celestial and terrestrial gods sank into being a Board of Religious Instruction. Early in 1877 it was destined to the further humiliation of being quietly transferred to a sub-department of the minister of the interior. In less than ten years the oldest and most sacred institution in the country nearly passed out of existence.

Shinto may well be called a mild form of religion. It has no worship, properly so called, no sacrifices, no hell for sinners, no purgatory, and the immortality of the soul is scarcely believed in, and is only assumed from the immortality of the gods. It however has its virtues; it inculcates reverence for ancestors, and enjoins the following and praticing of good deeds and good conduct. The priests on frequent occasions assemble at the larger temples and chant certain liturgical words, accompanied by a kind of unmusical music, but it cannot be regarded as public worship, as the public are not admitted. The gods are supposed to reside in the temples dedicated to them, and when a worshiper draws near to perform the rites of worship he pulls a rope connected with a kind of bell some fifteen or twenty feet from the ground to call the attention of the god; then all he does is to clap his hands twice, make two low bows, throw two or three cents into a receptacle for the purpose, buy a charm or two to keep away evil influences, and that is all there is of it. People in large numbers make pilgrimages of hundreds of miles to do this, and this only. But I cannot say that God is not just as well pleased with that as he is to hear a fashionable piece of music on the organ, two or three hymns sung, two or three prayers offered, and a tedious sermon of an hour and a half doled out. When a god has a vast amount of business to attend to, and his presence is required in many thousands of places at the same time, it may easily be supposed that he would prefer short services to long ones. If a clap of the hands and a bow of the head answer the purpose, it seems unnecessary to waste two hours in prolonged ceremonies. The bell which is rung to call the attention of the god, can scarcely be called a bell, and is perhaps more a rattle; it is composed of two concave disks of brass or bell-metal, two feet in diameter, joined at the back, and being an inch or two apart in front, like two clam-shells a little ways open. A ball inside, when moved, produces the sound which brings the god to his business.

The chief festival days of the gods at the larger temples are attended with processions, music, dancing, decorated cars, etc., and the occasion constitutes a gala day when pleasure and hilarity are the principal object. On these occasions ancient classical dancings and posturings are given on covered platforms within the temple grounds, when a maiden appears dressed in white and bearing a gohei in her hand, and she is regarded a priestess. It is perhaps to combine religion and pleasure, so that the people may be able to please themselves and the gods at the same time. It is also very kind of the gods not to be so exacting as to require that the people shall put on very solemn faces, look extremely glum, and make themselves very unhappy. It is good in them while they are made happy themselves to be willing that the people should be happy also. I do not like such gods as take pleasure in the unhappiness of their subjects and wish them to throw all enjoyment and pleasure aside, looking so sanctified and miserable as to give the impression that they have not a friend in the world.

The religious ceremonies of the Japanese are not wholly confined to temples; they carry their religion, also, home to their residences. In nearly all Japanese houses is a kamidand or god-shelf, on which is a miniature temple in wood, the same containing tablets covered with paper, on which are written the names of the gods in which the household believe and place their trust, and also monumental tablets bearing the names of dead ancestors and members of the family. Fresh flowers, and particularly the leafy twigs of the cleyera japonica, are placed there as an offering, together with saké, water, and boiled rice. At night a lamp is set in front of the shrine, and its glow-worm glimmer, the same as in Buddhistic families, is one of the features of Japanese life.

But the requirements of Shinto rest light upon the shoulders of the people. The priests make few exactions upon the people, and are seldom required as mediators. There are no angry gods to propitiate, no devils to appease, no hell to render their lives wretched. They have prayers, but they are short and easily said. A new edition of prayers, in Catholic and Church of England style, were published for the use of the devout, but with the peasantry, which is by far the larger class, a simple wish is all the prayer that is necessary. I cannot see why a wish in all cases is not as good as a prayer. A prayer is only a wish after all, and a god with good powers of perception ought to be able to understand a brief mental wish just as well as a long, tedious oral prayer. As they are not in the habit of putting themselves out of the way to answer prayers, it is believed that a simple wish would not be more disregarded. In this busy age of the world "time is money," and if a wish answers the purpose just as well as a prayer it should take the place of the latter in all cases. The Shintoists in many parts of Japan find that all that is necessary to do in the way of prayer and worship is to turn their faces toward the morning sun, rub their hands slowly together, and then make a bow. They find that this answers all purposes, and as the whole ceremony does not require half a minute, they study economy in not wasting time unnecessarily. They have never discovered that the gods are at all offended at the brevity of the ceremony, and so long as the gods are not dissatisfied, the briefer the better. I think I know some worshipers in the Western world who might take a hint from the Japs and economize time very much in the length and frequency of their prayers.

There is no poverty on the part of the Japanese as far as gods are concerned; in fact they have a god for almost everything—a god of wisdom, a god of happiness, of protection of human abodes, of harvests, of learning, of the gate and front court, of the well, of the kitchen, the fireplace, the sleeping apartment, of the garden and fields, and for everything else that can be thought of. If they find a luxury in one or two gods they must be supremely happy in having such a multitude. And where the labor and care pertaining to all the duties and conditions of human life are divided up among a great number of celestial dignitaries, on the principle that "many hands make a light job," the labors are not onerous; whereas those who have but one god to attend to everything and to everybody, might lay too much upon him for a single being. A god should not be overworked. The same considerate feeling that prompts a man not to overwork hie horse or his ass should also prompt him not to overwork his god. All people should endeavor to be reasonable and merciful, as well as godly.

The directions to the Japanese as regards their morning ceremonies are in this wise: "Rise early in the morning, wash your face and hands, rinse out your mouth, and cleanse the body. Then turn your face toward the province of Yamato, strike the palms of the hands together, and worship" by bowing the head low toward the earth. The Japanese of both sexes make it a rule to bathe their bodies once a day. For the more intelligent classes, the more pious, or for those who wish to speak prayers of considerable length, forms have been marked out. The following, translated by Mr. Satow, from the Kimphi Mishi, was put out by the mikado Jantoku in the first half of the thirteenth century:

"From a distance I reverently worship with awe before Ame-no-Mi-hashira and Kuni-no-Mi-hashira (the god and goddess of the wind), to whom is consecrated the palace built with stout pillars at Tatsuta-no-Tachime, in the department of Heguri, in the province of Yamato, I saw with awe. Deign to bless me by correcting the unwitting faults which, seen and heard by you, I have committed, by blowing off and clearing away the calamities which evil gods might inflict, by causing me to live long like the hard and lasting rock, and by repeating to the gods of heavenly origin the petitions which I present every day along with your breath, that they may hear with the sharp-earedness of the forth-galloping colt."

Another is as follows:

"Reverently adoring the great god of the two palaces of Ise in the first place, the eight hundred myriads of celestial gods, the eight hundred myriads of terrestrial gods, all the fifteen hundred myriads (mere figurative expressions) of gods to whom are consecrated the great and small temples in all provinces, all islands, and all places of the great land of eight islands, the fifteen hundred myriads of gods which they cause to serve them, and the gods of branch palaces and branch temples, and Sohado-no-Kami (scare-crow), whom I have invited to the shrine, set upon this divine shelf, and to whom I offer praises day by day, I pray with awe that they will deign to correct the unwitting faults which, heard and seen by them, I hav committed, and blessing and favoring me according to the powers which they severally wield, will cause me to follow the divine example, and to perform good works in the way."

It does not appear that prayers like these, or even longer, would have any more effect than turning toward the sun, rubbing the hands, and bowing the head, or that the gods are any better pleased with them. Shintoism is said to be waning, both as a religion and an engine of government. Western science and Western philosophy are upsetting its cosmogony and its mythology. To those who are becoming acquainted with the teachings of modern scientists of Europe the absurdities and superstitions of these old religions have less and less influence over them. As fast as they learn the absolute truths of nature will they cease to believe in the supernatural and the impossible. Mr. Mori, in defining the system of religion under consideration, says: "The leading idea of Shinto is a reverential feeling toward the dead. As to the political use of it, the state is quite right in turning it to account in support of the absolute government which exists in Japan." This is undoubtedly as correct a definition of the system as can be given in the same number of words. There is probably no one more competent to give an opinion upon the subject than he, and there I am willing to let it rest, fully believing that there is nothing very bad in encouraging a reverence for the dead, especially those who were good and brave. That belief is not calculated to make a people very vicious.

JAPANESE BUDDHISM.

Buddha was a great man and possessed remarkable powers of mind; and considering the age of the world in which he lived he evinced a wonderful mental grasp in his understanding the laws of nature, the supremacy and indestructibility of the universe, the littleness and non existence of the gods, and the benificent consequence of good actions. He was a great philospher, sage, and teacher, a man of acknowledged purity of life and mind, and marvelous kindness toward the human race and all the animal kingdom. His moral teachings never have been excelled, his self-abnegation and humility have not been equaled, and his metaphysical dissertations have never been approached. He taught a system of religion, though intricate yet simple; he discarded all gods, and all images of gods, and it is greatly to be regretted that his numerous followers should have so far departed from the spirit of his teachings as to embrace many gods and to set up the images of them in their places of worship. In the same way it is to be regretted that the simple example and teachings of Jesus should have been disregared and hundreds and even thousands of images set up in and around the places of worship professedly dedicated to his name, surrounded by all the pomp, glitter, tinsel, and dazzle with which the cathedrals and churches of Christian Europe are replete. He was a person decidedly plain in his manners and tastes, and there is no more reason for supposing that were he to revisit the earth to-day he would be pleased with the pageantry, gew-gawry, and gilded ostentation existing in St. Peter's and St. Paul's at Rome, the Domio at Florence, the cathedrals at Milan, Cologne, Paris, London, New York, and many other places, any more than Buddha would be pleased with the images of gods, the gilt, and tinsel in the temples devoted to his memory and teachings. The Japenese, like the Chinese, have appended to his pure and simple teachings a great amount of ridiculous flummery and image-worship. It is a corrupted form of Buddhism which gives me no pleasure to contemplate any more than the contemplation of the great corruptions which have been saddled on to the simple teachings of Jesus.

Buddhism was brought to Japan from Hakusai, in Corea, in the winter of the year 552 in the thirteenth year of the reign of Kin-mie-Tenno, thirteenth of his line since the reign of Jimmu. The books, images, etc., thus brought were given by the mikado to his chief counselor of state, Soga Iname, who deposited them in a part of his palace, thenceforth called Kogen-Jie, or the Temple Facing the Sea. In the year 577, the sixth of Bidatzu Tenno, the succession of Kinmei, the paraphernalia of the religion was again brought to Japan, and its doctrines found favor at court. In the year 585 a terrible pestilence raged over the country, and the counselor of state, Mononobe Moriya, expressed to the monarch his apprehensions that the cause of the scourge was the introduction of the new systen of religion into the country. He was, however, unable to fully convince the mikado that his views were correct, though he succeeded in obtaining an order that the rites of the new religion should not be celebrated. The temples were accordingly burned and the images cast into the rivers. Moriya was afterwards killed while maintaining law and order in a local disturbance.

Mayado Oojie was a contemporary of Moriya, and was a warm advocate of the new religion. He is to this day regarded as a special friend of Buddhism; he is designated as Sho-tuku-tai-shi, which means "an exceedingly virtuous son." Images of him, representing him both in youth and old age, seated and crowned, are to be seen in many Japanese temples, the same as the images of saints Joseph, Christopher, Sebastian, etc., are seen in Christian cathedrals and churches.

Buddhism was largely spread over Japan by the introduction of Chinese literature, which the priests readily accepted. They were the first to adopt the Chinese characters, and their use in the country dates from that time.

In 624 two priests arrived in Japan from Corea; their names were Kan-ro and Taku-sek. The first was elevated to the rank of so-jo (chief priest), and the second so-dzu (vicar-general). These were the first Buddhist priests in Japan to whom a grade was given by the government. In the year 700, Do-sho, chief priest of a temple, died and was cremated—the first instance of cremation being practiced in Japan.

As the new religion grew to be strong in the country it began to divide into sects, much the same as Christianity did at a later period. Do-sho built a temple and founded a sect called Ho-so (knowledge of a myriad subjects). His tenets were divided under five heads: "The name of things, the form of things, discrimination, true intelligence, form of the soul." The sect San-ron-shin was founded by Yeka; the tenets were thus divided: "The medium arguments, the hundred arguments, the twelve gates." It embraced principles enjoining complete indifference to worldly affairs, through personal nullification. This sect has become extinct. Men are not fond of self-extinguishment.

Gem-ba-so-jo in 735 founded the Ga-sha sect, the doctrines of which were taken from the prayer-books by that name. They are crowded into thirty volumes, and are divided under two headings—the control of the passions, as selfishness, covetousness, etc., and the control of the thoughts. This sect has been absorbed by others which sprung up afterward.

In 749 Do-sho and Do-ji made a visit to China, and upon their return brought with them a work of twenty-seven volumes, and upon the doctrines contained in them the sect of Jo-jitzu-shin was founded. They taught the utter absence of substantiality in all things. Life was but a prolonged dream, the objects surrounding it mere delusive shadows or mirage, the product entirely of the imagination. This queer sect has been absorbed by those which hold that there is some reality in things. About the same time Kochi Dai-so-dzu built a temple, and founded a sect upon the teachings of Ten-shin-bo-satzu of India, who was one of the disciples of Buddha. He taught that the soul resembles a fair page, upon which the artist might trace a design, and that special care is needed to prevent the impression of evil designs, in order to which the thoughts should continually be upon Buddha.

In 754 Kan-chi-osho was possessed of three hundred shari—the small, pearl-like substance which remains from the cremation of a Buddhistic saint or priest—also certain books named Gen-gi (original signification), Mongu (rare and excellent collection), Shi-kan (perpetuation of that which is admirable). These he presented to the mikado, who accepted them with manifest pleasure, and who, with four hundred and thirty-four of the chief officers of his court, became pupils of the priest. In close proximity to the palace a temple was erected, where the five commandments of Buddha were first promulgated in Japan. These commandments prohibited the destruction of life, dishonesty, adultery, falsehood, and wine-drinking. To these were appended six radicals: eyes, nose, ear, tongue, body, mind; six unclean things, valueless as dirt: color, sound, smell, taste, touch.

In 813, Kobo-dai-shi, the compiler of the present Japanese syllabary, founded a temple and a new sect upon what he had heard while traveling in India and other countries. He learned Pali, Sanskrit, and Chinese, and became familiar with the literature of those languages. His sect was called Shin-gon, or "true words." Its principles taught that the subtle points of an argument should be seized and elaborated. It points out three paths to perfect bliss, which means absorption into Buddha. It teaches that on all sides are the six associated things, earth, water, fire, wind, air, and mind, and that the multitude are possessed of these six things, the proper control and use of which lead to perfection. The road to bliss is by the observation of and deduction from the buddings of spring, the bloom of summer, the fall of the leaf in autumn, the withering of the verdure in winter; when looking over the earth in contemplating its vastness; when on the water, its roundness; and when examining three-cornered objects, fire. By meditation and solitude to be able to reach paradise. The head is compared to a high mountain on which the saints assemble, and the body to the sea which encircles it. Within the mind are seated the thousand worlds; multitudes of lotus-flowers should spring therefrom. The body is likened to a garden guarded by an iron fence; the mind resembles the broad seas and rivers; the head is like the chief of saints in paradise; the eyes like the god of hades; the body like good actions and evil thoughts and deeds. In the sixteen large countries, the five hundred smaller countries, and the countless others as numerous as millet-seed, there exist gods great and small, and in all things extol the five elements—earth, water, fire, wind, and metals. The correct observance of these things leads to annihilation and bliss through absorption into Buddha. The priests of these sects were forbidden to eat other than vegetable food; saké was prohibited and celibacy enforced.

It is needless to follow up and describe the numerous sects which arose, one after another, during the succeeding centuries, and the fine, metaphysical distinctions upon which they are founded. There seems to be no end to the little differences and distinctions that forever arise in religious and creedal speculations. The Yamabushi is a sect of wandering priests, though not absolutely mendicant, do not decline such sums of money as may be given them for such religious services as they are ready to render. They have their defined walks, and pay periodical visits to certain localities. They are particularly called upon to pray to Kojin, the god of culinary affairs, and to offer up prayers for the sick, absent relatives, and good fortune. They look back upon Fudo as their patron, and pray to him continually. Before praying they blow loudly on a conch-shell, probably to call the attention of the god. There are branches of this sect called beggars, strollers, etc. One of these sects pass from door to door, playing on a native instrument, and receiving a few small coins in their fans, which they extend to receive the pittances they deem their due. They do not speak, but after playing a few additional notes they pass quietly on to the next house.

The Buddhists have monasteries and nunneries to which all the sects contribute in common. Celibacy is enjoined. The nuns are drawn from all classes of society, though some nunneries admit only the wealthy. It is not uncommon for women who wish to be separated from their husbands, but fail to obtain a divorce, to retire these nunneries and remain three or four years and then come out into the world again fully absolved from the bonds which bound them to their husbands, ready for new engagements.

OBJECTS OF BUDDHISTIC ADORATION.

The objects of adoration of this class of religionists are very numerous. Some sects devote themselves to particular objects, leaving others without attention. The temples have special gods or special divinities and saints. In one respect the Buddhists are unlike Christians, between whom (especially the Romish branch) and themselves there are so many features of similarity. The Buddhists have no mediator or intercessor, but each man has to perform his own work, to earn his own happiness, and absolutely to be his own savior. But they have a great number of patrons and saints to whom they address prayers and from whom they ask favors.

Taishak-ten-a (heavenly emperor) is prayed to for success and protection in this life, the future not being within his province.

Mari-shi-ten is the great patron of all persons, young or old, learning, writing, reading, dancing, singing, or a trade. His image is represented as standing on the back of a galloping wild boar, and has six arms and three faces. The boar being the last of the twelve zodiacal signs, and preceding the first sign Ne on repetitions, implies before the beginning. The three faces, the eyes and countenances tend to all directions. The six hands denote dexterity at work. This is a favorite god with the Nichiren sect. [TO BE CONTINUED.]

The Banquet Reception.—Concluded.

At the close of Mr. Mendum's remarks, the chairman said: There is already a wave of Liberalism within the churches as well as outside of them. I now refer to those glorious champions of liberty who, though educated in the clerical profession, have taken their stand outside of the church in order to be defenders of human reason and Freethought. Such men as George Chainey and Miln, who have evoluted out of the clerical profession because it was too small and narrow, are represented here to-night, and I will call upon the ex-Reverend S. P. Putnam to speak for "Our Ex-Clergymen."

MR. PUTNAM: I wish that George Chainey or Mr. Miln were here to-night to respond to this toast. Either of them, perhaps, could give a better insight into the struggles and sacrifices of those who have evoluted out of the clerical profession than I can. We must admit, when we look at such men as Miln, Chainey, and others, that, after all, the clerical profession has produced, in a certain way, some noble fruit. But, when we look upon our own experience, there is a feeling of regret that we ever entered the clerical profession. It seems that the ten years spent in that profession was a waste of time. And yet, I sometimes look upon it in another way, sometimes wondering if such men as Chainey and Miln would have been produced and become the real Liberal powers that they are to-day, whether they would have ever reached their position of great influence and helpfulness, if they had passed through any other experience than that of the clerical profession. And that brings before us the question of whether there ought to be a clerical profession or not. We know that the clerical profession as it exists to-day is a bar to human progress. But we rejoice to know that even this great body of sixty thousand priests throughout the United States of America—for in a sense they are all priests—we are glad that this great body is more or less thrilled with the spirit of liberty and progress, that it is not altogether devoted to superstition, but that there is in it something of that mighty tide of progress that is sweeping over the whole world. And when we think of the clerical profession, not simply in an abstract way as occupying a certain position, but as men—honest men—as I think a great many of them are, we must extend to them our profoundest sympathy, for we feel that they are occupying an unfortunate position. And if there is to be any such profession as this, it is a profession that in the nature of things, should occupy the van of humanity; and if we are to have men exclusively devoted to what we call the great questions of religion, universal humanity and philosophy, if there is to be a class of men set aside from the common occupations of life, with leisure and opportunity to cultivate these sentiments of humanity and all those higher flowers of feeling, as it were, we must affirm that such a class should be thoroughly intelligent, free, and forward-looking in every respect. We must admit that to-day the clerical profession occupies no such position as this. Unfortunately, it looks backward and not forward; unfortunately, it is thoroughly devoted to fixed religious opinions or creeds, and not to religious thought, or religion as it might be; and so far as the clerical profession occupies any such position as this it is a bar to human progress, and the sooner we sweep away this clerical profession and set these sixty thousand ministers to work at something useful the better it will be for humanity. I believe that when we look at the clerical profession as it has existed in the world, when we make a deep and accurate study of human history in a scientific way, we shall find that this great body of men have, in a certain vague way, answered some human need, and therefore I believe that when these men become truly Liberal and scientific, and devoted to the interests of the human race only, when they are evoluted clearly out of the clerical profession into the broader field of humanity, there will not be any necessity for them to go forth into what we call secular business affairs, but that they will occupy instead the position of Mr. Chainey in Boston and of Mr. Adler in New York. They will form a great company of educated, liberal-minded men, who shall be the teachers of humanity in the higher spheres of thought; men having the poet's insight and the fullest freedom of the soul; who, instead of hanging on to the skirts of humanity, and listening to the voice of a bishop or pope in order to find out what they shall say, will stand in the front of their congregations, the real leaders, heroes and martyrs, if need be, of humanity. And so my hope and belief is that when this present clerical profession has been swept entirely away it will be succeeded by one different in spirit and purpose, represented now by such inspired and brilliant men as George Chainey, Felix Adler, and George Miln.

Mr. Leland was next presented to the friends in the following words by the President:

I am now going to introduce to you a man who has attempted the impossible. Liberals have hitherto been a rope of sand, without coherence or organization. Mr. T. C. Leland, secretary of the National Liberal League, has attemped the impossible in saying that this state of things shall not continue in the future. I ask him to speak to the toast, "The National Liberal League."

[Mr. Leland's speech will be published later. It was a written address, and he wishes to reserve it for extension, amendment, and use at Watkins and elsewhere on his western trip to the League congress this fall. It was a half humorons and wholly dead-earnest philippic on "Eternal Vigilance," showing that we hadn't any great amount of it left to swear by in the United States—and pretty much all there is has been garnered up and put to use in the National Liberal League.]

Mr. Wakeman then continued:

That Liberalism is coming to be a powerful element in this country is largely due to the fact that it has gained access to the press, and is gaining Liberal organs of a daily character, and that is particularly true in this city through the establishment of a little newspaper called Truth. And one of the most laughable things in this world is the policy of silence by which this little paper is met by its grand and august compeers. But the time will come when they will be pierced through and through by its wit and sarcasm and ability. And now let us hear from one who has done so much to establish it, if he is present, Mr. Louis F. Post. I ask him to speak to the toast, "The Independent Press."

Mr. Post said:

Mr. Chairman, Ladies, and Gentlemen: I was requested to respond to the toast, "The Secular Press," and in a thoughtless moment I consented; but when I endeavored to gather my wits abont me I found there was very little I could say that was favorable to the secular press in connection with the Liberal movement which Mr. Bennett represents. It has been supposed that the secular press is the leader and former of public opinion. That is a mistake. It may reflect public opinion, but it never forms or leads public opinion. In the country the editor is frightened by the cry of "Stop my paper;" and the metropolitan publisher is frightened by the cry of "Stop my advertisement." There is not a paper in this city that dares to fly in the face of public prejudice. They are all controled by that prejudice through the cry of "Stop my advertisement." It is not a mere question of more or less profits, but one of absolute existence. Therefore I have come to the conclusion in responding to this toast to speak not of the press, but for it. Upon the press in this city are a great many Liberal men—the majority, I think, are Liberal-minded men, but for the sake of bread for their families and themselves they are compelled to smother their consciences. In speaking for those men I think I express their feelings, as I do my own, when I say that the community owes Mr. Bennett a heavy debt, a debt that may not soon be recognized, but in time, either to himself or to his memory, it will be fully paid. There are reforms to be accomplished, and some men must go ahead, bearing the heat and burden of the day, their flesh torn by the brambles of bigotry and their feet bruised by the stones of contempt; they suffer that others may enjoy. Such a man I regard Mr. Bennett It is but seldom given to those men to experience the thrill that comes from the knowledge of a life work completed and a victory won, but it is possible that this boon is in store for Mr. Bennett. Notwithstanding the secular press, public opinion is being created with startling rapidity. Despite the secular press, the age of reason has dawned. When John Brown closed his eyes upon the world the monster of human slavery was in the zenith of its power, but Wendell Phillips, his contemporary, still lives to wear the laurel wreath of victory and point with pride to the scars of the conflict. Thomas Paine went down to the grave disheartened, his honor smirched, and his fame obscured, but Mr. Bennett may live to see Paine's memory honored again and his fame shine with a brighter luster than it ever shone. I am not over-sanguine in asserting that the religions of superstition and faith are rapidly losing their hold on the minds of men. This fact is attested by the evidence of keener and less partial observers than I. Henry George, one of the clearest investigators and most eloquent writers on social questions, and a man who still clings to the religious traditions of his childhood, in his work on "Progress and Poverty," says that "in the popular mind Christianity is dying at the root, as the old paganisms were dying when Christianity entered the world." And only a few days ago there appeared in the North American Review a remarkable article from the pen of Henry Ward Beecher, which if any one here has not yet read I hope he will not let forty-eight hours go by before procuring and reading it through. I will quote a few passages from it. He says: "No ingenuity or eloquence can persuade men that a god who for ten thousand years has labored to produce an infinite population of damnable souls can with decency be called our father. . . . Little by little the pulpit shrinks from medieval theology. Ministers first gloss it by new interpretations, then they prudently hold it in suspense, then doubt it, then cast it away. . . . The school of the ascetic has corrupted men's minds and made discord between the Bible and nature. To lean to one's reason has been declared a sin and a snare. What, then, shall we lean upon? If a man may not use his eyes, what may he see with? . . . Is man forbidden to use his own rsason while commanded to believe the reason of the church? Did God sit down and write the Bible, or did he whisper all of its statements in the ears of inspired men, who became mechanical reporters? . . . Much of what is called Infidelity is a revolt from the errors of old theology. The church, the Bible, the creed have been confounded with religion. Neither church, book, nor theology is of value except as an educating instrument. They have no sacredness of their own. . . . The signs are in the air. Men no longer preach doctrines to which they swore in their ordination vows—or they give them new meanings at variance with historic facts."

Mr. Beecher not only testifies thus to the dawn of the age of reason, but he proves his own advance by expressing opinions that differ from those proclaimed by Mr. Ingersoll no more than the language in which they are clothed falls short of Ingersoll's eloquence. And when you remember that, next to Mr. Ingersoll, Mr. Beecher is the most eloquent man in America, you can judge how radical these opinions are, and what his punishment would have been if he had uttered these sentiments ten years ago. He would not have escaped through the crevice in a split jury on that issue theu.

But what has produced this great change in public opinion? Not the press, but the labors, the sacrifices, the humilations, the honest purpose and steadfast conduct of men like Thomas Paine, who laid the corner-stone of Infidelity and Freethought; like Bennett, who is rearing the superstructure; and like Ingersoll, who adorns the edifice with his eloquence and guards it with shafts of sarcasm shot from the bow of humor. This revolt of reason against superstition has had and is having a wider and nobler influence than its promoters have anticipated or suppose. If there had been no Infidels there would have been no abolitionists, and chattel slavery would have this nation by the throat to-day, as, under the influence of superstition, it had it before the war. And, in regard to the social and industrial questions which are pressing forward for solution, if Infidelity had not freed men's minds from the thrall of ecclesiasticism these questioners would be trodden beneath the heel of the church, and the idle rich would go on piling up wealth beyond all human events, while toiling millions were sinking deeper and deeper into the slough of servitude and despair, without a protest, with the sanction of the Almighty God, and under the unctuous smile of the anointed. Infidelity, humanity, and progress go hand in hand, while superstition, cruelty, and retrogression are in league with one another. The disenthralled generations of coming time will honor no men of our day more than those who are sacrificing bodily comfort and mental peace for the physical and intellectual freedom of their posterity. Foremost among such men I regard the Infidel whom we welcome home to-night from his triumphal tour around the globe.

Said President Wakeman:

One of the most beautiful features in the trinity of results to which the last speaker referred is Liberal institutions, established by Liberals. A few years ago it was said that Liberalism was principally negative, and it was true, but that state of affairs is changing, and instead of a confused, unsettled, disorganized mass, it is becoming constructive and organic, knows pretty well what it is about, has got a mind of its own for the arrangement of affairs, and has the power to make trouble for its opponents, and is making it; so that before long Liberals will claim their rightful place in the control of human affairs. Science is becoming the great new faith of humanity, and is breaking the fetters and lifting the slaves of mankind. To this end the Society of Humanity exists in New York, and I call upon Prof. A. L Rawson to say a few words in its behalf.

Mr. Rawson responded to the following effect:

At this late hour you will hardly expect me to give the history of the life of this Society of Humanity and what it is doing, but you will expect, probably, a few words in that direction.

Believing that organization was necessary to secure good results from our labors, a few men and women associated themselves together into what is now called the Society of Humanity, and became a power. I need not remind those who are present, except possibly a few of you, that, although they have not done much work among themselves, they have been the promoters of very much good work outside of themselves. The Liberal League has had much assistance from members of this society, personal and moral. The Liberal League will continue to receive such assistance from us until it gains the object for which it was created. There are other movements on foot also that owe to the Society of Humanity their nerve. We have listened to-night to a short account of what Mr. Bennett has seen and done in his pilgrimage. He made use of one sentence which, it seems to me, was not quite complete. He said that Egypt had furnished more of the bread of the world than any other country of equal size; and that is true, but Egypt has also furnished more ideas to the world, of a religious character, than any other country in the world of equal extent. The whole world, both the East and the West, is indebted to Egypt for many of the ideas that have ruled the world from Moses's and Mohammed's times to the present. To-day there is going on a struggle there that may change the face of the world in its religious aspect. It may be the beginning of a new era. Whatever may be the end of the war, its beginning is simply the foreclosure of a mortgage which English people have had upon the government of Egypt, and in which the Egyptian people have no interest. In the foreclosure of that mortgage the neighbors may become interested and the disturbance spread over the whole of Europe, and then Egypt will profit by it. If I was a young man my face would be set toward Egypt to help that people to free themselves; and I believe that a dozen men well prepared with scientific knowledge could assist the Egyptians to free themselves from all their enemies. I hold that there are few people in the government of England who are real humanitarians, or who would be accepted as members of our society should they apply. Those who are pronounced Liberals are led by those who are not Liberals, and who are supporting the established church, and that church has been at the right hand of the established king in all ages to oppress mankind. The established governments here, although made by the people, have become a monopoly, and can elect themselves to office time after time in spite of the people; and the church, that is almost established, because it is paid and supported practically by the government, is supporting that whole monopoly of government, and will until the people wake up and shake it off, or sink deeper and deeper until we become slaves in name, as in fact we are now.

The Society of Humanity has for its direct purpose to enlighten the people of this country until they can free themselves; not by war, but peaceably, through the ballot-box and through sending just and true men into public places to do the work that we expect of them as the servants and not the masters of the people. The Society of Humanity does intend to establish here a new religion, founded upon humanity, and not upon an impossible god, and they will welcome every man who has a head and heart to aid this work. It is a grand step in human progress. Its ultimate success depends largely upon pecuniary success, and the Society of Humanity is already established upon a solid, substantial basis; it has had through bequests a sufficient amount of property left to it to place it beyond any possibility of want; it can meet all demands in a legitimate way, and therefore no one need be deterred from joining it by fears for its continued existence.

The President then spoke. Said he:

Another element toward this constructive phase of Liberalism has been the founding of philosophies upon scientific ideas and principles, philosophies which entirely take the place of theology, or, if they do not go so far, appropriate the theological forms and reconstruct them in such a way as to entirely change them from being a phase of popular superstition. Among the leaders in this country who have contributed most to this great work is our distinguished friend and philosopher, S. P. Andrews. I delight to call him our American Hegel, and I am pleased to say that he will respond to the toast, "The Growing Spirit of Unity and Efficiency Among Our Reformers."

The "Greet Universal Preacher" spoke thus:

If we were in the Liberal Club, and if my friend, Mr. Wakeman, had made a violent assault upon me, as he sometimes does there, then I might perhaps say something worth while, but I have never found the influences attending the dinner-table to be particularly inspiring in the direction of eloquence or clearness of thought. You have all read among the beautiful stories that are told regarding Charles Lamb, one to the effect that when Lamb and a party of friends had stowed themselves in a stage coach, after dining generously at a country tavern, the driver, desiring to take in another passenger, presented himself at the coach-door with the inquiry, "All full inside?" and Lamb replied: "I don't know how it is with the others, but that last piece of pigeon-pie did the business for me." I am just now rather too full for facile utterance.

I think the most desirable thing for us in the present stage of affairs is to become thoroughly philosophical in the matter of reforms, so as to see the operation of principles as they flow through the world of human nature from age to age, and as they are founded in the nature of things. There are great rythms in human forces which come from undelying principles, and if we can grasp those principles, take them, as it were, in our hands and weigh them, we can judge with greater precision the signs of the times, and gauge the degree of progress of the world. Whenever there is an aggregation of human forces or any forces, whenever there is a condensed, immovable condition of things, then reform necessarily begins by disintegration, by dissolving. To illustrate: If a crystal of ice had been formed in the muddy street, and had taken up into its composition a portion of foreign matters, rendering it imperfect; and if our purpose were to reconstruct that crystal in accordance with the laws of crystallization, so as to exclude all imperfections, the first stage of our process would be to reduce it to a state of perfect solution; to separate and distinctify the individual molecules. The second (or, in a sense, the third) step is to recrystallize without the assumption of any impurities. This reveals to us the progress of humanity. If we go back to the old condition of affairs under the Catholic church in the middle ages, we find the primitive condition which Compte called the prior synthesis of human society. Then comes a breaking up, which he denominated analysis, and we are now beginning to be prepared for a new synthesis. My technicalities for these three stages are synstasis, analysis, and synthesis. Four hundred years ago, with the death of John Huss, or rather with his life, which was extinguished under the flames of persecution, there began a remarkable drift in the humanity of Europe toward individualization, toward the assertion of the right of private judgment in matters of conscience, which culminated, through Martin Luther, in the great Protestant movement. That movement went on until, under the spur and inspiration of Rousseau and Voltaire, it ripened into the French Revolution and political freedom.

In our age, and within a few years past, we have begun another forward step in the direction of social freedom. These three mark the three stands, religious, political, and social, of the great modern reformatory movement. The process of disintegration is just now beginning to come to an end. It has done so with some of us, and that change will occur with many more within the next five or ten years. What then? Why, a new drift; a return from the aphelion of this career, and a new progression toward the constitution of a new human society that is to occupy this planet. We have gained one stage of the evolutions; we have turned the angle, and we are coming back toward a constructive, to replace destructive reform. The world is waking up to the fact that we are about to enter upon that drift. With regard to Mr. Bennett, what he has done and is doing has been well stated here to-night, and what I wish to say is a word with regard to what he ought to do, and what he must and will do in the future. A large part of what he has accomplished in the past has been simply the building of a pulpit for himself, and he occupies such a one at this time as no other man in this country does. For the purpose of promulgating his ideas and helping forward the business of constructive reform, what he should now do is to stump this whole country, every state and county in it, and stimulate the people to organize at every point over this whole land, Leagues, organizations, combinations, alliances, under whatsoever name and in whatsoever relationship to other parts of the Liberal movement, that shall help forward those great principles of freedom, and forward the drift of humanity toward organic constructive reform and the building up of the loose, unorganized material into an actual power. We should be the strongest party in the world to-day if we were organized, but indolence and want of co-operation have made us weak. We are nowhere when compared with the same number of religionists with the same amount of brains, if we could find them, because they have the added force of organization. Organization is the word of the future; we must have organization, but such organization as shall, instead of suppressing the individual in his struggle for freedom, come to his aid in behalf of freedom and for the purpose of carrying out the objects and designs of the most Liberal and exalted men on the planet. Organization is, like fire, a very bad master, but a very excellent servant. Organizations in the past have been our masters and have oppressed us, and consequently the people have taken on a fear in regard to organization. We must make organizations scientific and beneficent, such as shall be a blessing rather than a curse. This is to be the work of the immediate future. Reforms come rapidly along, and in the mean time we must act, and not merely speculate. Therefore I speak for the Liberal Leagues, and of what I think Mr. Bennett should do to help the people to attain an organic form of reform in the immediate future.

Mr. Wakeman next introduced the poet of the evening thus:

Another phase of the progress of Liberalism has been its representation in art. It has been said that we had no art. It is no longer true. From Shelley down to the present we have had the most glorious poems and products of art inspired by the love of liberty. And of those who among us have been the representatives of that new power, I have the honor and pleasure to name our friend, Mr. S. P. Putnam. I hope he will give us a short poem as a specimen of this new phase of Liberalism, Liberal art.

Mr. Putnam then read the appended poem:

The day is broadening far, but still the night
Broods with its shadow o'er the eager sight,
And foul birds flutter 'gainst the golden dawn,
And spit their poison though their fangs are gone;
Backward and forward tides of darkness flow
And chilling blasts rebuff the morning's glow;
The "Leaves of Grass" that sparkle with sweet light,
Where nature's splendor quivers bare and bright—
Quick mirrors of the truth's most beauteous form—
These are bedraggled by the crawling worm,
Who sees in anything most fair no more
Than what his own corrupted heart can pour.
Not yet, alas!. not yet the day supreme
Reigns in the heaven, although with many a gleam
It dashes on the slow-receiling dark;
Still the retreating dogs of terror bark,
The right is dimmed with many a ghastly wrong;
The despots still their bitter sway prolong;
The hands of labor feel the cursed chain,
Its wealth-creating instrument no gain
But buttressed throne whence reckless power defies
The people's voice; Invention's noble prize
That belts the world—the railroad's gleaming coil—
Seems but a spider's web to catch the spoil
And feed the pampered body of the few,
While millions find no fruit from what they do.
We are not ready yet to sing the song
Of peace and quiet—not to us belong
The perfect laurels—this feast is by the way,
Not on the summit of man's golden day.
And yet what glories meet our ample view,
How beautiful the dawn, how vast the blue,
Sparkling with thousand radiant shapes sublime
That bring the message of the better time.
The night may linger, but our souls are free;
The worms may crawl, the harvest yet will be;
The bats may spread their wings against the sun,
But that which made them finds its race is run.
The wrong does perish, though by slow degrees,
And more and more the wand of science frees;
Truth walks the earth and builds its kingdom fair,
E'en from the desert plucking jewels rare.
Justice at last makes rich reward for all,
Displacing charity with freedom's call—
For charity is but the ancient vice
By which the social sins are painted nice.
He wants no charity whose simple right
To live, work, think, and act is granted quite.
And this shall come, for man with man shall grow
In one vast brotherhood. Yet in the glow
Of intense interplay of every mind
Society will be all rights combined.
'Tis not in sacrifice, but in the flower
Of personal freedom that the greatest power
Blooms in the life united of the race;
Check one man's action and you mar the grace
Of our humanity's effulgent crown.
The strongest suffer if the least bow down.
That crown, it shall be stainless yet and shine,
And light all pathways to one end divine.
To man's great empire o'er this planet wide,
Commanding ray of sun and sweep of tide,
Gemmed with the stars, and glittering with the fire
Drawn from the mountain's heart; and our desire,
All that we hope and dream, shall be fulfilled;
Truth seeker, truth, thy noblest world shall build.

The President made his closing remarks in this wise:

This poem ends the programme for the evening. I feel, and I think the feeling must be universal, that it is good for us to have met together on this occasion. The lesson of this occasion and meeting is that we must stand by each other when we are under fire. When an attack is made upon one of us Liberals because of his Liberalism we must rally to his support, and in doing that we will gain the respect of each other and of the world.

The position Mr. Bennett was placed in was an exceptional one, and called forth the rarest qualities of human nature, unswerving faithfulness to principle under ignominious persecution; and from his friends it called forth similar qualities, that when a man is under fire we must stand by him. A man's failings are atoned for by a great service to humanity; all their weaknesses and sins are forgotten by virtue of that noble aspiration and self-sacrifice in aid of human progress. That gives a man absolution and lifts him above all his failings. Another lesson of this occasion is that we must learn to combine. We have combined around this table to welcome Mr. Bennett. Can we ever do it again for any other purpose? Can we stand shoulder to shoulder for the accomplishment of any particular thing in the progress of the Liberal cause? I hope we can and may. How far this shall aid us in the future, and how far we shall succeed in bringing the dawn we have spoken of, we cannot tell; but it rests with each one of us to further it by our labors as we can. Our reward will be the respect and esteem of each other, of the world, and of our own consciences and hearts. We are thankful that our friend Bennett has returned; we congratulate him from the bottom of our hearts, and we will stand by him in the future, when under fire, as we have in the past, and we will lend him our help in all his labors for humanity.

Votes of thanks to Mr. Wakeman for the admir able way in which he discharged his duty as chairman, and to Messrs. Seaver and Mendum for making so long a journey to be present, were unanimously passed.

Is Mind Material?

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Perhaps you will remember, if not this will remind you, that I commenced the discussion of this question more than a year ago, the first article of which was published in The Truth Seeker of January 15, 1881; the second article in that of February 26th; the third article in that of April 30th, and the fourth in the issue of August 13th, which was about the time you left on your round-the-world trip. I had intended to write just one more article on this subject, and as I could not do so before you started I made up my mind to wait until you returned, if you ever should and if I should liv till then, and try to hav the last article ready to appear then, if you were willing to publish it in your columns. And inasmuch as it has been so long since the first article appeared, and such long intervals between the publication of the others, it seems that, in order to present my ideas in any sort of connection, it is necessary to briefly recapitulate some of the main points presented in my former communications.

In the first article my proposition was that mind was an immaterial spiritual eutity; that it is the I am that I am, the thinking, reasoning myself; that thought is a volition of the mind, as is walking or speaking a volition of the physical organs; that I hav the control of my own will, my own thoughts, my own actions; that mind is the power that governs every act of our lives, and that the principle is recognized and acted upon in all the transactions of life everywhere and under all circumstances; that mind governs matter; that if mind is the result of material organization, in cases of very great excitement of the mind, resulting in death to the body, then the mind, the effect, has destroyed the cause of its own existence; the material organization has committed suicide.

It is in its operations and results like the Kilkenny cats that fought each other until there was nothing left of either but the ends of their tails, and if they had only fought a little longer there would hav been nothing left, and that would hav been a perfect illustration of the Materialistic problem.

That is how Materialism develops its principles. We know that the mind can and has killed the body in hundreds and thousands of cases by its excited action alone, independent of every other cause.

My second article was devoted principally to arguments to show that the material organization was merely a medium of communication which the mind manifested in itself to the material world. That in all the different grades of life, from the lowest up to man, the same rule holds true; that in even the vegetable world we can see manifestations of life in a manner that could never be exhibited to us only through those peculiar organizations. And so with the animal creation. We see life, instinct, if not reason, manifested in the different animal organizations that we could never see or know only through those separate and distinct specimens of creation.

That the ear, an organ to convey facts to the mind by sound, does not hear. I hear the sound; the ear knows no more about it than a block of wood. And the eye is merely an organism answering the purpose of a telescope or a microscope to present objects to the mind to myself. The object is imprinted on the retina of my eye on the same principle and in the same way that an object is imprinted upon the object-glass in the camera of the photographer, and by some means, as incomprehensible as my own existence or that of universe, is conveyed to my mind. But the eye itself sees nothing. I see through the eye. If I were dead the impression might remain on the retina of the eye, but there would be no sight, no seeing. And this seeing and hearing are under the control of the mind, and so is the brain subject to my will. I can think about one thing or another just as I please, and the brain must mind its business and do as I will if it can. The mind seems to be enthroned supreme over and independent of this material organization for its existence, with power to govern and control the whole concern, and, according to the law of cause and effect, cannot be the result of the organizations and forces that are subject to its control.

My third article consists of a few arguments to show that it is no more inconceivable that the mind could exist independent of material organization than that material organization could produce mind; that it does not prove that mind or the life principle is, necessarily, the result of material organization, because we never see it manifested through those peculiar organizations; that to make the observation that nothing exists that is not material or the result of material organization, does not prove it to be so. That if I cannot understand my own existence, how am I to know all the possibilities of a spiritual existence of which I can know nothing through the medium of those material organs of sense, which were designed only to be a means of communication with the material universe? That if we cannot know how mind exists, neither can we know how matter exists. The one is as much a mystery as the other. That every effect must hav a cause, that if the mind is not the result of material organization, what is the cause, and what is the cause of matter That we are told that we cannot go outside of the universe for the very good reason that there is no outside of the universe for the cause. That the universe is material, and that what is not in the universe is nothing, and that mind must be the result of matter and material. That there must necessarily be an intelligent cause for all that exists. That upon the principle by which we learn everything we know, cause and effect, we cannot conceive of an intelligent existence without an intelligent cause, and that in our own existence can be found a parallel that will illustrate the principle. That the cause of all things occupies the same relation to the universe that my mind does to my body; that eternal, self-existent, supreme-intelligence mind is manifested in and through the universe in the same manner as my mind is manifested through this material organization; and that that intelligence is the soul of the universe, the all in all, the Great I Am.

My fourth article was on the propositon that force was not an inherent property of matter; that if mind (life) was not the result of material organization, but an eternal self-existent mind, supreme intelligence, the soul of the universe, then it was entirely unnecessary to bring in the proposition that force is an inherent property of matter to supply the place of God, to account for all the life and intelligence manifested in and through those material organizations; that something must be eternal, without beginning and without end, whether matter or spirit, or both, or else nothing could now be in existence. And, according to all our experience and knowledge here, mind is the power that controls matter; that influences and controls other minds; that controls every enterprise among men; that moves the world. And why should we not reasonably come to the conclusion that the universe is controled in the same manner by an intelligent, invisible power—a mind, a spirit, a God—who handles matter as he pleases, as we do as far as we hav the power? and that it is as susceptible of proof that matter was created by an intelligent power as that it eternally existed without a cause, and that, by some process of evolution as mysterious and incomprehensible as its eternal existence without a cause would be, it should produce intelligence, produce a mind to control and govern itself; which would be just as inconceivable and incomprehensible as to hav been created by an intelligent being, and much more so, because it would be contrary to all our experience, the analogy of things in nature, cause and effect, and every rule by which we are governed in the acquisition of knowledge.

The generally-received opinion that matter cannot be annihilated, and that consequently it must be eternal, is not susceptible of proof. All we know is that we cannot annihilate matter, which does not prove that the Almighty could not We cannnot create it, but that does not prove that he cannot create matter. How do we know but that the Almighty has annihilated worlds of matter? How can we know but that the Great I Am could blot out this universe in the twinkling of an eye and still exist, the same eternal, self-existent being that he has eternally existed?

It would seem that the Almighty has given us assurance enough of his all-sufficiency in what we can see in the universe; in the infinit variety which he has given us; in the countless millions of different orders and forms of existences he has created to convince us that all things are possible with him, except to contradict himself, or make nature contradict nature, or himself to commit suicide. It would not seem to be possible for the eternal to annihilate himself.

I hav, as briefly as would seem consistent in order to prescribe any sort of connection of the ideas advanced in my former articles on this question, referred to a few of the main points of argument involved in the consideration of this subject before presenting my final proposition and the reasons I may be able to giv in support of it.

Darwinism Boiled Down.

Elmina inquires in a recent number of The Truth Seeker for the best brief manual of Darwin's principal work. There is no such abridgment, and probably none could be made, at least in the present state of science. The "Origin of Species" is not a large book and the argumentative part of it is quite short, but it is crammed with examples and illustrations, and upon these depend its value. The coming popular literature of Darwin ism must, I should think, take the form of exposition rather than abbreviation—the facts of natural history which Darwin takes for understood cannot be packed any closer, but need, on the contrary, to be explained to those who do not know them. There is a book entitled "What Darwin Saw," designed for children and unscientific readers. Expositions of Darwinism as applied to various subjects may also be found in the Popular Science Monthly and some numbers of the International Scientific Series.

The outline of the Darwinian theory is easily defined. All species of plants and animals multiply faster than they can continue to find means of subsistence. Hence results the "struggle for existence"—great multitudes dying in each generation from want of nourishment or the assaults of enemies. In this struggle every exception, peculiarity, or idiosyncrasy which can aid an individual to survive increases the chance that the individuals so favored will leave the most numerous posterity. This is the law of "natural selection." As the stock-breeder selects his most serviceable animals to become parents, so nature, by cutting off those which are not fitted to the conditions of existence, selects those which are, for the same end. In the course of many generations the "survival of the fittest," which at first admitted exceptions, becomes absolute and excludes them. In the long run, competition must destroy the families least adapted to their surroundings. Among these may generally be included negativ and nothing-in-particular varieties. Hence the origin of new species and the disappearance of the "missing links." Darwin shows, with great profusion of instances, that this principle accounts for all the different kinds of variation among races. The power of changing color so conspicuous in the chameleon, the conquest of the earth by the more intelligent races of men, the limited number of rapacious animals, the swarming proclivity of codfish and oysters, the advance in complexity of organization from the nomad up to man, the persistent uniformity of those low types found in the oldest strata—progress, retrogression, immobility, monstrosity—all are drawn within the compass of a single generalization. Of the objections to Darwinism it seems unnecessary to say anything now. They appear to be buried in the grave of the discoverer, who lived to see the complete triumph of his views. It is rather necessary now to warn students against supposing that Darwin has exhausted nature. As a theory of the origin of species, his discovery leaves, perhaps, nothing to be desired. The origin of those individual variations in which species have their remote source it does not bear upon at all.

A New Prophet.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker. Sir: Ever since the nativ uprising in Egypt and the bombardment of Alexandria, I hav been expecting each week to see some one call the attention of your readers to the following prediction, which appeared in one of your "Round-the-World" letters from Cairo, written several months ago. It cannot be that I am the only one who has noticed its almost literal accurateness:

"The nativs [of Egypt] are talking among themselvs of the necessity of rising against their oppressors and driving them from their country. This may come in one, two, or three years, but come it pretty surely will. . . . That will be a bloody day when it comes, and many Europeans will doubtless be massacred: but it will only giv the European nations a good excuse to visit severe punishment upon the Moslems."

There you hav the whole program laid down, and it has been followed, with no omissions and few extras. If your mind was not illumined by the spirit of prophecy when you made that diagnosis, then the spirit of prophecy is of no account. Isaiah never made a hit like it, though he followed the style of his time in making his prediction after the event of which he was writing had occurred. His aversion to the truth may in a measure account for the lack of correspondence between the subjectiv order of his narrativ and the objectiv order of the phenomena. Neither did the dreaming Daniel nor the maundering Ezekiel strike so close to the facts. As for Mother Shipton's Prophecy, that lady's reputation went with 1881, the world failing to come to an end before the expiration of the year, according to expectation.

The Adventists are admonished by their leaders to study this Egyptian question with the Bible in their hands. If some of them should happen to stumble across the passage in Acts which says, "I will raise up a prophet from among brethren; to him ye shall hearken," and also the prediction which I hav quoted, a connection between the two might be imagined, and a reputation established for you as a prognosticator of dire events which would make Mehemet Achmet, the would-be prophet of Islam, seem small potatoes indeed.

"A Truth Seeker Around the World."

From the Theosophist, Bombay, India.

At the time of Mr. Bennett's visit to Bombay, it was made known that he was on a voyage around the world at the request of the subscribers to his journal, The Truth Seeker, and at their expense. This latter fact at once attests the popularity of Mr. Bennett in America among the Freethinking classes, and their probable numerical strength; for unless the number were large, no fund so considerable as this journey requires could hav been raised by a popular subscription of five dollars from each contributor. Mr. Bennett's observations of travel hav been regularly published in his journal in the form of letters, and the portion of the trip between New York and Damascus has just appeared in a thick volume of 836 pages, profusely illustrated, and having a well-engraved portrait in steel of the author. Mr. Bennett is a type of a class very numerous in the United States, and which has recruited some of the ablest men in American public life—that of the self-made. By dint of strong natural endowments of mind, backed by a store of bodily vigor, they hav forced their way into public notice and popular leadership, often despite obstacles fit to crush all hope out of weaker characters. A representativ man of this class was the late distinguished journalist and politician, Horace Greeley, founder and editor of the New York Tribune; and one cannot turn over a leaf of American history without seeing the traces of similar minds having been at work. Mr. Bennett's path to authorship and leadership in the Western Freethought movement did not run through the drowsy recitation-rooms of the college, nor over the soft carpets of aristocratic drawing-rooms. When his thoughts upon religion filled his head to overflowing, he dropped merchandizing and evoluted into editorship with a cool self-confidence that is thoroughly characteristic of the American disposition, and scarcely ever looked for in any other race. "The American invented the monkey and shod the musketo"—is a Russian proverb expressiv of the popular idea in that country of the cleverness of their transatlantic friends. One would naturally look, then, to find in a book by such a man rather strength than finish, many quaint, original views of foreign people and countries without any pretense of that polish which marks the literary productions of the university graduate. And such, indeed, is what one sees in the volume under notice. The author's mission was the unique one of studying and reporting upon the religious state of the world from the Freethinker's point of view. It may be described as an anti-missionary or anti-religious pilgrimage; a commission to discover not alone how little or much good the missionaries are doing to the "heathen," nor how good or bad are the various other Christian nations, but also whether Christian America can draw any good lessons in morals or religion from the hoary civilizations of Asia This duty Mr. Bennett has performed to the extent possible in the brief time allowed him in each country to look over his ground. He makes many shrewd observations, more particularly in Europe and the Holy Land, where his long previous study of Christianity fitted him to grasp its relations with the state of things he witnessed. His is not a book to be read with either pleasure or patience by the professed Christian, but it is admirably adapted to his audience; and the popular receptions which, in the latest advices from America, are reported as being given to him by crowds of sympathizers all along the line of the Pacific Railway, show that he has largely added to his influence with that rapidly-growing party which is assailing Christian theology "from every coign of vantage." Three volumes are to complete the work, and the three are advertised at the remarkably low cost of five dollars, or about Rs. 13-2-0.

Congress Hall.

Our enterprising Secretary of the St. Louis League has just completed arrangements for the League Congress in St. Louis. It will meet in the Young Men's Temperance Hall, northwest corner of Fourth and Locust streets. This is a good, commodious, central hall.

Also the headquarters of the League officers will be at the St. James Hotel, and the delegates can find quarters there for $1.50 per day, board and room included. It is a first-class $2 a day hotel. It has recently been refitted and furnished anew. One of the proprietors is a Liberal.

For those who prefer to take rooms elsewhere the Italian Kitchen, Sixth and Olive streets, will furnish meals at very reasonable prices.

So everything is arranged, and we hope the auxiliary Leagues will be represented at St. Louis by full delegations. Every auxiliary is entitled to send five delegates. We believe this will be the largest and fullest Congress ever held. The best speakers in the country will be there. Mr. George Chainey will occupy Sunday afternoon with one of his admirable lectures, as he did last year in Chicago. Mr. Wakeman will close the proceedings on Sunday evening with an address. Friday and Saturday will be occupied with the business of the League—entertaining plans for its progress and improvements, discussing its resolutions, the election of officers, etc. It will assemble promptly at 10 o'clock on Friday morning, September 29th.

Leaguers and Liberals—life, annual, and charter members—will every one of you resolve to be present?

T. C. Leland, Secretary N. L. L.

A Mistaken Idea.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I notice that The Truth Seeker and many eastern papers speak of the prohibitory liquor law of Kansas as a success. This is not the case. Anyone can get a glass of liquor in the saloons of the large cities by asking for it, just as easy as sugar, nails, or any other commodity, and in the smaller places where fines hav been imposed it is sold secretly. So that to find one that is closed in consequence of the law is a very rare occurrence; yet I think there is not so much drank as before, some of which is attributed to the hard times and people not being able to pay for it. I hav lived in the state twelve years, and notice things some, and my drink is water. I wish well to the temperance cause, but I want the truth told, and want our paper to do it every time. Hence this note.

Governor St John's yarn about increased immigration and enlarged tax roll is all bosh—not worth a moment's notice. The reverse is the fact. Many hav left the state because of short crops, and, so far as I am advised, not because liquor is not to be had, for it is plenty, and much villainy is practiced to evade the law.

Indeed, sometimes it seems to me that the hypocrisy and lying and perjury are as corrupting to the morals of the country as liquor drinking could be. Of this, however, it is difficult to determin, and it is likely that some more law-making may make it possible to prosecute the offenders, but if it is found that there can be no better way of promoting temperance than the one now on trial it had better be repealed and left altogether to moral suasion. DR. GEORGE W. CHAPMAN.

Open Letter to Young People.

Dear Young Men and Women of the United States of America: Since you hav been taught that on your rectitude of character and choice of judicious life rests the hopes of the aged for the security of just institutions and safe administrations, you will not feel insidiously addressed if those interested in human welfare express anxiety when they see you surrounded by snares and artfully-pressed temptations, which only high purpose and fixed principle can resist. Knowing that in the present critical state of our nation, when a fuller union of church and state is planned, your aid to that plan is sought by all possible allurements; and learning recently that good young men, of Liberal views and education, hav been lured into the church, and urged to join the Y. M. C. A., which, for its social features, they like, prompts me to throw out this kindly warning, late as it is; for long ago Liberals should hav established methods of combining culture and amusement for the young, independent of bigoted sects. In answer to my remonstrance the apology of these young men is the attractions of wealth, fine halls and temples, popular standing, and entertainments. In a large degree these are held out to attract, and Freethinkers are not fully attentiv to the constant need of fortifying young minds against seductiv show. But, finally, we are awake to the danger of having our last liberties usurped by power-seeking craft, and to the strong efforts to make you its servil allies, like thousands now unwittingly giving it the service of their lives. The thousands not yet under its sway should be spared to the truth. To show the subtle aim (aptly told in the old term priestcraft) to those of you not aware of the guile behind the surface suavity of the church-made respectability of to-day, and beneath the special solicitude for your aid in this crisis, is the object of this task, and I hope its welcome will be manifest by a large count of grown boys and girls in Liberal clubs. To divert you from reasoning and scientific company and books strained efforts are made to brand such with the odium of obscenity. For this purpose our best people and most useful literature are attacked and condemned. To cover the revolting nature of church dogma and fraud the fascination of show and pleasing attention are made profuse, and recently the appearance of refinement and learning are emulated to countervail tedious pettings of pulpit doctrins. This winning phase is self-confession that ennobling progress for aspiring souls is not there, and is superfluous to those knowing the central kernel of the structure is pagan idolatry, mythic superstition, and disguised knowledge that these are facts.

Skilled in long-practiced cunning, Christians hav ways of driving people to their fold with a gentle seeming, though a cruel, dire intent, evincing much tact, and this runs all through the winning process.

By affiliating with fashion and other speculations, they hav established customs and standards of morality and respect on a plane and line with their policy, creating a caste they assume to be alone reputable. By its criterion they measure vice and virtue, real worth not considered; and in the auspices of their society, intemperance venal excesses in many things, legal prostitution, avarice, swindling, knavery, multiply and demoralize so generally that confidence in human integrity has reeled till alarm for the perpetuity of any soundness is urging the best in all sects, the doubters of atoning gods, the Freethought lovers of truth, and especially the believers that individual responsibility is highest incentiv to goodness, to begin reforming existing usages, to gain for the masses some real health of body, mind, and morals, and a basis of prosperity where justice may be umpire. Discovering this aim in Liberal ranks, priests whose honor rises from the ignorance of the many, started anew the old slanders, with malice attent, made the understanding that dissenters were unpopular, patronage must be withheld from their business, activ advocates suppressed in some way, and the passport to reputation was church favor. In this their usual appeal to fear is expected to be potent with young members.

When priests had the power they beheaded Freethinkers to intimidate others, as well as to hush the thought. Their object now is to so modify law that again they can silence opposition. The hard strife to gain numbers is that they may thrust liberty out of the Constitution, vote the myth they call God in, be sustained in deciding on interpretation, and ruling accordingly. This is the meaning of the late violations of law by agents of vice societies, spurious courts, postal interference, and trials to suppress physiological science. To counteract this gigantic desecration of our republican government, already much corrupted, the institution called Liberal Leagues was formed. It is increasing in growth and prosperity year by year, but with the combined enemies of all monarchies and churches it needs the aid of all who believe in its principles, who abhor the heartlessness of tyranny, the abject slavery of subjects, and the horrid torture of the noblest of humanity by Christian fanatics with chains, gags, cells, and gibbets. And there are enough whose real views are with Liberals to rally to the true standard and roll back threatening invasion at once, if they had courage to outact inner truth. Investigation shows that majorities of those sustaining churches hav no faith in them, and only acquiesce for "position and success in business." Such mercenary catering so degrades character that dupes linger on, never enjoying the sweet freedom of living a conviction, daily selling themselvs, becomes commonplace, and it is feared they will sell their country and posterity's inheritance, too, when the trying hour which is hastening on arrives.

If you, young people, consider well the momentous matter, stand firmly, by the human right of self-government throw your influence into the true organization of that right, the Liberal Leagues, you will honor your own patrotism, strengthen the true, and be examples to older people who ought to hav been helping you by their manly practice. Auxiliary Leagues center in the National, forming a body where all reforms may work for justice in political, commercial, religious, and all good systems.

And women, as well as men, should join them, giv what aid and influence they can, and that is much more than is usually supposed. Soon as women in goodly numbers swell the membership they will form sociable societies independent of pretentious sects, and when our ranks show they are able to entertain themselvs, defend a true standard of rectitude, and encourage their own business affairs, the vassals whom shams hav left worthy of redemption will gladly turn and enjoy a rich season of open-browed honesty.

Saving you, young men, from wily nets long laid for you, will also save you, our girls, and, saving enough of you, will save this beautiful abundant land from the desolation of a heinous plot, and convert into happy homes of secure peace for the brave and free as long as they are vigilant.

How many fathers, mothers, and grandparents will set examples, and keep reminding everybody which is the right way? I beseech you all to save yourselvs with all the rest, by retaking all the liberties our sires nobly won, obtaining many others they nor we hav known, and do not hinder women who hav labored for everybody's liberty all their lives from taking as many and as much of them as they giv any one.

Affectionately and respectfully,

Vineland, N. J. MARY E. TILLOTSON.

A Letter from Mrs. Briggs.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The death of a dear brother recently called me to Vermont, and after the last sad offices were performed I improved the opportunity while there of visiting many old schoolmates and dear friends that I had not seen for years. One whom I hav known as a most worthy man from my earliest recollections was formerly an enthusiastic Universalist, and smart enough to many times vanquish by Bible arguments eminent divines, but now, alas, gone over to the enemy in the Baptist division! And I asked myself, How is this possible? Not being able to answer the query, I left with him for perusal that book of books for the benighted, "Deity Analyzed and the Devil's Defense," by Col. John R. Kelso, of California, that latest and best defender of the faith—a work that I wish to commend to all Liberals as one that cannot be excelled as an effectiv instrument to dispel the clouds of superstition and ignorance (the only barrier that prevents all Christians from attaining mental freedom), and a book that ought to hav a large sale and extensiv reading, if we would do our duty to those of our fellow men that hav not yet been able to break the fetters the church has forged for them. Its keen satire and unanswerable arguments must prove most effectiv in demolishing the absurdities of theology; and I hav great hopes that the mind of this old and valued friend, and others of his class, will yet be released from the thraldom of superstition—the mental bastile which now imprisons so many noble minds, annihilating Freethought, and keeping men and women in abject slavery to a myth. I feel that by urging my friends everywhere to buy and circulate such books as this I am but simply doing my duty to them and the cause we hav so much at heart—the freedom of all mankind.

For the past three weeks I hav been denied the privilege of reading THE TRUTH SEEKER, now I hav the last three numbers before me, but only time enough to glance over them at present. My eyes and soul are especially gladdened by reading "The Index and Lucy Stone," by Mrs. Lake, in THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 1st, and "The Badge of Serfdom," by Susan H. Wixon, in paper of July 15th. I indorse every word of them. Let mothers educate their sons and daughters accordingly. How true are Sister Sada Bailey's words in THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 1st on a subject of yet more importance at present. She says: "Do you know that our nation is doomed to destruction unless labor reform triumphs? Do you know that aristocracy has caused the downfall of every nation that has been destroyed? For this there is a philosophical and physiological reason. The brains and bodies of aristocrats become weakened for the want of proper, useful exercise; the brains and bodies of the laborers by overwork. Thus both classes degenerate until a nation is ruined and many arts and sciences lost." The remedy she prescribes is feasible, but who, oh, who, will lead and be sustained?

"Stand by Mr. Bennett," says Brother Leland. Certainly we will; and those who hav known him from youth up look on from a distance and hail with pleasure all demonstrations of welcome and gladness at his safe return. I was one of the numerous friends who went on board the vessel that bore him away a year ago to giv him a parting handshake and words of cheer, and would gladly be one to greet him on his return.

Fraternally yours, MRS. SCOTT BRIGGS.

Girls' Industrial School.

One of our Michigan patrons has memorialized the legislature of his state as follows:

To the Legislature of Michigan: As the question of the Girl's Industrial and Educational School has been merged in that of a Reform School for Girls, I wish to explain the plan I have advocated and still adhere to in regard to the former. In doing so my object is to draw a line between the two institutions for the obvious reasons that by the plan which I propose, in the establishment of a strictly industrial school, the number of girls who are daily becoming a public charge will be diminished by taking them from towns, cities, and the country while yet innocent of crime, though beset by temptation on every hand, and thus giv them a home where industry, morality, economy, and honesty shall be inculcated, where the science of cooking, house-work, and every industry pertaining to woman shall be taught, as well as those branches which fit them for successful business. I would ask an appropriation of $25,000, and recommend: That buildings of moderate dimensions, plain and substantial, be erected; that everything be done with an eye to economy; that sufficient grounds be purchased, to enable the school to raise as much produce as possible, in order that it may soon become, in great measure, self-sustaining; to incite girls to greater industry, I would have each receive a certain percentage on everything which she makes and produces for sale, this to be invested for her at interest until she graduates. I am convinced that the institution may soon be self-sustaining in a great measure, thus relieving the state of a burden of taxes so alarmingly great as it is becoming.

A Question in Ancient History.

MERIDEN, CONN., July 15, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $3—$1.50 for THE TRUTH SEEKER and $1.50 for the "Bennett-Mair Discussion." Please send by return mail. Accept my thanks for sending the paper so long after my term expired, and if it will not take too much of your valuable time, I would like to ask you a question, which, if you will answer, I will use to enlighten a Christian friend of mine: What is the oldest history and how far back does it go? EUGENE LANE.

REPLY.—The people of ancient times were not excellent historians. They seemed to attach little importance to chronology or a system of dates. It is a question of the greatest antiquity between the Hindoos (descendants of the Aryans), the Chinese, the Egyptians, and the Chaldeans or Assyrians. There is the strongest evidence that each of these nationalities made records in their peculiar ways many thousand years ago. The Aryans wrote Sanskrit, which is believed to be the oldest language in the world, claimed to hav been used more than ten thousand years ago. The antiquity of the Chinese is so great as to run back into the age of much uncertainty. They claim from twelve to forty thousand years, and even millions.

The Egyptians inscribed their hieroglyphics upon rocks, statues, obelisks, and temples not less than five thousand years ago. The people of Nineveh and Babylon stamped cuneiform inscriptions upon earthen tablets four thousand years before our era, and these are now to be seen in large numbers in the British Museum, London. There is abundance of proof that man existed upon the earth from fifty to one hundred thousand years ago; but about the only history they left is the stone implements they used and the bones which they left in the caves where they lived, side by side with animals.

Probably the oldest reliable and regular history is that of the Grecian historian Herodotus, who lived some six centuries before our era. He wrote extensivly, and his works still remain. What is called Bible history is far from being the oldest in the world. There is no proof that any of it was written before the time of the Babylonian captivity, and much of it less than six centuries before the Christian era. The part alluding to the creation of the world, the Garden of Eden, the fall of man, the deluge, etc., is not older than that captivity, and was unquestionably taken from the Babylonian records and myths. The Babylonians were an older and a far more literary and learned people than the Jews, and from them the latter derived most of the knowledge they possessed. The Bible was not written till after the return from Babylon, and much of it is a plagiarism upon Babylonian literature.—ED. T. S.

A New Opera.

It seems that friend William McDonnell, author of "Exeter Hall," "Heathens of the Heath," "Family Creeds," etc., has made a new departure by writing an opera, which will probably be placed before the public in the course of the coming autumn. The following is what the Toronto Daily Mail has to say of it after perusing it:

AN OPERA BY A CANADIAN AUTHOR.

We are pleased to announce that Mr. William McDonnell, of Lindsay, Ontario, has written an opera, in three acts, entitled, "The Fisherman's Daughter." This, we believe, is the first opera or work of the kind ever written in Canada. We hav been favored with a perusal of the piece, and are of opinion that if it is properly produced the opera will be an undoubted success. The plot is simple and natural, with sufficient of the humorous, the pathetic, and the sensational to make "The Fisherman's Daughter" very attractiv. As an author Mr. McDonnell is already favorably known in the literary world. He has not only written the opera, but composed the music (something unusual), much of which is very stirring, tender, and original. If arrangements can be made "The Fisherman's Daughter" will probably be brought out in New York during the ensuing operatic season, and we have much pleasure in anticipating for Mr. McDonnell the success which, in our opinion, he most certainly deserves.

Nature's Work Finished.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The able and pointed articles which hav occasionally appeared in the Liberal papers over his signature hav made the name of D. Jenkins familiar to many of your readers as an outspoken Liberal. It now becomes my painful duty to inform you of his sudden departure from us by the process called death, which took place on the 6th inst. after a short illness, which occurred at his home in the suburbs of Hannibal, on a small fruit farm, where he was used to spend the most of his time, either in his orchard or library. Noted for his vast store of useful knowledge, a perfect walking encyclopedia, strictly temperate, honest and courteous to everybody, but always outspoken in his Liberalism, woe to the one who attacked him with the pen. He was unpopular of course with the mental slaves who dare not express their honest opinions, but with Liberals his loss will be deeply deplored.

In accordance with his request during his life, a strictly secular funeral was given him. Dr. Ayres, lecturer of the Society of Moralists, officiated, assisted by Mr. J. B. Chelsey, using that valuable little book, "The Truth Seeker Collection," by selecting that which was appropriate to the occasion, together with a brief sketch of the life of the deceased, making a very neat and impressiv service, commanding the attention and respect of a large attendance of orthodox as well as heterodox friends. D. C. HALL.

Hannibal, Mo., Aug. 8, 1882.

"The North American Review"

For September has for its leading article a very forcible presentment, by Dorman B. Eaton, of the evils produced by the practice of levying "Political Assessments." The paper is noteworthy for its striking array of facts, but more so because it will be universally regarded as the ultimatum of a large and influential section of the Republican party, addressed to the party leaders. "Oaths in Legal Proceedings," by Judge Edward A. Thomas, is a discussion of the question whether the interests of morality and public justice alike would not be promoted by the abrogation of all laws requiring testimony to be given under the sanction of an oath. Thomas B. Maury, late of the Signal Office, contributes an article on "Tornadoes and their Causes," which, in addition to its scientific interest, possesses the merit of suggesting many practical measures for averting disaster to life and property from wind-storms. "Architecture in America," by Clarence Cook, is marked by a freedom of utterance that is refreshing. In this respect it ranks with Commander Gorringe's celebrated paper on the United States Navy. Augustus G. Cobb writes of "Earth-Burial and Cremation," and J. E. Manning, in an article entitled "The Geneva Award and the Ship-Owners," sets forth the justice of the claims of consignors of cargoes and owners of vessels to indemnification out of the Geneva Award fund, for losses, from the acts of Confederate cruisers. The Review is sold by booksellers and news dealers generally.

Letters from Friends.

SALT LAKE CITY, Aug. 12, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I hav just received the second volume of "A Truth Seeker Around the World." You will find inclosed four dollars. Please send me two copies of the second volume of "A Truth Seeker Around the World." I shall want two more copies of the second volume soon.

Yours truly, JAMES ASHMAN.

BEDFORD STATION, MICH., Aug. 11, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed is five dollars for the book of round-the-world trip, if it is not too late. I was burned out of house and home last September, and I hav not got up to the "front" again yet. It is hard when once you get in the "rear" to fetch up. I was a subscriber to your paper, but I had to let you drop it on account of my loss of property. I could not send you the "needful."

Respectfully, F. WINGATE.

WARREN, O., Aug. 14, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $10, for which please send one copy of your travels around the world, $5; Robert G. Inersoll's best book, $2; and THE TRUTH SEEKER for this year, $3.

I would hav sent this before, but had the misfortune to see the earnings of a life swept away by fire, and could not spare the money before.

I hav been a pioneer in the Freethought movement, having had serious doubts of the big fish and ghost stories for at least forty years.

Yours very truly, THOMAS DOUGLAS.

DENVER, BREMER CO., IOWA, Aug. 14, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you should find a postal order for $17—$1.50 for Vol. IV. of your tour round the world, $2 for Jeremiah Hacker, and $1 to T. C. Leland for annual membership in the National Liberal League. One dollar and a half of the $17 aforesaid is for Vol. IV. of your tour round the world, to be credited to my son-in-law, F. W. Jacob. The balance ($8) is for the Secretary of the National Liberal Leage, for annual membership in the League for the following: M. Farrington, Mrs. Ann L. Farrington, Edgar L. L. Farrington, Miss Ianthe A. Farrington, Mrs. Vivia L. Farrington, Denver, Iowa, $1 each; Mrs. Delia J. Jacob, F. W. Jacob, Waterloo. Iowa, $1 each; Mrs. A. N. Wood, Waverly, $1.

For the good cause ever yours,

M. FARRINGTON.

PETERBORO, N. H., Aug. 11, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: If you know how to forgiv such cussed carelessness on my part I hope you will try and do so. Your remark about delinquent subscribers has just fallen under my eye, and I was taken back when I found I was behind, instead of ahead, as I supposed I was. I had it so settled in my mind that my subscription expired in '83 that I did not think to look at the tab until your remarks called my attention to it. Find inclosed $5—$3 of which place to my credit for the paper, and the balance use as directed. I will send you some more money soon on the Round-the-World books. I don't mean to be hog enough to accept so many books for the paltry sum of $5. Am glad of your past year's success. Hope you won't hav to take your pay in congratulations. That is real good as far as it goes, but the printers and paper-dealers will not take them in exchange at anything like par value; neither will they satisfy the demands of the stomach. GEO. GEER.

HAMBURG, Aug. 10, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I received your note and will try to answer it. I hav been sick a long time—am barely able to sit up, but hav some money laid away for you, which you would had long ago had I been well. I inclose $6—$3 for extra binding on my Round-tne-World books, and $3 for the dear old TRUTH SEEKER. If my time is not out all right; if it is I beg pardon. I would rather do with one meal a day than owe for the best paper published.

Mr. Bennett, allow me to congratulate you on your safe arrival home, and I hope those for whom you hav sacrificed so much will try to lighten your burden by at least forwarding to you your just dues. In a few days the Convention will meet at the Glen, and I hear you are going to be there. I, too, had anticipated that pleasure, but the time is so near at hand I must giv it up. I hope your reception will be a grand success, and that all those who attend the Convention may enjoy themselvs to the fullest extent. Yours truly, MRS. E. M. SICKMON.

BUTLER, Mo., Aug. 10, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I congratulate you on your successful voyage, your happy method of writing it, and on your safe return.

I hav received Vol. III., and am even better pleased with it than with the first. I do not think I ever spent $5 that has given me more genuin satifaction than that for your journey around the world.

I hope you may conclude, after taking a sufficient rest, to make an extended lecture tour through the states, and that your many friends in this part of the country may yet hav the opportunity of listening to your description of scenes in foreign lands, and of the manners, customs, superstitions, etc., of the inhabitants of the many countries through which you hav passed.

We also desire to take by the hand and welcome to our homes the old hero-martyr of religious persecution, the venerable seeker of the Truth, whose writings and publications are doing more to spread Freethought than all other causes combined.

That you may liv to double your noble work in the cause of universal mental liberty is the wish of your friend and pupil, R. S. KELSO, M.D.

BENNETT'S RECEPTION AT MILWAUKEE, WIS.

GLEN BEULAH, WIS, July 20, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: For the first time I had the privilege of grasping the hand of D. M. Bennett at his reception in Milwaukee on the 18th inst. The Liberals of that city had spared no pains to make it a success. The gathering in the Academy of Music was larger than I anticipated, considering the unpopularity of the Liberal movement. Mrs. Dr. Severance presided with womanly dignity and tact. The preliminary addresses were made by Dr. T. W. Williams, the writer of this, and Mrs. H. S. Lake. The doctor's lecture, in manuscript, was a finely-written production, on the broad-gauge of thought. Mrs. Lake's words, both in poetry and prose, called like a silver bugle for action. On the arrival of Brother Bennett the committee of reception requested him to speak on "Comstockism," as was announced in the bills. Doubtless this subject was chosen because Milwaukee for some time has been Comstock's headquarters in Wisconsin, in the effort to legalize a Comstock law a la obscenity. It was, however, impolitic, in my opinion, to dwell on such a subject at a reception. When an obscene man like Sir Anthony throws carrion at our feet it is best not to stir it much, but bury it out of sight forever as soon as possible, and then lash the villain that so insulted us, that he may learn better manners. In his honest and unsophisticated heart Brother Bennett did not calculate, I infer, that a certain class attended that meeting who ardently hoped he might say something which they could construe as obscene. They wanted to "catch him in his words," after the delectable style of Comstock—a game that is contagious. The old man told the facts in a plain, unvarnished manner, demonstrating the villainy of that Anthony. They who are infected with the virus of false modesty, blood-poisoned by popular theology, evidently in sympathy with Comstock's pretentious virtue, demonstrated their "holy horror" by leaving the hall. But the main body of the audience remained courteous to the end, indicating a just appreciation of the good man addressing them. The next morning and evening the Republican-Sentinel and Wisconsin appeared with somewhat flaming headings concerning the "ribaldry of D. M. Bennett." The reporters, ever courting public taste and never justice or truth, made the reception appear just as black as they dared to. While they told some truth, the moral aspect of their reports was a villainous lie—characteristic of a set of reportorial pimps, who thus seek to show off, show their talents and immaculate piety, and so keep in good favor with the churches. Such usage from newspaper tools of sect and party should only awaken greater vigilance and daring. It is well to practice on the olden adage, "Cast not your pearls before swine lest they turn and rend you;" but while we are wary, it becomes us to demand of the press everywhere that our meetings shall be correctly and justly reported, or we will withdraw patronage. Let this be understood and everywhere avowed in convention. The Liberals—this includes Spiritualists who are liberal—have the majority, intellectually speaking, in the country. Would we but unite our forces, leaving our personal crotchets out, we would be irresistible. Our first duty, then, is to organize wherever there is sufficient material to warrant, and move in solid phalanx upon hypocrits and blind guides, and thus compel the press, if it cannot learn decency otherwise, to tell the truth and respect our rights as American citizens. Fraternally, J. O. BARRETT.

MOYAMENSING PRISON, PHILADELPHIA, PA., Aug. 11, 282.

MR. EDITOR: While you hav been journeying round the world I hav been suffering in prison as a victim of railway monopoly. As the Christians of New York sent you to prison for a year in 1879 for daring to be a man and daring to sell that which you had a perfect right to sell, so for the same reason—for selling my own property, railroad tickets, at reduced rates—the railway monopolists of Pennsylvania hav sent me to prison for a year and fined me $500. According to the rules of this prison I can only write one letter in two months, except to my wife, now in Nevada, Mo., to whom I am permitted to write once a week. I hav concluded to avail myself of the opportunity and write this letter to you, with the hope that more may result from it for the cause of justice, right, and American liberty, as well as for my personal welfare, than should I write this letter at this time to any other one person. I do so for the following reasons:

1st. Because I wish to thank you for the letters and articles THE TRUTH SEEKER has published from time to time in the past few months in relation to my case (by the bye, I must giv New York credit as being the banner city in my defense, and all credit to its independent press in giving publicity to the outrage that has been perpetrated upon an American citizen in my person by an American railway monopoly. THE TRUTH SEEKER, Truth, Sun, Herald, Commercial Advertiser, Irish World, National Journal, and House and Home hav all published notices of my arrest and imprisonment and denounced the outrage).

2d. Because my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER having expired a couple of weeks ago, I wish to specially thank you for continuing to send it to me, and to say that as soon as I can get to see my counsel—who, I think, is at present out of the city at some summer resort, but will return to the city in a few days and see me—I will hav him send you the money to pay my subscription up to the time of the expiration of my sentence, November 1st. I am now expecting to see him every day.

3d. To congratulate you upon your safe return to your nativ land and to your home from your long trip around the world, and to express my pleasure at the success of your trip and the ovations and enthusiastic receptions which awaited you at almost every point at which you stopped. Your letters in THE TRUTH SEEKER I hav read from week to week with great interest, and shall want them in book form soon after my release, to re-read, show to my friends, and preserve for my little son (now six years old) to read when he becomes old enough to read them understandingly and to appreciate the knowledge, truth, and faith they contain.

4th and lastly. I write you with the belief that you yourself, having once experienced what it is to suffer for a year in prison for truth, principle, and the rights of the people, can more readily understand and appreciate my position, and that if you can, through your influence, and by bringing my case, as a victim of unjust laws, before the public at the Freethinkers' National Convention at Watkins Glen, secure a lessening of my sentence and secure to me the justice of a pardon at the hands of our Pardon Board, you will cheerfully do so. I would like to hav my case brought to the notice of the convention, with a view of having the convention take such action upon the same as they may deem proper, adopting such resolutions as the merits of the case seem to demand, together with a petition in my behalf, to our Board of Pardons, asking for my pardon, having the same signed by all classes of citizens attending the convention, and hav it sent to the Board at Harrisburg, Pa., care of Charles N. Farr, Recorder of Board of Pardons, the next meeting of which takes place on the 19th of September; but all letters and petitions should be in the hands of the Recorder at Harrisburg by September 10th. The law under which I was convicted and sentenced is unquestionably unconstitutional.

If I had been able to employ able counsel, such as Colonel Ingersoll or Mr. T. B. Wakeman, to defend me I doubt if ever a jury would have convicted me, or, after being sentenced, I could hav had the decision of the lower court set aside by a higher tribunal. SYLVESTER F. WILSON.

[Let every person who sympathizes with an unjustly imprisoned man do what he can toward effecting the release of Mr. Wilson by addressing the Board of Pardons as above, both by petitions and private letters. Those who will put themselvs in this man's place will certainly be willing to do so much to help him.—ED. T. S.]

ILION, Aug. 11, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I send you post-office order for $3, which is to pay for TRUTH SEEKER another year. I hav received the two volumes of travels, and think them just the thing.

I should like to see you now, and see if your long-continued traveling has changed your appearance. We hav read every word that has been in your paper concerning you travels since you left a year ago and hav been interested and instructed by the letters you sent home. I hope I may see you again sometime.

Yours truly, S. MAUD P. GATES.
PHINEAS GATES.

EUREKA SPRINGS, ARK, July 27, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed is $2 on subscription; one for myself and one for C. H. Cole, the trial subscriber I sent you same time ago. This is almost a Liberal town. I never saw so many Liberals in one place. Last year I had great anticipation of a League here. I invited Mr. Bennett here on his return across the continent, and he wrote me to bear him in mind, that we should be remembered and visited, if possible, etc. At that time I went so far as to send for the necessary blanks to organize a League (which papers I hold yet), but the terrible drouth which visited the West last year was raging then, and hard times set in which made it impossible to do anything at organizing and maintaining a League. This town is only a health resort, and hard times are more felt and feared here than in towns which are backed by agriculture and manufacture. The country has just garnered another good harvest, and we look for good times again. We very much regret that we will not see Mr. Bennett before he completes his circuit, but hope to hav another opportunity. I put him down as the greatest civilizer the world has had. I am certain that the world never made such progress in civilization as it is making to-day. Mr. Bennett endures hardships, perils, and persecutions with fortitude; he travels, reads, and studies extensivly; he talks, lectures, and writes ably and voluminously, and he publishes continuously, while the millions are eagerly reading with pleasure and profit. Thus superstition vanishes before him, and true civilization follows after him. Every effort should be made to get some, at least, of the many good Liberal publications of the day into our public libraries, and every town having a League should hav also a Liberal library. I find it is very easy to handle a Christian when once he gets to reading.

Some of our good writers should publish a series of preparatory books presenting the subject of Freethought thoroughly, but beginning in a mild, convincing style and advancing step by step (as Lincoln did with emancipation), until the subject is thoroughly covered and explained.

It is useless to put a radical work into the hands of a moss-backed orthodox. But few of them hav ever read any kind of Liberal or scientific books, or thought but little upon such subjects. They must "become as little children," and be educated out of their error, just as they were trained into it.

Another thing much needed is a good collection of Liberal hymns and songs, set to music, for the use of families and gatherings. Everybody loves good music—a thing which we are very deficient of.

Speeches, lectures, essays, readings, etc., are liable to become dry and tiresome unless mingled with and enlivened by good, lively vocal music. The Christian Sabbath school owes its success to its good, spirited music.

We want a change of music, a change of words and of tunes. Let us sing of "Greenland's Icy Mountains" and "Afric's Sunny Founts," with words and melodies grand and inspiring as nature itself. Let the Christians sing of the hours so "tedious and tasteless," of the "birds and flowers having lost their sweetness," etc., while we worship in song the birds and flowers, and enjoy the happy hours.

Have we any music-makers? then let them get to work. There is a field of speculation and profit before them awaiting a display of their talent.

As for Sunday, the body and mind need rest and change which a day of rest may giv. Modify the Sunday laws surely, but by no means ever abolish one day of rest in seven. Six days of labor calls for one of rest. Six days of study demands one of rest and change for the mind. There are many better works for us to perform than that of abolishing Sunday. Such are my ideas. If some should differ with me I should like to know it. Ever for right and light. Yours fraternally, J. Thos. Kennedy.

Philadelphia, Aug. 15, 1882.

Mr. Editor: Allow me to heartily congratulate you on your safe return from your long journey around the world to the shores which I, for one, did not wish to see you leave, thinking now as then that we hav room enough and by far too much work to do for all the truth seekers there are or is likely to be in our ranks in our own country and homes.

To those of our friends who hav not yet come to this conclusion, I beg them to stop and think long enough to see what is going on about them. Look at the tendency of our law-makers to pass laws centralizing all powers at Washington; and again, at the many millions of dollars being acquired by a few indivduals; and again, at the stealing, robbing, and utter worthlessness of both the Republican and Democratic parties. Oh, when will our people open their eyes and see what is being done with their rights? How much longer will we close our eyes and fold our hands and send either thieves or fools to Washington to represent us? Just so long as we keep in this rut, so long may we expect the taxes piled on. Let us look at these things as they are—not through Republican or Democratic eyes, but through the eyes of common sense, and let us go to work, one and all, to giv to each and all equal rights, females as well as males. Let us see that our wife, our daughter, and our mother has at least an equal right in the government of our country with any and all others. Let us work to preserve our Constitution as it was intended. Let us cut all deadheads; compel those who want churches to pay their proportion of taxes. Why should you or I be taxed to support a god we don't believe in? Let us band together to work out the salvation of this our country. Let us start a fund for the founding of a home for those who are worn out, and a school for the proper instruction of our children, for it is to the former that we owe the liberties we hav, and it is the children, born and unborn, that must carry on this work, and let us see that they hav a chance to get a proper education, or in other words, giv us more science and common sense, and less bible in all of our schools. Who is there in our ranks, and how many, who will and can subscribe to such a fund? Let those who can start the ball by heading the list for ten or twenty thousand dollars, and you will soon see the smaller fish come swarming in in such quantities as to surprise us all, for the world is full of good yet and only wants the chance to do good. Start the ball at the Watkins Convention, friend Bennett, and keep it before the public, and rest assured the work will be done.

Inclosed please find $3 for the continuance of The Truth Seeker to my address. B. Redfield.

Kalamo, Aug. 8, 1882.

Mr Editor: I discover it is time I should renew my subscriptions for The Truth Seeker, and as I am very much in favor of maintaining the fight against bigotry and superstition, I hasten to send you the three dollars necessary to giv me the paper for another year.

Yours truly, Albert Woek.

Lynn, Mass., August 1, 1882.

Mr. Editor: The second volume of "A Truth Seeker Around the World" arrived yesterday. It is bettea, much better, as it proceeds. Wish I could be with you at the banquet to our apostle. But he must come to Boston, where his reception will be equally welcome with your own. Yours,

Dr. Corken.

Desdemona, Texas, July 22, 1882.

Mr. Editor: Please find inclosed $5—$3 to apply on my subscription, and the balance use as directed. We are delighted with your letters of travel. Glad you are nearing home in safety, and wish you many years of health, happiness, and prosperity.

Yours for truth, A. C. Martin, M.D.

Mill Brook, Conn., Aug. 17, 1882.

Mr. Editor: Inclosed is three dollars to renew my subscription to The Truth Seeker. It has become one of the household needs (or gods) that can't well be dispensed with.

I am, perhaps, just as glad that you had a prosperous journey and got home safe and sound as any of your patrons or correspondents; but that kind of talk must have become rather stale and nauseating to you, and I forbear.

Fraternally yours, H. W. Pinney.

Lyndon, Kansas, Aug. 8, 1882.

Mr. Editor: Thrice welcome home, although you hav given us a rare feast from abroad. We received the flower seed all safe. Accept our thanks. I take the hint and inclose $3 for The Truth Seeker. My wife joins me in love to you.

Accept the photo of our son, D. M. Bennett, as a token of respect. We will teach him to admire you while young, and when he is old he will not depart, etc. J. M. and R. A. Pert.

Boston, Mass., Aug. 4, 1882.

Mr. Editor: I notice your editorial in the issue of August 5th, and welcome you home from your long journey. Noticing what you said about subscribers in arrears, I looked at my tab and found my subscription will run out on September 1st, 1882. I therefore send check to your order at once for $3 for another year lest I should forget it. Respectfully yours,

Henry N. Stone.

Reeves Station, Ga., Aug. 9, 1882.

Mr. Editor: I am glad to hear of you landing home safe and sound, and I am also glad you hav given us so truthful a history of the countries and people you saw. It seems to be the most correct and reasonable history of places and people I ever read. When you rest a while I am one that is willing to giv five dollars to help send you on another trip. But I hope you will not hav so hard a swim for life in the Jordan. W. L. McDaniel.

Lafayette, Ind., Aug. 12, 1882,

Mr. Editor: I hav taken your paper for three months for fifty cents, and think my time nearly out. Please find inclosed $1.50 for six months. I would subscribe for a year, but I am sick nearly to death, and don't know that I will get well. While I do liv I want your paper for my bible, and when I die it will be the only bible that will be found by me.

Yours fraternally, Wm. Case.

Janesville, Wis., July 29, 1882.

Mr Editor: I inclose $1 to renew my subscription for four months. I wish I could do more, but my means are not abundant. I hav read your letters of travel with much interest, especially since you left the Holy Land, whose barrenness was not favorable to descriptiv inspiration. I am glad you hav met so cordial a welcome wherever you hav been, and hope your new, as well as your old, friends will continue to sustain you in your work of mental enlightenment for the people. Elvira Wheelock.

Naples, N. Y., Aug. 6, 1882.

Mr. Editor: I heartily welcome you home from your long journey, and am glad to learn that you hav returned hale and hearty, and able to swing the battle-ax at your old post again. The account of your journey published weekly in The Truth Seeker has been of great interest to me. Hoping that you may liv to a good old age, and hav a happy termination to a useful life, I am,

Truly yours, John Peck.

Battle Creek, Mich., July 23, 1882.

Mr. Editor: I hav just learned by Mr. Cobb, of Battle Creek, that his brother is engaged in a girls' industrial school at Milwaukee—a most glorious enterprise! May he and those noble women, who are doing a work of more value to humanity than all the churches in Christendom, succeed. I take Nature as my guide. She is a perpetual worker—no cessation from true labor with Mother Nature; hence, she sets us the example. The road to happiness, and to pay the debt we all owe to Father God and Mother Nature, is to be producers as well as consumers. To idle away our time, and to be continually debtors to the author of our existence, is setting a bad example to those whose care we ought to giv our attention. Where is the family in all our land who has to depend on hired help to run a cook-stove that has it done as it should be? Nine-tenths of the food we eat is badly if not wholly unfit to go into the human system. Why? Simply because the girls and women are not taught the science of cooking, or the art of economy—true industry. My desire is and has been for many years that every state in the union shall have industrial schools for girls, where science, art, and economy shall be taught, and combining, 1st, honesty; 2d, strict morality; 3d, politeness in all cases; 4th, a strict observance of cleanliness in person, in fact, in everything; 5th, a care that everything be in order, kept clean, and healthy; 6th, that each girl be taught music, so that it may inspire her to do up her work and imbue her mind with cheerfulness, and make home a happy place for her, instead of street gossip and the temptation that lies in wait for them by the libertin, who is ever on the alert for his victim. Then go on, my dear friends, and instead of prayers teach those useful branches, and teach each girl the beauty of independence, which is the fruit of industry. Every family ought to hav an organ or piano to take away the dull monotony of the kitchen and wash-room and make life cheerful, and incite the mind to persevere in its duties, and make home a heaven instead of a dull, dead, lonesome monotony. I repeat, dear friends, go on fitting those dear girls for teachers in every department of labor pertaining to women. Teach them, first, honesty; second, industry—self independence. Leave the future to Mother Nature. Don't incumber the tender mind with the theology so prevalent in our land. If we can lead a life of rectitude here we need not fear the future.

I made such an attempt to get such a school in our state but failed, and it was defeated by praying Christian women, who must hav a reform penitentiary, nothing more, to punish the poor girls—the victims of libertins who are received into the parlors and associates of those praying-women's daughters. Such is the horrible state and inconsistency of what is termed high society. Yes, punish the poor girl, the victim of the lustful, gay libertin, who struts around the streets with impunity. We hav an agricultural college farm for boys. A half million dollars of state money has been squandered on this farm to teach boys the art of farming. Hundreds of boys hav been to that farm, and I question if fifty of them hav ever returned to or gone on to farms; and yet large sums are yearly appropriated, while not a dollar is given for the education of girls. I hope to see the day that women will vote, and also adorn our legislativ halls as law-makers with men; then we will hav laws for the whole people. Tyranny, which has now over half of our race, will giv place to just laws, and ever the right be done.

Truly yours for humanity, H. Willis.

Florence, Ala., Aug. 15, 1882.

Mr. Editor: I would like to write you and the readers of your paper a long letter. Though we are strangers, yet there is a brotherhood of feeling, a common cause in which we are interested alike—a freedom to think and also a freedom to utter those thoughts, but I will claim space for only a few lines. I hav read your weekly publication of "Letters from Friends," and one thing strikes me forcibly—that very few of those letters are written from parties in the Southern states. This might indicate that the sunny South, the land of cotton, was creedbound by the dogma of old theology, and I am free to confess that such is the case to a great extent, but perhaps not more so than the northern or eastern states. Our people are kind, generous, and lovers of freedom, though impulsiv and quick to resent an insult, and this I think you will admit to be the proper material for Liberalism. I think a few Liberal lecturers might make expenses, and more too, if they would come this winter. Tell them to come and reason with our people and help us out of the old superstitious channels. We would like to lay aside the old Jewish mythology and put on the new garb of rationalism. M. B. Shelton.

Paterson, N. J., Aug. 15, 1882.

D. M. Bennett (pilgrim and author of the New Dispensation): All hail, the chieftain of religious liberty! The good work is complete. Let the testament of the pilgrim of the nineteenth century be placed on the table of every Liberalist in the land. May the old record of false prophets, with its damnable decrees, be consigned to reminiscences of past ages as a book of horrid delusions. Let the "Truth Seeker Around the World" be all embodied in one volume with space left for a family record and entitled the New Dispensation. It will educate humanity to the realization that the only hells are the human (or inhuman) contrivances called religions.

Inclosed find $3 to pay my subscription. With high veneration and esteem for the good work you hav accomplished, I am,

Respectfully yours, John J. Haarland,

Rispah.

BY ROBERT SWAIL

When three years famin had occurred
The Lord sent to King David word
That for the sins of old King Saul
His vengeance fell on great and amall.
He nursed his wrath, though he was dead,
And nearly forty years had fled,
His vengeance naught would satisfy
Unless seven sons of Saul must die.
So they were hanged by God's good king.
For many days their bodies swing
Before the Lord for his delight;
His eyes feast on the ghastly sight.
Their mother's love for them was such
That dead she would let nothing touch;
She kept the birds off through the day,
At night she drove the birds away;
Though feeble now and very old
She kept her post through heat and cold,
In sleep she dared not close an eye
While weary days and nights pass by.
Her guiltless sons her God so great
Dooms to an unjust, cruel fate;
Mocks at her anguish while she weeps,
Laughs at the sorrow that she reaps.
O Rispah, can thy grief be told
As thus thy darlings thou behold?
O noble Rispah, good and true,
How doth God's work seem to thy view?
What dost thou think of this foul deed,
Dost thou admire his bloody creed?
Could thou for him feel tender love,
Or praise him if in heaven above?

The Prohibition Question.

J. H. COOK TO E. C. WALKER.

To all that I hav ever read from your pen I hav given a most emphatic Amen, except your views on temperance prohibition laws.

You oppose those laws and I advocate them. I believe you are sincere in your opinions, love truth and humanity, are doing a noble and efficient work for both without any pay except the consciousness of doing good to humanity, and helping to inaugurate the reign of justice, truth, and freedom on earth. Therefore it is not pleasant to oppose you on any question.

Your reasons for opposing and denouncing prohibition laws are that they are an infringement upon natural rights and contrary to the spirit of all free thought, liberality, justice, and the true ways and means by which all the objects of truth seekers and lovers of humanity are to be obtained.

From what you say against prohibition am I not logical in inferring that your general rule is that no human being should be driven or forced to do anything, or prohibited from doing anything he wants to do?

You say if we can rightly prohibit men from drinking intoxicating liquors we can prohibit them from using or eating or drinking anything else. Let me say here that it is as clear to me as that two and two are four that human beings hav a natural and just right to protect each other from the bad or evil effects of all uses, habits, or actions.

If not, then we might as well discard all human, man-made laws.

I look upon the purposes and objects of the prohibition law to be not the prohibition of the act of selling or drinking per se, but the prohibition and prevention of the results of those acts and habits—the protection of society in general, as well as individuals and poor, innocent wives, mothers, and children, helpless and defenseless. from these results, the extent and magnitude of which, in a pecuniary, social, sexual, intellectual, moral, and hereditary sense, you know as well as I. To me prohibition is synonymous with protection, prevention, defense.

You say that in Kansas the practical results of the law hav been to promote and not prohibit the sale and use of alcohol. That has been true of some localities where the combined forces of money and a majority against the law deterred the proper officials from enforcing it. It was true of Columbus through 1881, but after several druggists and doctor were arrested and heavily fined, and if unable to pay the fine were shut up in jail, they concluded to conform to the law or quit their business. And now for several months inebriates on our streets are few and far between, comparativly.

My good brother, I believe that the prohibition law, both in Kansas and Iowa, will work a great good for all, both the orthodox and the Infidel. In Kansas the prohibition law had but eight thousand majority; in Iowa four times as many, a fact you seem to deplore, and which makes me happy.

A man's abstract opinions and beliefs do not per se do harm to any one, but the effects of his passions, appetites, and habits often do great harm. I would hav no prohibition of a man's opinions, but I would, if possible, prevent, even by law, the results of his pecuniary greed or appetite.

If you take the position that there should be no human law to prohibit any result of man's actions, then you virtually say there should be no law to prevent crime or protect individuals and society from its effects and results. Do you believe in or advocate any law made by man? If so, in what kind and cases of human weakness and wickedness? Show me one case in which a human law, in your estimation, is right, just, and compatible with natural human rights, and by your own logic I will show that he prohibition law is also right, just, and compatible with natural rights.

Most of our laws are prohibitory, either expressed or implied. In your published "Demands of Liberalism, affirmed by the Iowa Liberal League," in your first statement you demand that "property shall no longer be exempt," etc. How is that demand to be realized except by a compulsatory and prohibitory law? You demand that chaplains, etc., "shall be discontinued." How discontinued except by legal compulsion? The ending of the next statement is "shall cease"—compulsion again. The next statement ends with "shall be prohibited," and you send this out to the world, while prohibition in regard to the use and sale of alcohol is so repulsiv and tyrannical to you.

If you repeal a law you prohibit its execution.

The truth is, there is a very large number of Liberals who hav inherited or cultivated an appetite for strong drink. Many of them belong to Liberal Leagues and drink enough every year to buy many books and papers and do much for Liberal lectures. They do not want any prohibitory laws to help them reform. A Liberal saturated with bad whisky and extremely poisonous tobacco, and who will not take a Liberal paper or help to build up a Liberrl League, is to me a repulsiv object.

We all (you too, I presume) are in favor of laws to prohibit murder, robbery, arson, rape (it ought to include licensed rape), burglary, etc., and to protect life and property and individual rights. Is not the prohibitory law designed to effect all this? You giv a melancholy view of what churchcraft and priestcraft are doing to "stop the Liberal press and close the lips of Freethinkers," and you say if I sanction prohibition I do not know why I am a Freethinker.

Do not facts prove that the more they try to "stop the press" and "close the lips" the more the presses increase and the lips open? You ask, "How many more sumptuary laws, Utah bills, medical, and Comstock laws do you want?" Take D. M. Bennett's case. Was not the application of law to him a boomerang that hurt the orthodox much the most? Has it not been the means of setting up Bennett, doubling the circulation of his TRUTH SEEKER and books and friends and largely increasing his Infidel influence? So it has been more or less in other cases. Are you not glad that there are laws to protect you and prohibit your being molested and physically injured in some places where you go? It seems to me you despair too much and do not see that our enemies are working for us unconsciously as much as we for ourselvs. "Through the thick gloom of the present I see the brightness of the future as the sun in the heavens."

HOW WE THINK.

By Spirit M. Faraday.

Among the many subjects treated are: Spirit life the best place in which to study the mind.—The mental surprise that a change of vibration among the atoms produces.—Why brutes suffer less pain than men.—Why mammalia are more sensitiv than lower orders.—The brain is not the fountain of thought.—An analysis of the brain will never reveal the mind.—What makes people stupid.—Why reformers are persecuted.—Why Prof. Faraday would correct his earth statements.—What makes fanatics.—How a child develops the power to think.—The effect of language in developing the power to think.—How the reason originates.—Why races sometimes remain stationary from generation to generation.—How to break the power of ignorance.—The importance of shocking the minds of sluggish people.—The penalty of living without thinking.—Is there a limit to mental development while in the body?—How knowledge transcending human attainments can be transmitted to man.—As man dvances he can better analyze himself.

THE BOSTON INVESTIGATOR,

The oldest reform journal in the United States,

Is published every Wednesday at the Paine Memorial Building, Boston, Mass.,

By JOSIAH P. MENDUM

Edited by HORACE SEAVER.

PRICE, $3.00 per annum; single copies, seven cents. Specimen copies sent on receipt of a two-cent stamp to pay postage.

The Investigator is devoted to the Liberal cause in religion; or in other words, to universal mental liberty. Independent in all its discussions, discarding superstitious theories of what never can be known, it devotes its columns to things of this world alone, and leaves the next, if there be one, to those who hav entered its unknown shores. Believing that it is the duty of mortals to work for the interests of this world, it confines itself to the things of this life entirely. It has arrived at the age of fifty-one years, and asks for a support from those who are fond of sound reasoning, good reading, reliable news, anecdotes, science, art, and a useful family journal. Reader, please send your subscription for six months or one year, and if you are not satisfied with the way the Investigator is conducted, we won't ask you to continue with us any longer 3m53

A New Edition. Just Published.

A Short History of the Bble.

Being an Account of the Formation and Development of the Canon.

By BRONSON C. KEELER.

Price, cloth, 75 cents. Paper, 50 cents.

This book should be read by every clergyman, layman, scholar, and Liberal.

I hav read Mr. Keeler's book with great pleasure and profit. He gives, in my opinion, a clear and intelligent account of the growth of the Bible. He shows why books were received as inspired, and why they were rejected. He does not deal in opinions, but in facts; and for the correctness of his facts he refers to the highest authorities. He has shown exactly who the Christian fathers were, and the weight that their evidence is entitled to. The first centuries of Christianity are filled with shadow; most histories of that period simply tell us what did not happen, and even the statements of what did not happen are contradictory. The falsehoods do not agree. Mr. Keeler must hav spent a great deal of time in the examination of a vast number of volumes, and the amount of information contained in his book could not be collected in years. Every minister, every college professor, and every man who really wishes to know something about the origin and growth of the Bible should read this book.—R. G. Ingersoll.
